INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A PREACHER....NO. 1.

In the Fall of 1832, I gave a discourse at 5 o'clock in the village of G., Madison county, N. Y. After service, a gentleman approached me, and requested a few moments conversation upon religious subjects. The request was immediately granted, and he commenced by saying—

Well, Sir—You have labored hard, and with considerable ingenuity, to prove that endless misery is false. But, after all, you have not made a Universalist of me.

Indeed, Sir, I am sorry to hear you say that—but with your consent, and the permission of God, I will try again.

Well, Sir, I will select two items mentioned in your discourse; prove them true, and I'm a Universalist while I live. In the first place, you contend that a pious man is a happier man under all circumstances, than a sinner. In the second place, you took for granted, as I understood you, that men would be changed after death. Both positions I believe untrue, and call upon you to prove them true, or to acknowledge them false.

But, my dear Sir, you are jesting with me. You do not believe the wicked enjoy life as well as the righteous!

Yes I do. The righteous man must take up his cross daily and hourly—it is a cross-bearing life. And he that will not bear the cross, shall not wear the crown. Why, the righteous man is represented as a soldier going out to fight his enemy. He is a soldier by profession and practice; he must battle with the world, the flesh and the devil. He must pray and watch—and watch and pray, all his life time—or he'll never get to heaven I can tell you. And that is not all, nor even the worst of it. He must give money to build a meeting-house—money to settle a preacher—money to publish tracts—money to the missionary society—money to sustain a singing school—go to meeting every Sabbath, rain or shine—in short, he must do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly, whether it is pleasant or unpleasant. The wicked are not troubled in this way, nor with these things. They live as they list—do as they have a mind to, and care for nobody. And yet, you say they are a poor miserable set of fellows—and to borrow your own language, 'in the depth of hell.' And then you cautioned us to deal gently with such men—to lead them with a gentle hand, and kind words, from darkness to light—from sin to virtue—from hell to heaven. You are deceived I tell you. As to light, they have got all they want. As to virtue, they will laugh you to scorn should you mention it.—And as to heaven, they desire no better one than your hell is.

Well, upon my word friend, you've made a strong case, and I give it up. I own beat.

What, do you yield both points?

Yes, Sir, both points—and every point or position you choose to assume.

Well, that's honest at any rate. I had no idea you would give it up so soon however.

Well, Sir, we both agree that the wicked are happier in this world than the righteous—and that there can not be a change after death.

Yes Sir; yes sir, we are together upon both points at last.

Well, Sir, now for the conclusion. If you please, I will say; you are a righteous, miserable man. I am a wicked, happy man. So we live, so we die—and so we shall be in the future, so long as God, heaven or hell exist. Now, do you not discover at once, that you have damned yourself to all eternity! There is no change after death, consequently you must see and understand, that you, having been a righteous, miserable man—and I having been a wicked, happy man, through life,—you will eternally be righteous, but miserable—I shall eternally be wicked, but happy. Do you understand, Sir?

I—I—I, never thought of that.—So we parted.

THE WILL OF GOD AND ITS ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

Much has been said and written in regard to the will of God; and much too, that is contradictory in itself. It hath long been said that all were endlessly lost. The Calvinist declares that man by transgression lost communion with his God; fell under his wrath and curse; became liable not only to all the miseries of this life, but to death itself, and the pains of hell forever; that God hath out of his mere good pleasure, elected some men, from all eternity, to everlasting life; and entered into a covenant of grace to deliver them out of the estate of sin and misery, and bring them into an estate of salvation by a Redeemer. This creed, it will be seen, teaches that God's will embraced but a part of the human family. The others, not being subjects of the election, were left to suffer the misery of that estate wherein man fell; consequently that the non-elect are to suffer endless wrath, not for their own sins only, but for the sins of father Adam, inasmuch as the same creed declares that 'the sinfulness of that estate wherinto man fell,' which brings them under the wrath and curse before spoken of, 'consists in the guilt of Adam's first sin, the want of original righteousness, and the corruption of his whole nature, which is commonly called original sin, together with all actual transgressions which proceed from it.'

In connection with this, and it is a legitimate conclusion, it is said that the election was made without any reference to the acts of the creation, being from all eternity. There could be no election upon any other ground, from the fact that all had fallen under the wrath and curse.

Upon the views stated, it is received that the will of God embraces only the elect; consequently, that when he sent his Son, he sent him to save the elect only. A moment's reflection, however, will show that there is an error in this system, and place the matter in its true light. It will be perceived by the least reflecting even, that the will of a being must be in accordance with the nature of that being; also that it is impossible in the nature of things that every being possessing intelligence must have a will, purpose or determination.

Desire is the necessary concomitant of intelligence, and this always leads to a will, or purpose, to accomplish the desire. And more, a desire resulting from intelligence, must be for something which can be realized. That man who desires that which he knows in the very nature of things can never be effected, is exercising folly, and the desire is one of foolishness. I say, therefore, that desire is the result of intelligence or wisdom, and must be in accordance with that; consequently it is for something which can be effected. I said desire leads directly to a will or purpose. There can be no will without something to first dictate, which must be desire; hence, man, when he desires any object, purposes to accomplish that object. He desires property, and by that is led to will its acquisition, and immediately lays plans for its accomplishment. This being the natural result of intelligence in man, the same must be true of God so far as intelligence is concerned; consequently he desires, and by that desire is led to will or purpose the same thing, which must be in perfect accordance with the nature of the being purposing.

If these positions are true, it will be seen that this idea, viz. God has two separate and distinct wills, one of purpose, and another of desire, is fallacious; inasmuch as they are so blended together that they can not be separated; the one growing out and depending upon the other.

We are now ready to discover the nature and extent of the will of God. Its nature and extent are to be drawn from the nature of God. An argument might be grounded upon each attribute of the Deity; but it is unnecessary. A sufficient force lies in the nature, and no argument can be drawn from his various attributes which can not be drawn from his nature, as each attribute must exist and act in perfect harmony with his nature.

'God is love.' This is his nature, and every faculty of the Divinity must necessarily centre in love. Being love and at the same time the father of the spirits of all flesh, it will be seen that he must desire the good of all. It can not be said that he desires the greatest good of the greatest number, meaning thereby less than the whole; for this would argue that he could not bestow a good upon all; hence it has been taught that man is such naturally that his future bliss can not be complete unless suffering is inflicted upon a portion of the race—that the happiness of the elect is enhanced by the wretchedness of the non-elect; therefore, to secure the greatest good of the greatest number, there is a necessity of willing the ruin of some.—But it will be seen that if God is love, he must love every creature which he has made. He can not have created it for the purpose of hating, he having no hatred to exercise; hence then a desire for the salvation of the world, which is admitted by all Arminians. These declare, however, that the will of God, that embraces the world, is but a will of desire. But by a recurrence to a preceding argument, it will be seen that desire is the agent producing a will or purpose, consequently as the will is dependent upon and grows out of the desire to save the world, the will must embrace the same. The will must be as far-reaching as the desire, being the result thereof and made for its gratification.

This is the sentiment inculcated throughout the Scriptures. These declare that he 'will have all men to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth.' Says the Saviour, 'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me; and this is the Father's will which sent me; that of all he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day.' All that were given Christ then are embraced in the will of God, which by a prophet are declared to be 'the heathen for an inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession.' All these are embraced in the will of God, unless there can be found some beyond the uttermost parts of the earth.

The question then arises, Will this ever be accomplished? I answer, yes. If not, you will discover a destruction of the sovereignty of the Deity, and what is worse than all, his eternal disappointments, which can not be, in that he declareth the end from the beginning, and doeth all his pleasure. We have the assurance of him who 'can not lie,' that as he has thought, so shall it come to pass; and as he has purposed, so shall it stand.

Let us then, friendly reader, receive this as the truth of Heaven, and by it be guided in virtue.—This is the only sentiment which can give us confidence in God, and encouragement to travel wisdom's ways; for we have in this the assurance that God will be with us and crown our labors with success.

PARTY ANIMOSITIES.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

We wish to make a few remarks upon that intolerant party spirit, and zeal not according to knowledge, which so distinguishes, or disgraces—which you will—the American people in their political doings. We are not of course going to discuss any political or party questions, but only to consider the subject of party animosities, in its moral and religious bearings.

These are momentous; for party zeal threatens to overthrow virtue and religion, which of course are the only foundation upon which free institutions can stand. Look at the last presidential campaign! Did we not see Christianity, morality, and even decency cast to the winds? Men even, who at other times lead moral and Christian lives, did not then scruple to bow to sin—to sacrifice to strange gods, in order to accomplish their purposes. They said, "because the gods of the kings of Syria help them, therefore will I sacrifice to them, that they may help me." But such things will most assuredly be the ruin of them, and of all who are subject to their malign influence. How much of intriguing and falsehood was practiced by the leaders—how much of anger, bitterness, envy, and hatred, fell to the lot of the followers! How often was Christianity forced to weep as it were tears of blood, over the violence done by politicians to her holy precepts! Every one will be ready to admit this, at once; but then every partisan will probably charge the most of the sin to the opposite party.—But I tell you of a truth, brethren, most of us have too many sins of our own to answer for in this matter, to permit us to cast stones at our neighbors.—Let him that is without sin, cast the first stone. Let him charge the opposite party with committing the wrong. Who is guiltless in this matter?

Oh! how many friendships were broken; how many fond ties were severed; how many hearts were changed; how many enemies were made; how much love was quenched, and affection cooled; how much lasting bitterness engendered; how much charity chilled, and Christian benevolence soured; how much happiness destroyed, and misery caused, by that fierce spirit of political intolerance, which swept over the land like a tornado, in the summer and fall of 1844! Do not misunderstand me: I am not condemning politics, or political discussion. It is not only the privilege, but the imperative duty, of every American citizen, to be well informed on all subjects relating to the well being of our beloved country; and to exercise his privilege of franchise, at the polls, as his conscience shall dictate. And it is the right and glory of us all, to have the privilege of freely, and fearlessly, expressing our opinions, at all proper times, and in all proper places. But this is very different from that mad spirit of bigotry, which will not admit so much as the possibility of an opponents being right, or even honest, which characterizes times of political, no less than of religious excitement.

Why, to judge from reading political papers, and hearing politicians talk, at such times, you would suppose they believed all who did not belong to their party, and think just as they did upon every subject, were fools and madmen, to say nothing of hypocrites and villains! All are indiscriminately proscribed who can not pronounce their Shibboleth—who do not happen, precisely, to coincide with them on every point of the political creed. How absurd and unreasonable this is! and every one admits it to be unreasonable,—for men can not be expected, and ought not to be required, to think alike on every point, any more than they look alike. But it is not only ridiculous, it is absolutely pernicious; since it poisons and destroys the Christian affections,—which are of more value to us than all things else beneath the sun. Then how earnestly should we all strive to correct the evil, first in our own minds, and then we may admonish others. Let us realize that an opponent is still a man, perhaps a Christian; and that he differs no more in an opinion from us, than we do from him. That it by no means follows, because a man is not of our party, he is therefore a fool or a hypocrite: but let us realize that he is probably as honest and as sincere as we are, and would do violence to his conscience if he should act differently from what he does: and then let us treat him accordingly. Remember that all men have rights; and that they have as much right to pass over Jordan, even if they can not say Shibboleth, as we have ourselves. Reason with them if you will—reason plainly, and without fear or favor—but do it in the spirit of kindness and love, as Christ reasoned with the errorists of his day. Use every honorable endeavor to convert them to the truth; but eschew all harshness, bitterness, denunciation, bigotry, and exclusiveness, as you would sin. In fine, do not let your controversy disturb those feelings of love and affection, which you are bound to feel even for one who is your enemy; then it will not only be harmless, but productive of good. It will serve to instruct and enlighten you, on subjects of vital importance to every American citizen. Is it not important to you—to your welfare and that of your children—that the liberty of your country, which was purchased with the blood and toil of our venerated revolutionary sires,—should be preserved in pristine purity? But this glorious legacy can only be preserved by a population enlightened in political science. Then we say, political discussion is necessary, but it must be conducted in the right spirit.

Again; another evil produced by this bitter political rancor, and abandoning of all righteousness in political contests,—is to drive all, or at least many, of the best men in the nation from the arena of politics; and leave the important contest to be decided, and the momentous affairs of the nation to be managed and conducted, by the very lowest dregs—morally speaking—of the population: thus endangering the noble ship of state, by entrusting her to those unworthy of the sacred charge. Upright men are astorished, at the shameless excesses, openly, and unblushingly, perpetrated in the name of party; and they become disgusted with the whole subject of politics, in its length and breadth. What can be imagined more detrimental to the interests, or more dangerous to the liberties of our country, both civil and religious, than this?

Then is it not time the warning voice was raised, to beware of this Maelstrom which so ominously threatens us? Sound it far and near, with the voice of a trumpet, ye patriots who love your country! Sound the warning, ye Christians, who love righteousness and truth! Show the people their sins, and the nation its danger!

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES.

Man has need of a rule of life. He must have directions, higher than the necessities of the moment, or he will go astray. There is scarcely a day passes over any person of mature years, when he does not meet with circumstances which compel him to pause and inquire—what shall I do, or which way shall I go, now? When I say a rule of life, I do not mean that he shall be hemmed in by narrow conventionalities, nor rigid mimicry of others, nor an everlasting slavery to the very round of varieties with which he began life. But I mean that he must recognize certain principles by which all his conduct shall be governed. Can any one tell me where such a rule of life shall be found if not in the Scriptures? Experience can not alone furnish it, because, without the Scriptures, the tendencies of experience are not clearly comprehended.

And then, too, the future; the unexplored regions of eternity, is a theme which awakens the most intense interest in the bosom of man. Dear as life is it must be resigned to God. Shall we live again? Shall the yearnings of the spirit after light; shall the mind, which so anxiously peers into the mysteries of human destiny; shall those powers, the present development of which only show their capacity for a higher life, burst out from the damp death-mould, beautiful and beautified? Or must they perish with the outer tabernacle which they occupy? We have that within us which has enjoyed the beauty and fragrance of the flower.—They are gone, and yet we have learned that we can comprehend and enjoy a higher beauty. We have joyously watched the progress of the good and the holy. They are gone; but they have taught us that we can enjoy a higher good, even a state of sinless perfection. And there are the old patriarchs, and prophets and sages and philanthropists of the past. Where are they? Earth's peopling millions repeat the solemn inquiry, and echo answers, where!

'Spirit of man! mysterious habitant!

Well would we trace the story of thy power—

Well would that sympathy within us pant

To follow from the glory of thy bower

To Eden where thy cloudless lustre shone,

To the world's wilderness—the weary way

Where the twain tenants of that bower, alone,

Led by a voice they dared not but obey,

Wandered, till, mingled with mortality,

They sank beneath the ringing sentence—Thou shalt die.

The Scriptures are of unequalled importance in these considerations. They can not be dispensed with. They furnish us with the only safe rule of life. They teach us to act honestly—righteously—as our rule of life. They teach us to act thus, and confide the result in God. And they leave us not in the dark, as to what constitutes righteousness.—They present a faithful portrait of what life's responsibilities and duties are, and what is essential to true peace therein. And when we pass on through the busy scenes of time and begin to look for a response to the spirit's yearnings, the Scriptures only meet us here with the bread of life.—They mirror forth the glad some, soul strengthening message, that, while the earth is not our abiding place, 'this mortal must put on immortality'—this corruptible is only to be laid aside for the more blessed inheritance of incorruption. The Scriptures only can minister to the undying inquiries of the soul. And they come to us with the assurance that desires so holy, so pure, so prophetic of ceaseless glory, as are our aspirations after a spiritual life in the future, are not destined to be disappointed. Christian brothers, you can not ponder too much upon the words of inspiration. The more you search the Scriptures, the more you will love them. They teach you what you are, and what you are to be. They teach you why you are, and who to love while being. They teach you how to act, and what to hope while acting.

'Hope and Immortal life! how bright they break

On the uplifting vista of our days!—

How like a clarion voice they swell and wake

Our palying nature from its deep amaze!

O, ask not what to morrow to the soul

May bear of honor or of joy—but on

To the unfolding gates—the golden goal—

Lift the exulting vision—and 'tis won!

That better land where weariness no more

Shall weigh upon the spirit's pinious as they soar!"

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Br. SKINNER—I designed to write something upon the subject of Capital Punishment; but have room for but a few words, in addition to what I have said about our cause in this place. I have, as has every well wisher to the captive and the prisoner, an anxious desire that something more should be done, in the State of New York, to do away with the gallows, than has yet been done. Why should New York be behind Massachusetts in this respect? Are her people any less magnanimous—any less just—to the murderer—to society? Are they less capable of discerning the right and doing it—of searching out the wrong and forsaking it? even though that wrong be found among the great and wise, and good, sanctioned by the usage of ages. I think those questions must be answered in the negative. What then can be done? What should be done? I answer, much—very much. And, 1st, There can and should (I think,) be societies formed in every county—town, and school district, whose object and labor shall be to overthrow the gallows, and substitute therefor some human mode of punishment. These societies should be in possession of all papers and writings on this subject, and make it a primary business to circulate the information they contain; as want of information—want of examination, is the reason why the gallows is still allowed to peer in vengeful hate over our heads—a relic of ancient cruelty. Petitions should be drawn and numerously signed and presented to the next Legislature on the subject, and see if this relic of barbarism can not be done away. * * *

THAT AWFUL NAME.

I was much amused yesterday at the relation of an incident which took place some twelve years ago, by our old friend Mr. Andrews. Mr. Andrews' son was teaching school some four or five miles from his father's, and it so happened that he boarded with one of those over-religious souls, who believe that religion is a name, and not something to be done, as James tells us. The old gentleman one evening had occasion to remark something about that abominable doctrine called Universalism. He said it was the worst doctrine in the world, and that if a Universalist should come to his house he would turn him out doors, and he would not let him enter his dwelling again if he knew he would freeze to death. Thus did this pious soul hate that awful name, as the sequel will show.

It so happened that the school teacher above mentioned had one of Br. Ballou's sermons. The young man tore off the title page, and slipped it into the old gentleman's Bible unknown to him.—When he opened the Bible he found this little pamphlet, and commenced reading, and found it was a sermon. The old man began to make inquiries if any one knew anything about the pamphlet, how it got into his Bible; but he could obtain no satisfactory information about the mystery. So he concluded that God had put it in his Bible. The old gentleman read a part of a page, and the old lady began to shout, glory to God! saying, 'I know that came from God.' The old man stopped reading and shouted glory to God, for sending him that precious treasure.

In the evening he came running to Mr. Andrews as he returned from school, here! here! said he, is a pamphlet which God put in my Bible, read it! read it! The old gentleman went bright and early the next morning, to one of his neighbors, and told him what a wonderful good sermon he had found in his Bible. He began to read it to the lady of the house, and she commenced to shout glory, and the old man had to shout too! He said that he would not take a thousand dollars for that sermon—and when he moved away from the country he took it with him.

Suppose he had known that it was a Universalist sermon, how quick he would have committed it to the flames. It is not Universalism that people hate, but the awful name!—[Star in the West.

STYLE IN PUBLIC SPEAKING.

The pithy writer who calls himself 'Old Gilbert,' in an essay on the subject of speech-making and preaching, gives some of his views in the following paragraphs.

We confess our likes for effective pulpit style. A minister is not a pulpit essayist. A minister is not a philosophical lecturer. A fine book style is not a fine pulpit style. The heart is the minister of the desk. The best style is that which brings the intellect down through the heart, and melts all its precious metals in that hot furnace. If you want a specimen take good old South—see what edge is in all he said. Playful but not light—sharp but not sour—imaginative but not dramatic—using common words with uncommon power—speaking to you as if he expected to convince you—full of earnestness—decided without dogmatism—witty but not vulgar. All his words strike you like the explosion of torpedoes.

Some preachers use a sort of air gun. You hear no report—you see some effect. Others are real artillery men—thundering and blazing. No objection to the artillery men, if they will only throw balls; but it is rather funny, to fire loud guns, and have very small shot.

Let every man keep his own natural style. All children can't cry alike. Some cry easy—some make a great blubbering. All preacher's can't preach alike. Personal taste should be rectified and then become personal law. How would Milton's old Gothic architectural style suit simple hearted Cowper? How would Charles Lamb look in Coleridge's Germanic idioms? How would Hall look in Chalmers' garb? How would Wesley appear in Harvey's gaudy robes? Let every man be natural, but let him take care what is natural. Nature is a very indefinite thing now-a-days. If you have the volume of Niagara, then you may become a cataract, but a bucket-full won't answer. If you have electricity, you may afford to thunder, but not without.

AWFUL.

There is no doubt that many feeling minds have been 'driven by such tremendous representations of the Divinity' as the following, into the cheerlessness of skepticism. It is from Reynold's Inquiry concerning the state of the Economy of the Angelic world.

'So high, so great, so incomprehensibly supreme is God, that ten thousand times ten thousand most miserably tormented spirits shall not in the least be pitied or regarded by Him to all eternity. Ten thousand times ten thousand most doleful sighs, shrieks, and groans, and yellings, and roarings, and howlings under the most exquisite torture and anguish of spirit, shall not meet with the least pity or compassion to all eternity. Oh! the dignity of that Being, who has an everlasting hell to be the representation or triumph of his grandeur; there he strides in magnificent though gloomy state, and marches over a world of damned heads with the most uncommiserating disregard or disdain.'

CHRISTIAN HOPE.

The following touching and tenderly beautiful extracts are from a discourse of the Rev. Orville Dewey. O who would exchange the blessed hope of the Christian so tenderly expressed for the cheerless anticipations of the skeptic? For worlds we would not do it. D. S.

'I have seen one die: she was beautiful; and beautiful were the ministries of life that were given her to fulfil. Angelic loveliness enrobed her; and a grace as if it were caught from heaven, breathed in every tone, hallowed every affection, shone in every action,—invested, as a halo, her whole existence, and made it a light and blessing, a charm and a vision of gladness, to all around her: but she died! Friendship, and love, and parental fondness, and infant weakness stretched out their hands to save her; but they could not save her: and she died! What! did all that loveliness die? Is there no land of the blessed and the lovely ones, for such to live in? Forbid it reason, religion!—bereaved affection, and undying love! forbid the thought! It can not be that such die, in God's counsel who live, even in frail human memory forever!

'I have seen one die—in the maturity of every power, in the earthly perfection of every faculty; when many temptations had been overcome, and many hard lessons had been learned; when many experiments had made virtue easy, and had given a facility to action, and a success to endeavor; when wisdom had been learnt from many mistakes, and a skill had been laboriously acquired in the use of many powers; and the being, I looked upon, had just compassed that most useful, most practical of all knowledge, how to live, and to act well and wisely: yet I have seen such an one die!—Was all this treasure gained, only to be lost? Were all these faculties trained, only to be thrown into utter disuse? Was this instrument,—the intelligent soul, the noblest in the universe,—was it so laboriously fashioned, and by the most varied and expensive apparatus, that, on the very moment of being finished, it should be cast away forever? No, the dead, as we call them, do not so die. They carry our thoughts to another and a nobler existence. They teach us, and especially by all the strange and seemingly untoward circumstances of their departure from this life, that they, and we, shall live forever.'

The following is from a sermon of Massillon the eloquent and pious Bishop of Clermont.

'Oh God! if this were the character of your Supreme Being; if we were really called on to adore you under such dreadful attributes, I could no longer acknowledge you for my Father for my Protector for the Composer of my sorrow, the Supporter of my weakness, the Rewarder of my fidelity. You would then appear under no other form than that of a malignant and fantastic tyrant; sacrificing mankind to his insolent vanity, whom he had created out of nothing, for no other purpose than to make them the sport of his power and the objects of his caprice.'

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

PUBLIC DISCUSSION.—Arrangements have been made for a public oral discussion on the subject of Universalism, at the village of Mexico, Oswego county; to commence at 9 o'clock, A. M. on Monday the 12th day of January next, and to continue six hours each day during that week, between Rev. George G. Hapgood Principal of the Academy at that place, and P. MORSE.

CONFERENCE AT HOMER.—A Conference of the Cayuga Association of Universalists, will be holden in the Universalist church in the village of Homer, Cortland county, on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in January, 1846; for the purpose of organizing a Missionary Society, on a plan similar to that established in the Chenango Association, unless some better plan should be presented at the time. All societies within our bounds, are requested to send delegates—and it is desired, that those towns where no societies are in existence, if they contain but one believer in Universalism, should be represented either by delegate or letter. It is also particularly requested, that all our ministering brethren belonging in the Cayuga Association should be in attendance on that occasion—and we shall also greet with a hearty welcome, all who shall visit us from other Associations, to aid us by their counsel and cheer us by their presence. Br. T. J. Goodrich, is, I believe, pledged to be present with us; and we trust that others who are not pledged, will be equally faithful in attending. Public exercises will be held in the church, during Wednesday, Wednesday evening, and Thursday. H. L. HAYWARD.

A CONFERENCE OF THE SUSQUEHANNA ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSALISTS will be held in the Presbyterian meeting house in Friendsville, Susquehanna county, on the second Wednesday and following Thursday, the 14th and 15th of January, 1846. J. B. GILMAN, Standing Clerk.

'Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.'

The following communication is from the pen of Br. J. R. Johnson, of this State, and was originally published in the 'Star in the West.' It portrays indeed a most thrilling incident. Reader, can that doctrine (endless misery) be true that produces such wild despair and heart-rending anguish? And can that be false which thus snatches the victim of despair from utter ruin and pours the joys of heaven and peace into the bleeding soul? Read, and answer.

'Thrilling Incident!'

'HAS WILLIAM GONE TO HELL?'

In Churchville, N. Y., a few years since, a Baptist lady married the man of her choice, who it appears, was not a professor of religion, though a most amiable and dutiful husband—kind and affectionate. The young lady called upon her pastor, through her intended, to solemnize the nuptials. After their union they lived together but a few weeks, when her husband, whose name was William, sickened and suddenly died; and the pastor of the Baptist church in the village who had solemnized their union, was called upon to administer the consolations of the Gospel to the wretched widow.

He came.—The mourning group assembled, and the pastor was there. He rose; and instead of binding up the broken-hearted, inflicted deeper wounds, by preaching a terrific sermon on the torments of hell, and insinuated that the deceased had gone to suffer there. Overwhelmed with the thought, the young widow rose up and shrieked aloud—'HAS WILLIAM GONE TO HELL?' The shock upon the audience was electric; and deafening shrieks were all over the congregation. The sermon was ended. The frantic woman again appealed to her mother—'has William gone to hell?' But her mother, who believed with the pastor, could not give her a negative answer! and again she wept aloud, 'Alas, this poor heart of mine is breaking! WHERE IS WILLIAM!! WHO WILL SAY HE IS HAPPY?!'

How solemnly moved the procession to the resting place of the departed! Nothing breaking the silence, save the widow's deep-drawn sigh or groan, and the earnest shriek, 'Has William gone to hell?' And when the clogs of the grave's earth were thrown o'er the loved form, with redoubled vehemence, she wailed aloud, 'HAS WILLIAM GONE TO HELL! If he has, let me go there too, that I may be where William is!' And the last look which she gave toward the place where her loving husband was sleeping in death! and the thought that his soul was in the hell of torments which the pastor had portrayed, can neither be imagined nor described!—Heaven forbid that I should attempt it—my thoughts are intense, and my hand refuses.

But, two weeks rolled on, and the widow refused to be comforted. Her parents thought that perhaps a visit from a Universalist clergyman might relieve her anxiety as to the fate of her loved William. Accordingly Br. Cook, who resided and preached in the place, was called in. He tried to comfort her with the promises in the Gospel;—her countenance brightened. She requested him to preach William's funeral sermon. He did so. And as he descended from the desk she met him—he presented his hand, and she grasped it with frantic joy, exclaiming, 'Welcome message of peace have you brought from the spirit of Inspiration! God has inspired your heart to weep for others' woes, and sent you to bind up the broken-hearted! You have thrown a dreadful burden from my soul—all is well with William! My joy is full!—my gratitude you have, and for this act the Almighty will bless you!'

The young widow soon after joined the church under Br. Cook's charge, and I have heard has recently moved to the West. The gospel of peace be with her.

O, the horrid doctrine of hell torments! In contemplation of it, 'I cease to wonder that its fear has made some mad and others melancholy.' Brethren in the ministry, preach against it—pray for its extinction—and continue to proclaim the Good News of a world's salvation.

THE PATHETICS.

The following amusing story of the pathetic style of preaching, on the Prodigal, is from Br. Geo. Rogers' 'Memoranda,' it is worth preserving; as such specimens of style are becoming far more rare than formerly. We may in time lose them altogether.

Ed.

'The most outrageous maltreatment of Scripture and English to which I ever listened, was from a tall and gaunt Yorkshireman, who, in spite of all efforts to prevent him, took forcible possession of the pulpit at Spring Garden, and bored us with what he called a 'discourse.' His text was the Prodigal Son. In describing the Prodigal's leave-taking of his family he went deeply into the pathetics. 'We behold 'im,' said he, in a half crying, lugubrious tone, 'taking a last fare-a-well of 'is ffather, and a last fare-a-well of 'is moother, and a last fare-a-well of 'is seesther, and a last fare-a-well of 'is broother, and a last fare-a-well of 'is hooncle,' and so on through the family connexions. He then described his hero's progress in dissipation; and here his oratorical powers had fine scope. He made him start from 'ome' in a coach and six—then he sells one pair of 'orses' after another to pay his gambling accounts, (very graphic.) 'I see 'im, in my fancy's mind as it weers,' said he, 'driving from ball-room to ball-room, and from theatre to theatre, and from coort to coort; he rolls about in colussionsness and ubiquity, and perseweers onwards without a dimming veil between.' Upon my veracity, reader, this was his exact language. I know not but I should have wept from pure mortification, had it not been that an opposite propensity was brought into exercise by the circumstance of a negro dropping in, and taking his seat directly fronting me. Cuffy seemed in great doubt whether the gibberish to which he was listening was a violent assault upon honest English, or whether it belonged to a higher and more magnificent style of oratory than he was accustomed to. In his perplexity to decide this point he would roll his large whites towards me, ever and anon, in order to gather from my countenance what I thought of it all. For my part, I was in perfect torture during the whole time, from a hard contest between my risible and lachrymal organs.'

EPITOME OF WAR.

A fair exhibition of war in its origin, its progress and actual results, would be a startling condemnation of the whole custom as a piece of suicidal folly and madness. The Ettrick Shepherd, in his Lay Sermons, tells the following story quite to the point:

'The history of every war is very like a scene I once saw in Nithsdale (Scotland). Two boys from different schools met one fine day upon the ice. They eyed each other awhile in silence, with rather jealous and indignant looks, and with defiance on each brow.

'What are ye glowrin' at Billy?'

'What's that to you, Donald? I'll look whar I've a mind, an' hinder me if ye daur?'

To this a hearty blow was the return; and then began such a battle! It being Saturday, all the boys of both schools were on the ice, and the fight instantly became general. At first they fought at a distance with missile weapons, such as stones and snow-balls; but at length coming hand to hand, they coped in a rage, and many bloody raps were liberally given and received.

I went up to try if I could pacify them; for by this time a number of little girls had joined the affray, and I was afraid they would be killed. So addressing one party, I asked, 'What are you fighting those boys for? What have they done to you?'

'O, naething at a', maun; we just want to gie them a gude thrashin'—that's a?'

My remonstrance was in vain; at it they went afresh; and after fighting till they were quite exhausted, one of the principal heroes stepped forth between the combatants, himself covered with blood, and his clothes all torn to tatters, and addressed the opposing party thus:—'Weel, I'll tell you what we'll do wi' ye—if ye'll let us alane, we'll let you alane.' There was no more of it; the war was at an end, and the boys scampered away to their play.

That scene was a lesson of wisdom to me. I thought at the time, and have often thought since, that this trivial affray was the best epitome of war in general, that I had ever seen. Kings and ministers of state are just a set of grown-up children, exactly like the children I speak of, with only this material difference, that instead of fighting out for themselves the needless quarrels they have raised, they sit in safety and look on, hound out their innocent but servile subjects to battle, and then, after an immense waste of blood and treasure, are glad to make the boys condition—'if ye'll let us alane, we'll let you alane.'

Here is the upshot of nearly every war, the status quo ante bellum!

Answer to a Challenge.

The eccentric H. H. Breckenbridge, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, when a young man, was challenged to fight a duel by an English officer, whom he answered as follows:

I have two objections to this duel matter, the one is lest I should hurt you, and the other is lest you should hurt me. I do not see any good it would be to put a ball through your body. I could make no use of you when dead for any culinary purpose, as I would a rabbit or a turkey. I am no cannibal to feed on the flesh of men. Why then shoot down a human creature, of whom I could make no use? A buffalo would make better meat. For though your flesh might be delicate and tender, yet it wants the firmness and constancy which take and retain salt. At any rate it would not do for a long sea voyage.

You might make a good barbaque, it is true, being of the nature of a raccoon or opossum; but people are not in the habit of barbaquing any thing that is human now. And as to your hide, it is not worth taking off, being a little better than a two year old colt. So much for you. As to myself I do not like to stand in the way of any thing that is hurtful. I am under the impression that you might hit me. This being the case, I think it most advisable to stay at a distance. If you mean to try our pistols, take some object, a tree, or a barn door, about my dimensions. If you hit that, send me word, and I will acknowledge that if I had been in the same place you might also have hit me.

Incident of the American Revolution.

On the morning of our national birthday, the 4th of July, 1776, when the declaration of the American Independence was made—when the committee previously appointed to draft that instrument, made their report through their chairman, Thomas Jefferson—and when it was read, the house paused—hesitated. That instrument, they saw, cut them off even from the mercy of Great Britain. They saw with prophetic vision all the horrors of a sanguinary war—carnage and desolation passed in swift review before them. They saw the prospect of having rivetted still more closely upon their already chafed and bleeding limbs the chains of slavery. The house seemed to waver—silence, deep and solemn silence, reigned throughout the hall of the spacious capitol. Every countenance indicated that deep meditation was at work; and the solemn resolutions were calling for double energy. At this fearful crisis, when the very destiny of the country seemed to be suspended upon the action of the moment, the silence—the painful silence—was broken. An aged patriot arose—a venerable and stately form, his head white with the frost of many years. He cast on the assembly a look of inexpressible interest and unconquerable determination; while on his visage the hue of age was lost in the burning patriotism that fired his cheek. 'There is,' said he, 'a tide in the affairs of men, a nick of time. We perceive it now before us. That noble instrument upon your table, which insures immortality to its author, should be subscribed this very morning, by every pen in the house. He who will not respond to its accents, and strain every nerve to carry into effect its provisions, is unworthy the name of a freeman. Although these gray hairs must soon descend to the sepulchre, I would infinitely rather they would descend thither by the hand of the public executioner, than desert at this crisis the sacred cause of my country.' The patriarch sat down at forthwith the declaration was signed by every member present. Who was that venerable patriarch? you ask. I answer it was John Witherspoon, of New Jersey, whose name is found among the signers of the Declaration, the Magna Charta of our nation's independence. Yes, it was John Witherspoon, a distinguished member of the Presbyterian church, a lineal descendant of John Knox, the great Scotch Reformer.—[Speech of the Rev. S. S. Templeton.]

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 2, 1846.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

TO OUR READERS, ONE AND ALL—may they live to see many more, and each one be happier than the former. May each and all so grow in grace, in the knowledge of the truth, and the practice of virtue, that they may be happy now, happier in their growth, and happiest of all the sons and daughters of men, in the full maturity of their virtue. May they be happy in perusing the pages of this weekly visiter, happy in procuring new subscribers and new readers of its messages of good tidings, and happy in seeing the glorious doctrine it inculcates spreading wider and wider over the land and throughout the world.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO OUR BROTHER EDITORS, ONE AND ALL. May their 'bow abide in strength, and their hands be made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob.' May they be successful in pulling down the strong holds of error and darkness, diffusing around the light of eternal truth, and spreading abroad peace and righteousness through the world.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO ALL THE MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL OF PEACE. May they lift up their voice like a trumpet, giving not an uncertain, but a certain sound, arousing the sleepers from their long naps, enlightening the benighted with Heaven's own truth, letting their light shine before men, not by good words only, but by good deeds, and comfort all that mourn.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO ALL BELIEVERS IN THE TRUTH AS IT IS IN JESUS. May they be like a city set on a hill that can not be hid—like a light on a stand that giveth light to all in the house. May their faith grow stronger, their hope firmer, and their charity broader, till their faith shall embrace all in this world, their hope lay hold on all the glories of the future world, and their charity encircle every creature of God for time and eternity.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO ALL THE BELIEVERS IN AND VOTARIES OF ERROR AND FALSEHOOD. May this new year commence a new era with them. May new truths burst upon their minds, new and better hopes inspire their hearts, new and holier affections expand and elevate their souls, and new and higher joys than ever yet they have known take possession of their whole nature through that faith that works by love and purifies the heart.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO THE MOURNING AND THE SORROWING. May their sorrow endure but for a night, and joy come in the morning. May their tears be wiped away by the tender hand of affection, their sighs hushed to stillness by the voice of love, and their sorrows turned to joys by the rich mercies of God.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO ALL THE WORLD. May it grow wiser as it grows older, and better as it grows wiser, and happier as it grows better; till all shall become wise unto salvation, all good as God in the beginning prospectively saw and pronounced them and all perfectly happy as their Father in heaven eternally intended they should be.

D. S.

UNIVERSALISM.

The longer we live the stronger grows our faith in the great doctrine of a world's salvation. The more we see and meditate on the works and ways and providences of God, the more fully are we convinced of the perfect, ilimitable, endless and changeless benevolence of our Father in heaven; and of the utter impossibility of his ever dooming any of his offspring to interminable torments.—His benevolence is written, as with sunbeams, upon all creation. The heavens above; the earth beneath; the world around and within us; the worlds of mind and of matter; the animal, the vegetable and the mineral kingdoms; the adaptation of means to ends—means all-efficient, and ends all-benevolent—the order of divine Providence, by which seeming evil is seen to result in good, light to shine forth out of darkness, joy to spring up from the bed of sorrow—by which the harsh and terrific mutterings of thunder, and the livid lightning's crash, are made to purify the very air we breathe and make it salubrious both to vegetable and animal life; the ten thousand sources of enjoyment and of profit in what we were wont to deem evil—all, all combine to declare that 'the Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works.'

Not alone in the material world and the benignant providences of God do we see evidences of his paternity, and strong presumptive proof of the great doctrine of a world's salvation: the instinctive breathings of the soul, the outgoings of the heart's affections to God, and to good—the respect which even vice itself is compelled to pay to goodness—the innate principle of religion in man, the secret longings, the strong and irrepressible desires and aspirations of the spirit after immortality and endless bliss, coupled with the fact that God has made the most ample provision for satisfying the desires or natural wants, of 'every living thing,' and that, consistently with his character, he could not neglect the nobler aspirations of souls created in his own image—all go to confirm us in our glorious and cheering faith. That God's benevolence is such as to dispose him to save all mankind is clearly proved by all his works and all his dealings with men. That he has the ability to save all, is a proposition which none will deny but those who are virtually atheists. And if he has the disposition and the ability to save all, what shall, or what can prevent it?

Again, all good men and good beings in the universe, desire and pray for the salvation of all men—they all pray for the suppression of vice and misery, and for the universal prevalence of holiness and happiness. Well, from whence springs this desire—from God, or the devil? from good, or from evil? Is it a good, or a bad desire? All will answer, It is a good desire, and doubtless springs from God. Well, reader, will God inspire his creatures with more benevolent desires towards his offspring than he feels himself? Are we more benevolent, or better than God? Again, will God inspire desires and prayers in his children in opposition to his own will and purposes? Or will he inspire in them desires and prayers which he determines never to grant? Impossible. For we are required to pray for all men—and to pray in faith too, nothing doubting—for the very reason that this accords with the will of God, 'who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.'

But over and above all the light which shines in nature and providence, and in the benevolent desires and aspirations of all good beings, is the light of revelation, the testimony of the Holy Scriptures. This, after all, is the more sure word of prophecy, the infallible criterion of truth, the sure and ample warrant for the doctrine of universal salvation. We say, 'to the law and the testimony; if we speak not according to these, it is because there is no light in us.' If the Bible does not sanction this doctrine, or furnish ample data for its maintenance, then have we read it to no purpose, or never understood its true teachings; and could we be convinced that such was the fact, we should either abandon the doctrine or the Bible. But we honestly and devoutly believe the Bible is true, that it is God's revelation to man, and that it clearly teaches the ultimate holiness and happiness of the whole human family. 'Therefore, we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe.'

Throughout both the Old, and the New Testament, there are frequent and to us, clear indications of this glorious truth. And besides the express declarations that necessarily convey such a sense, there are multitudes of precepts given and principles laid down which obviously imply the doctrine, and can not be interpreted, explained, or applied consistently with any other doctrine.

The early promise which God made in the garden of Eden, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head—His promise, confirmed by an oath, to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, that in their seed (which was Christ, see Gal. iii: 16,) all the nations, families and kindreds of the earth should be blessed, and that the blessing consisted in turning away every one of them from his iniquities (see Acts iii: 25, 26)—the declaration that God hath spoken of the restitution of all things by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began—all seem to us to point to this great truth as their consummation and fulfilment.

Then, too, the titles given to the Messiah by the prophets and inspired writers all seem to imply and require this grand result, the salvation of the whole world. He is called, the seed of the woman, that should bruise the serpent's head; the seed of Abraham, in whom all nations should be blessed; the Shiloh, unto whom the gathering of the people should be; the Shepherd; the Fountain; the Rock; the Refiner; the Purifier; the Refuge for the weary; the Feast of fat things for all people; the Stone, cut from the mountain without hands, that shall fill the whole earth; the Salvation of God to the ends of the earth; the Ensign for the people; the Sun of Righteousness; the bright and morning Star; the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world; the Bread of God that giveth life to the world; the Physician to heal; the Deliverer; the Captain of salvation; the Author and Finisher of our faith; the Head of every man; the Heir of all things; the Faithful and True Witness; the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world; the Saviour of the world. Now, can all these titles, or any considerable number of them, and other similar ones which we might enumerate, possibly be explained in such a way as to harmonize with the idea of his defeat in the great work of salvation; or that he will save any less than the whole world; or that he will doom to interminable woe a large, or even any, portion of the human family?—We think not. Indeed, the one title, Saviour of the world, is of itself sufficient to warrant our faith. Did God intend to mislead or deceive us in bestowing such titles upon his Son? Surely not; and as surely those titles can not consist with the doctrine of endless misery.

The Scriptures expressly declare that God 'will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth,' and that he 'worketh all things after the counsel of his own will'—that he will 'gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth'—that 'unto him every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and every tongue shall confess him Lord to the glory of God the Father'—that he must reign till he hath put all things under him; that death the last enemy shall be destroyed—that he will not only destroy death, but also him that hath the power of death, that is the devil and the works of the devil—that the time shall come when there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, nor any more pain; that God shall be all in all—that Christ shall draw all men unto him, and those who come to him he will in no wise cast out—that he gave himself a ransom for all, tasted death for every man, is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by which to reconcile all things unto himself, he shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied—that the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand—that where sin abounded grace did much more abound, that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord—and finally, that ‘every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them,’ shall eventually unite in saying, ‘Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb, forever and ever.’

Beside these, and scores of other clear and unequivocal testimonies of the same import, all the precepts and principles laid down in the Gospel, such as these—“whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so them;” ‘love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, pray for them that despitefully use and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and the unjust’—‘he is kind to the unthankful and the evil;’ be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful’—‘if thine enemy hunger feed him; if he thirst, give him drink’—‘God is love—he that loveth not, knoweth not God—be kindly affectioned, one towards another—do good to all men as ye have opportunity,’ &c., &c.

Now, reader, what do these and all similar precepts mean? What do they imply? With what doctrine do they harmonize? Can they be reconciled with the doctrine of the infinite partiality and endless hatred and cruelty of God to his children, or even to his enemies? Certainly not. Do they not, on the contrary, necessarily imply the universal, endless, and changeless love and kindness of God to all mankind, and his disposition to bless and happy all? And are they not, for this very reason, the most wholesome and salutary precepts ever uttered—such as prove the salutary moral tendency and happy influence of the leading and distinctive principles of our faith?

Do you wonder, then, that we are firm believers in Universalism—that our faith grows stronger every day we live, and firmer every year that rolls over us? Would you not wonder if we could be any thing else but Universalists with such evidence before us? Great as is the number of Universalists now, and rapidly as they are increasing, we sometimes wonder, when we think of the evidences of our faith, that our numbers are not still greater, and that they do not increase more rapidly. But God’s time is the best time to convince the world; and our faith is firm that in his good time nations shall be born in a day. Let us then, one and all, trust in him, believe his word, and live the faith we profess. D. S.

Such has been—such is, the triumph of our cause. We have spoken of it hastily—imperfectly. We turn now to consider how this cause is to be carried forward, and its triumphs multiplied in time to come. This point was ably, eloquently discussed in the Annual Sermon preached at the last session of the United States Convention; but we may be permitted to direct attention to it in a few remarks.

It was said by the speaker on the occasion alluded to, that, though we were not to entirely abandon the old ground we have occupied, we could not safely and successfully make use of the same old means, and the same old measures for the advancement of our cause. Every word of this is true. The day of theological disputation and warfare has gone by; and now, amid increased and increasing light, intelligence, liberality and refinement, more is demanded of us in the commanding position we occupy than ever was demanded before. If we will not be up and doing—if we will not in this point in our progress employ other and more efficient means, we shall be outstripped in the race, and perhaps forfeit to our cause the crown of ultimate triumph.

To specify a few of the means of our future prosperity, we would say, that the friends of our cause should, to the extent of their ability, countenance and sustain an enlightened and independent Pulpit. Learning should speak these in commanding dignity and eloquent persuasion; and unaffected, heartfelt piety breathe in soft and winning accents. The same high cultivation of intellect, the same varied accomplishments, the same lofty dignity, accompanied by a loving heart and a sanctified life, should be found there as at the bar, or in our legislative assemblies.

The pulpit should be unshackled and free. To utter great truths—to lead on the mind from one degree of knowledge to another—to battle for the right, to denounce the wrong—to cry aloud against oppression—to smite upon spiritual wickedness with its stern reproofs—to warn and entreat with free, unfettered speech, is the legitimate business and office of the pulpit. It is a divinely appointed instrumentality through which the Gospel may utter itself, and the spirit and power of the words of Jesus reach and impress and sanctify the hearts of men. It should, therefore, be allowed to speak with authority and freedom. If it be denied this, it is at once shorn of its energy, influence and power; and a mighty agent in the salvation of the world deprived of vitality.

Another consideration presents itself here. We said it became the duty of the friends of our great cause to countenance and sustain an enlightened pulpit. But if it be trammelled by the dictations of worldly policy, or by the interdicts of party feeling and prejudice, or the frowning mandates of hard-faced bigotry—if it be not free to speak boldly for God and humanity, to advocate and defend all truth, and to declare itself on the side of every benevolent and Christian reform; then it must not be expected to find there the graces, accomplishments and dignity of bearing and a cultivated intellect, nor that elevation and refinement of thought and taste and feeling so necessary to give it a more commanding influence, and a mightier power. These will not be found amid the entanglements, bonds and fetters we have named. If these be laid upon the pulpit, and its sacredness be polluted by things so unholy; then will learning, and eloquence, and deep, holy feeling, seek other mediums of communication by which they may accomplish the high purposes of their divinely appointed mission, namely,—to lift up the human soul toward the zenith of its destined perfection.

We say, therefore, again, that the freedom of the pulpit should be maintained; and that, being free, it should be sought with earnest endeavor to elevate to its dignities, honors, and solemn responsibilities, such as are prepared to receive its sacred truths, and to discharge its great duties with distinguished ability and to the upbuilding of the Redeemer’s cause.

It is demanded now, as it never was demanded before, that the Gospel be preached with plainness, simplicity and power. No temporizing—no mistifying—no keeping back of great and vital truths—no timidity because of the prejudices or opinions of the great world; but the truth must be spoken, advocated and applied with all plainness, earnestness and power. We want brave, honest men in the pulpit—men with cultivated intellects, with minds enriched by the treasures of varied knowledge—men with warm and loving hearts, who will discharge fearlessly the duties of their high and responsible calling, ‘seeking for no man’s applause, and caring for no earthly reward.’—Give us such men—and we have not a few—let the friends provide for, encourage and sustain the intelligence and freedom of the pulpit, and greater triumphs will await our cause in the future than those which have gone before. This is demanded of them—let them see to it that they are faithful.

We will detain our readers a few moments longer, while we mention as another of the means for the future triumph of our cause,—a diviner life—a more entire consecration of the whole being to the services of God. We are not to rest in abstracted belief—it has always been important that we should not. We are to open our hearts to the influences of our most precious faith, and our souls to become baptized more and more with its sanctifying spirit. Onward and upward we must toil in the pathway of Christian progress, seeking, aspiring after a nearer, closer, and more uninterrupted communion with the Father of all.

Our cause contemplates the removal, not only of errors in doctrine, but errors in the heart and life—not only to bring men to a belief of the truth, but to the love and practice of it. It contemplates the ‘regeneration of individual souls,’ and the moulding of human wills into a conformity to the will of God. He, therefore, who would labor truly in this cause must labor to this end. He must seek the advancement of piety and holiness among men, and to win the erring and straying to the fold of God.—The living human soul, says Chapin, is to be explored, purified and redeemed. ‘There is the central point where truth must rest its practical axis—in those floods of passion, in those awful depths of sin, among those half-kindled, half-quenched aspirations, those capacities glorious and immortal, those contending affections—there is to be the great effort, to draw out, to develop, to harmonize, to regenerate.’

Our cause seeks this as its crowning triumph; and as we would advance this cause in the achievement of the high and noble purpose it contemplates, we must labor to the same end. But to be in the least degree successful, this work must commence with ourselves. We need first to be instructed in the school of Christ—to have sat patient learners at the feet of Jesus. We can not hope to succeed in our efforts with others, while we ourselves are inattentive to the claims of our religion upon the heart and life. It will be in vain that we urge our fellow men to be holy, when we are not holy ourselves. Truths however declared, or warnings however eloquently uttered, or invitations however warmly extended, lose all force and power if we ourselves are heeding them not.

And let it be further considered, that, any cause, however excellent of itself, will be judged of and estimated by the characters and lives of its espousers and friends. This is strictly true with reference to our own cause. However brilliant and multiplied may have been its past achievements, and however grand and glorious beyond expression may be the result at which it aims, the time has now come when if we would see it prevail yet more widely, and wielding a yet mightier influence and power, we must be living witnesses of its purity and goodness in the lives of Christian excellence we lead, and the advancement of piety we possess. A. C. B.

INDIFFERENCE.

Mankind were created in such a manner, and placed upon the world in such a situation, that none are independent, but each and all dependent upon others for support and protection. The powers of sociality which have been bestowed upon them are such, that mankind naturally form themselves into societies and communities; nations even, being only great communities governed by such social laws as the law making powers may think proper to enact. And the welfare of any society or community, must depend upon the individual conduct of its individual members. If all are governed by sentiments of integrity; if all act upon principles moral and virtuous in their nature; if all do as they would wish to be done by, and are active and industrious, then the prospect of that society will present a lovely appearance, and harmony, friendship, and love, reign supreme; bestowing numberless blessings upon the members thereof. But if the individual members of a society neglect the precepts of morality and virtue; allow themselves to be led away by the excitement of passion; and governed by selfishness alone, then strife and contention must rule and bring destruction in their train.

With these truths upon which to rest, we wish the attention of the professors of our glorious faith, while a word is said in behalf of the cause in which we are engaged. Though we may be divided into many different societies, so named, yet our denomination is one great community, and its welfare should be the object nearest the heart of the professor. Every man, it matter not what may be the sphere in which he moves, has some influence more or less, and that influence will exert its power upon others, and from others onward, until consequences of an important nature spring forth for or against the denomination. The actions of every man; his every word and deed, urge forward or retard the progress of Universalism; and in view of this responsibility resting upon the professor, every man should see to it that he walks circumspectly; in such a manner as will secure the respect of those who deem us in an error, and then his labors will not be in vain, but such as shall open the mind of the unbeliever to the light of everlasting truth. But alas! how many do we find, who are wholly indifferent, though declaring themselves adherents to our principles of religious faith. How many there are who have no care or anxiety for the credit or advancement of the doctrine which they profess. They may think, and undoubtedly they often do, that by indifference they incur no responsibility, but such is an idea delusive in its nature, and should never be entertained by a sensible man.

The Saviour while upon the world declared that he who was not for him, was against him, and that he that gathered not with him scattered abroad. One professing a belief in Universalism may do nothing for the advancement of this faith; he may never impart a portion of his earthly goods, either to support the preached word or to build places of public worship; he may aid no periodicals devoted to the inculcation and promulgation of its doctrines; and though he may never lift up his voice or hand against it, yet his very indifference will be against it, and that too with influence and power. That indifference will be remarked by the opposer, and it will be declared as a direct result of a belief in the great salvation; and many who have not sufficiently examined the subject will be made to believe that the declaration of the opponent is founded upon truth, and they will look upon Universalism as faith calculated to destroy all regard for the religious virtues. And it is a source of sorrow and lamentation that there are so many among us who manifest so much indifference! Would to God, that they would declare for some other faith, or act inore worthy of men and Christians!

Reader; are you a professed Universalist? If so, we wish to hold converse with you a while, all in friendship and good feeling of course. Do you take a periodical devoted to the illustration and defence of our principles of faith? If not, then let not another day go over your head before you are booked for some one of our papers, and when you have read it, lend it to your neighbors of a limited salvation. Do you give a portion of your earthly substance to aid in supporting the preached word? If not, what prevents you? Poverty or selfishness? If the former, you are excusable; but if the latter, you are a miserable being; and if it has not already, yet ere long selfishness will seal up all the finer feelings of your heart, and misery be the result of your avaricious disposition.—Do you attend the meetings of our order held in your town? If not, then truly you are an unworthy professor of our principles of faith and we beseech you, if you value your own religious liberty and the religious liberty of your offspring as a blessing and privilege worth preserving, do not neglect your duty. Be a regular attendant upon the services of the sanctuary; strengthen the hands of your minister; cheer the hearts of our brethren; aid in supporting our periodicals, and then your influence will be felt and acknowledged, and Universalism will flourish in loveliness and beauty.

Indifference! This is a scourge, from the affliction of which may Heaven deliver us, and the victory is ours!

ROCHESTER.

We are happy to learn that our friends in the flourishing city of Rochester, after slumbering and being without any stated and regular Universalist preaching so long, are once more arousing from their slumber, shaking themselves from the dust and in good earnest setting themselves about re-establishing stated meetings. They have lately hired a splendid and commodious Hall, commenced meetings and engaged for the present our excellent Br. G. W. Montgomery to preach to them. We welcome Br. M. back again to this State after an absence of some two years, and trust he will not soon leave us again. Our readers doubtless nearly or quite all remember him as one of the former editors of this paper, and they will expect, as he has returned into our midst, again to see occasionally the traces of his well known pen in our columns.—

Br. M., shall they not be gratified in these reasonable hopes?

We trust the good cause in Rochester will again revive under his well directed labors, and that the glory of the latter house (when it shall be built) shall far exceed that of the former. Our cause is reviving in a number of places where it has languished for a few years past.

Graham's American Monthly Magazine.

This work, for January, has been laid on our table by Mr. G. N. Beesley of this city. This is the first number of volume xxviii of this deservedly popular periodical.—The names of W. C. Bryant, H. W. Longfellow, J. Fenimore Cooper, Richard H. Dana, J. R. Lowell, E. P. Whipple, C. F. Hoffman and H. W. Herbert, in the male department, as regular contributors, are a sufficient guaranty of an exalted tone to the literary character of this work. Among the female contributors to this number, we find the names of Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, of well known celebrity, Mrs. Caroline Butler, Mrs. M. N. McDonald, and Fanny Forrester. Miss C. M. Sedgwick, Mrs. Emma C. Embury, Mrs. F. Osgood, Mrs. Seba Smith, Mrs. Mary Clavers, Mrs. Maria Brooks, Mrs. Lydia H. Sigourney, Mrs. E. F. Ellet, and several other ladies of the highest literary attainments are also named as contributors to the work. Two beautiful engravings accompany this number—one, representing Washington in command of his army at the bloody battle of Princeton; a most expressive picture—the other, a mezzotint of 'The Young Cavalier.' Each number contains 48 double columns pages, 12mo., fine clear type, and on good paper—an ornament to the centre table, or the ladies' boudoir. To be had at Beesley's at the publisher's price—25 cents per number. Two copies one year for five dollars.

Preaching and Swearing.

'Papa,' said an artless little innocent, a few Sundays ago, on returning from meeting where the clergyman had denounced the woes of endless damnation on the heads of most of his hearers, with stentorian voice and furious gestures, 'Papa, what made the minister swear so dreadfully to-day? He fairly frightened me. Was he angry? I don't like to go to meeting where the minister swears so. Don't you think there's where brother Sammy learned those bad words he used the other day?' 'Hush, hush, my child, he was preaching the Gospel.'

Reader, what kind of a Gospel was it which that minister preached? Was it that which the angels proclaimed to the shepherds—good tidings of great joy to all people? or was it another Gospel? And was not the child's question perfectly natural. 'Don't you think there's where brother Sammy learned those bad words he used the other day?'

To CORRESPONDENTS.—The poetic favors of sisters C. M. Sawyer, Z. Porter, and Lyra are all gratefully received; the former appears in this number and the latter shall soon have a place in our columns. Br. Z. Baker's are also received—and are good and shall have a place. But Br. B., our printers complain of the copy, the hand writing is so fine, and twice as many lines on a page as should be to insure correct typography. Hope you will use more paper hereafter. Br. Hammond's letter shall appear next week. C. M. K., J. A. W., and J. W. M. M. are not without their merits; and they require more pruning and alterations, than we have time, or feel authorized, to make, to fit them for our columns—we can therefore only say to them, try again. They will find some useful hints in 'Omikron's' late article.

Brs. 'M. B. S., 'J. R. J., 'E. M., 'A. C. B.' and several others are thankfully received and will find a place soon. Elder D. Holmes' article is received and shall have a place as soon as we can find room for it. ED.

In Willet, Dec. 9th, by Rev. W. Perry, Mr. FRANCIS CLOUGH to Miss ELIZA CANFIELD.

DEATHS.

In Ellisburg, Oct. 27th, of consumption, ADIGAIL A. WILLIAMS, daughter of Pardon Williams, and sister to the deceased Br. Alonzo Williams, who was a faithful minister of the Gospel of peace and reconciliation.

It is due to the memory of the deceased, to say that she was a person who was universally beloved by all with whom she was acquainted. By her upright deportment, and benevolent acts, she gained the confidence and esteem of all, both old and young. She was, in every sense of the word, a Christian. It has frequently been observed that her seat in church was never left unoccupied on any occasion. Our society has certainly lost a valuable member; she performed a useful part in our choir, and seemed to take the highest satisfaction in the services of the sanctuary. During her whole life, her mind was devoted to the subject of religion; and she has frequently said that her desire was to die young. On the night of her death she expressed her resignation to the will of God. She selected her text from Job xiv: 14, from which the writer preached a discourse to a large circle of relatives and friends, on the 29th Oct.

"SPURN NOT THE GUILTY."

Spurn not the man whose spirit feels
The curse of guilt upon him rest—
Upon whose brow the hideous seals
Of crime and infamy are prest!
Spurn not the lost one, nor, in speech
More cold and withering than despair,
Of stern, relentless vengeance preach—
For he thy lesson will not bear!

'T will rouse a demon in his heart
Which vainly thou wouldst strive to chain,
And bid a thousand furies start
To life, "which ne'er may sleep again!"
No! better from her forest-lair
The famished lioness to goad,
Than, in his guilt—remorse—despair,
With wrathful threats the sinner load!

But if a soul thou wouldst redeem,
And lead a lost one back to God,
Wouldst thou a guardian-angel seem
To one who long in guilt hath trod—
Go kindly to him—take his hand,
With gentlest words, within thine own,
And by his side, a brother, stand
Till all the demon thou dethrone.

He is a man, and he will yield,
Like snows beneath the torrid ray,
And his strong heart, though fiercely steeled,
Before the breath of love give way.
He had a mother once, and felt
A mother's kiss upon his cheek,
And at her knee at evening knelt
The prayer of innocence to speak!

A mother! ay!—and who shall say,
Tho' sunk, debased, he now may be,
That spirit may not wake to-day
Which filled him at that mother's knee?
No guilt so utter e'er became,
But 'mid it we some good might find;
And virtue, through the deepest shame,
Still feebly lights the darkest mind.

Spurn not the guilty, then, but plead
With him, in kindest, gentlest mood,
And back the lost one thou mayst lead
To God, humanity and good!
Thou art thyself but man, and thou Art weak, perchance, to fall, as he:
Then mercy to the fallen show,
That mercy may be shown to thee!

GOOD WISHES—BUT WRONG MEANS.

INTRODUCTORY.

BR. EDITOR—With your permission, I design stating a few cases, for the consideration of your readers, illustrative of the heading of this article.

Men put forth their efforts wrongfully and are astonished at their ill success. Nay, worse than this. After a few failures to realize the anticipated good—they are very apt to settle down in the conclusion that farther efforts will be alike futile, and hence give up in despair. Such has been the case with many of our friends, and such is likely to be the case again.

Wrong means are made use of to gratify good wishes, and hence the failure.

This I design to show, and thereby arouse the inactive to renewed exertion, and recall those, about to leave the field, back to the line of battle, and show how the victory may be won.

The reader may rely upon the truthfulness of the cases presented—but must be satisfied to make his own application without the assistance of names. These, it were easy for me to give, but while men are willing to practice wrongfully, they are unwilling to have that conduct published to the world with their names.

Their influences may poison the morals of their associates—sap the foundation of religion, and this they are satisfied to have the result; but the moment you talk of making their examples beacons for the good of others, they are ready to cry out, 'don't publish me.' Well, I will not publish you, but I will publish your deeds. And while I do this faithfully, I will do it in kindness, for your good.

As I weave my garments out of facts, I care less about their fashion than that it fit. I am,
UNCLE ZEKE.

THE INFLUENCE OF MIND UPON MIND IN THE FORMATION OF CHARACTER.

One can not otherwise than look with a degree of pain, many times, upon the insidious manner in which the influences of evil and corrupt association steal upon, and take possession of the minds of the young. But the remark applies not only to the young and inexperienced, but to the old and the middle aged. Men who pride themselves upon their experience, upon their philosophy, upon the rich stores of their intellectual wealth, and who, from these very possessions might exercise a mighty influence in the great world of mind, which should advance man far more rapidly in the perfection of his moral nature, not only are far from being rigid in the severity of their moral discipline, but indirectly practice a kind of loose morality which though not strictly at variance with virtue, in the common acceptance of that term, is far from being in accordance with the precepts of religion. I am led to make these remarks in consideration of the negligence, or indifference, by which the giant intellects of some men are oftentimes overshadowed. Let us suppose, for example, some individual blest by Heaven with a far exploring reach of thought, an unequalled strength of mind, and a sagacity of perception exciting the wonder and admiration of mankind. Let us suppose this individual to be thoroughly acquainted with the nature of religion, the justice of the divine commands and requirements, the volume of the Holy Scriptures, and all his obligations to himself, his fellow man, and to his God. Now, it is but reasonable to suppose that such a mind could not exist without attracting around itself, as around a common centre, as a burning nucleus, a collection of lesser luminaries, who, borrowing their light from him, catching the tone of his thoughts and opinions, should assist in sending abroad, far and wide, the fertile influences of his genius, cheering and benefitting the great moral world. Indeed, this is not a supposititious case; but is one which is, to a greater or less extent, occurring every day.

Among this class of satellites, there of course will be men of diversified minds, opinions, and sentiments; and as we all know, many times skepticism, irreligion and infidelity find place, though perhaps smothered and repressed by the general sentiments of society. Now it is not to be supposed these things, in the presence of the individual of whom we have been speaking, will dare with impunity to show their true colors, or throw aside the veil that conceals their true features. As well might the voice of man contend with the blast of the whirlwind; as well might his hand ward off the scathing lightnings, as these things to defend themselves, or receive countenance in his presence; for like the lightning and the thunder, the voice of condemnation would fall from his lips, till they would shrink from his presence, or be rebuked into eternal silence.

But we have not looked at both sides of the picture. So long as this man has no immediate occasion for the exercise of his severity; so long as these evils dare not openly declare themselves; although he knows them to exist in the bosoms of the companions of his conversational hours, and to tinge their feelings, thoughts, and actions; yet he continues to associate with them, and never to suspect, that though the greatness of his own mind may overshadow theirs, yet that there are counteracting influences at work which are constantly modifying it and bringing it in conformity to theirs. It is not possible for two streams to run side by side for any great distance, without their waters more or less commingling, and tinging each other with their hues. Now let us for a moment see in what manner some of these influences may be brought to bear upon this individual. Let us suppose that the conversation were to turn upon the nature of the soul (and here, by the way, I would remark, that these conversations upon the soul are frequently if not generally fraught with deep and lasting mischief,) and, as would be expected, many speculations would be advanced. Now this subject, as is always the case more or less, would lead to the opinions and doctrines advanced by the ancient philosophers; especially Socrates, Plato and Aristotle. I say, would lead to their opinions, for singularly enough, when these conversations on the soul are introduced, men immediately fly from the Bible, from the sublime doctrines of Jesus Christ, with as little ceremony and with a strange forgetfulness of thought, as though these two things were never heard of, or never existed; and are ready to enter, in a moment, upon any vain, idle disquisition, or imaginary speculation that heathenism and superstition, in their darkened gropings may have advanced. This is not confined entirely to indifferent minds concerning religion; but too often, to open and professing Christians. There seems to be a sort of infatuation in the sound of the names of the ancient philosophers; a sort of mysterious power, that takes possession of men's minds and inspires a vain glory to talk learnedly, whether they talk sense or nonsense. What greater or more advantageous field than this can irreligion and infidelity want to insidiously propagate their sentiments? Suggestions can be made, propositions and arguments advanced, which, without seeming to be the real sentiments and opinions of the advancer, may nevertheless be shaped as calculated to influence and carry conviction to the most powerful and obstinate mind; thus the sentiments of this individual's mind may become in a great measure, changed by the reaction of influences he may himself have assisted in creating and sustaining. Now, can that individual who has been blessed by Heaven with an overflowing richness and strength of mind, be held irresponsible for such inconsiderate trifling as this? Can he who has the power of grasping, moulding and controlling men's minds, be held unaccountable for the use he makes of that power, and the direction in which he causes those minds to operate? These are plain questions and easily answered. The voice of reason and humanity answers, No! The duty he owes to posterity answers, No! Religion answers, No! The commands of God answer, No! Then, what is the reason of this strange moral laxness and turpitude so often found on the part of the greatest and most influential men? Can it be any thing else than pride; a vain-glorious pride in talking learnedly over the unprofitable and unprolific speculations of the dreamy philosophy of by-gone days?

This is but one of the many sources of error and self-deception to which great minds are liable.—The subject is copious, but for the present this short essay may answer. If however it should be deemed necessary, or interesting, it may be continued.

THE TARDY PROGRESS OF UNIVERSALISM!

That the doctrine of universal salvation is gaining ground in the world, especially in the religious world, is unquestionable. It is doubtful however, whether the characteristic tenets of this holy and heart-cheering doctrine are advancing as rapidly as many of its warm advocates imagine, or as extensively as the well being of our race requires.—And it is more than doubtful whether the progress of this heaven-born faith, is not retarded in the world by injudicious and ill directed efforts for its propagation.

The pure, peaceable, and benevolent sentiments, which characterise this doctrine must, one would think, find a ready response in every human heart. Its perfect adaptation to the weaknesses and wants of humanity, must, as it would seem, secure for it a warm reception in every human bosom.

But I need not say that such results are far from being realized. Not only the illiterate but the learned also stand aloof from it. Not only the ignorant, the superstitious and the bigoted reject it with contempt, as a doctrine, most horrible in all its bearings; but many elevated and worthy minds see in it, or think they see, principles at war with every thing that is good and holy and desirable. The number of determined, active opposers of our faith, so greatly exceeds the number of its decided and efficient advocates, that reasoning a posteriori, or from observation merely, it would not be very unphilosophical to draw the conclusion, that this faith is not congenial to the human mind; that it embraces something repulsive to human nature. But no adherent of this faith is prepared, I suppose, to admit the truth of such a conclusion however philosophical it may appear. How does it happen, then, that a system which by us is thought to be so perfectly adapted to the circumstances and condition of our race is set at naught by so many of them? There are indeed diversities of human nature—of human intellect and temperament, sufficient to account for the diversities of hate and likings, of perception and judgment, which obtain among men with regard to many things. But a religion, to be true and useful, must provide for all these diversities.

With regard to our system of theology, if it be the true theology, the true religion, it is adapted, not to any one class of men—not to any particular variety of human condition alone, but to men universally, individually and collectively; to all men every where—adapted to the world as it is—to every grade and cast and character and condition of human beings.

How, then, is the every where existing aversion—the almost overwhelming opposition to this religion to be accounted for? I do not marvel that systems, partial, and exclusive, are not embraced by the great mass of men, for they seem neither suited nor designed for the mass. But is it not marvellous that a system of religion, the distinguishing character of which, is that it promises to redeem and save, to sanctify and bless the whole world, is yet with so few exceptions despised by the whole world? That, with a very few exceptions, it is frowned upon by all classes, by the simple and the wise, by the poor and the rich, by the vicious and by the virtuous, is undeniable. When shall we look for an explanation of this state of things?—There is, there must be something out of joint, some defect somewhere. Our system has again and again been tested by Scripture and reason; and we deem it faultless. The defect then, can not be here. Is it owing to the perversity of human nature—to the blindness and depravity of the human mind, that a religion so pure and lovely, meets with so little favor in the world? This may be, and probably is in part the difficulty: but only in part. Surely this difficulty must not be considered insurmountable: for a religion adapted to human beings must accommodate itself to, and provide for the imperfections of human beings: that is, it must encounter and overcome the perversity and blindness and depravity of the human heart. We are very ready to maintain that our religion is the only true and useful religion in the world, and we claim for it a power adequate to the salvation of the world.

Why then, in our hands, is it so inefficient?—Why do we not more effectually commend it to the approbation of the world? If our want of success in this matter is not to be charged to our injudicious and ill directed efforts, I must leave it to some one of greater discernment to ascertain what it is to be charged to. But if we have any reason to conclude that the tardy progress of our cause, is owing in whole or in part, to our indiscretion or to our remissness, to our exertions or to our want of exertion, let us see to it, and speedily remove every hindrance. There can be no doubt but that the progress of our cause would be accelerated if the culpable indolence and supine indifference so prevalent among us were removed; but inaction is not the only nor the principal impediment. Though much may be done, and ought to be done, to explain, and illustrate, and especially to exemplify the excellences of our system by those who profess it; yet such is the inherent energy, the intrinsic power of this religion, that it must and will work its way into the hearts of men unaided by human effort. Work its way, less speedily it may be, but not less effectually. The anxious solicitude to aid its diffusion manifested by many, is most certainly to be commended; it is noble, it is praiseworthy, and we would wish there were more of this feeling among us: still solicitude without discretion, like zeal without knowledge, is ever to be deprecated; it is more likely to work injury than benefit to any cause. Purity of motive in all our arts may secure a 'conscience void of offence';—but it can not alone secure the desired results. It is certainly extraordinary praise of any one to say, 'he never meant any harm,' but more extraordinary still is the praise, if it can be said, 'he never did any harm.' The spirit manifested, the measures pursued, by some of the advocates of our cause, which, to me, appear to be reprehensible, might be specified, were it deemed advisable, but anxious that these general remarks, if they do no good, shall do no harm, I leave them to find their own application. GOOD WISHES—BUT WRONG MEANS....NO. 1.

Mr. A. and Mr. B. are both wealthy men, not mere worth a few thousand dollars but many tens of thousands a piece. Some 12 years ago, in the time of strong religious excitement, they put means enough together to build a church, and a Universalist house was accordingly erected. After the formality of a dedication, a preacher was settled in due time, and prosperity for a while seemed to attend them. But time brings its changes, and another preacher was settled, and another and another, until some 8 or 9 in succession at different intervals had 'sown the seed,' but never realized a 'harvest.' In this time, the steps of the house had rotted down—the walls were gray and dusty—a fair sample of the state of the society.

Now why was this? I will endeavor to tell.—

A few months since, I was travelling through the country, and put up for the night in the neighborhood. Measurably, a stranger, and having no disposition to 'cousin it,' I went to the tavern—the traveler's home.

A number of neighbors being in, I had a good opportunity of learning the situation of the society, and the cause of its death; for as a society it was literally dead. Mr. A. like a wise man, had set down and counted the cost of the house in dollars and cents, but there was one estimate he never made. He had never calculated on his influence in filling that house after it was erected. He was punctual in attending meetings—paid liberally for its support—manifested a strong regard for the cause—was legally honest in his deal—temperate in his habits, and on the whole, a very good man.

Yet he had a fault; albeit, it is common to the age. His propensities took the lead of his sentiments, and self became the centre of thought.

Friend and foe, alike saw that Mammon received six offerings, where God received one, and the houseless and homeless felt, that under his protection the longer they toiled, the poorer they grew. Would they attend meeting with him? No. The marks of the miser's fingers were upon them, and though he paid the preacher as he boasted, they could not banish the thought of how he obtained the means!! Water and oil, will not mix—the spirit of God and Mammon do not coalesce: and thus we see how wrong means, fail to secure good wishes, and result in the death of societies.

Now did A. live his doctrine as faithfully as he preaches it, he might ere this have had a society there, strong in the might of the Lord, and able to triumph over all opposition.

But he carried the evidence with him wherever he went, that the spirit of the Lord, was none of his, and in vain will Satan rebuke sin.

THE ERA AND PERSON OF JOB.

Few subjects have more puzzled critics than the so called Book of Job. The designation should be received only in so far as the subject of its contents is concerned. The design and composition of the poem* are so peculiar, that no hint can be found by which to trace out the origin of the book or its author; hence every man is left to form his own judgment of the book and its author and times.—This being the case, we can say, as did young Elisha, who is reported as saying, 'great men are not always wise.....I also will show mine opinion.'

I. The era of Job is, by many who hold to the reality of his person or existence, referred to patriarchal and even ante-patriarchal times. Townsend, his excellent arrangement of the Bible after Lightfoot's chronicle, places the book immediately after the families of Noah and before the birth of Abraham. This is a great stretch of credulity, as it remains to be determined whether alphabetic writing existed till long after Moses; and the oral transmission of such a poem for a long period, could not be satisfactorily proved. Some think Moses wrote the book. We have never esteemed authorship so highly in his day as some; and material for paper, suppose alphabetic writing a previous invention, could not have been very plenty in Arabia. The etymology of the Hebrew word for book, to write &c., as also the Arabic, would incline one to believe that writing was done on some hard durable substance, by scratching or scraping certain characteristic signs of a hieroglyphic character which will not admit of a very elaborate composition. Solomon is by many accredited this work, because his proverbs contain similar maxims and expressions. This is true to a considerable extent.† The same can be said of the Psalms and many of the prophets, particularly Jeremiah. Which is the more probable, that all these drew from Job without credit, or that the author of Job drew from these sources? It did not become him in such a work to refer to authorities. It seems strange if such a historical character as the real person of Job would be, did really, and at an early period, exist, that he is not more-frequently named, or rather that he is not named at all, till the times of the last captivity.—Ez. xiv. 14, 20. Even here, so far from considering him a companion of Noah or of the ancients, he is in each instance named after Daniel; a circumstance which none of the critics have noticed, though it is one of considerable importance in fixing the time of the book. The philosophy of the book can not be referred to any period earlier in the history of the Hebrews.

* Besides a prologue and brief epilogue, it is a sort of dramatic poem, or tragedy, like those of Sophocles. The Septuagint has a supplement in which it is affirmed to be translated from Syriac, and that Job lived in Ausitis, bordering upon Idumea and Arabia; and mention is made of his marriage with an Arabian woman; the names of his father and mother are given; the former of the children of Esau; the latter the fifth from Abraham. He is also represented as a sort of imperial personage in Edom, and the kings he governed are named in person, as also the friends who came to him and their residences; all of whom, it would seem, are of Ishmaelitic origin. See the LXX, version Bagster's Ed. (Best) page 262, or von Ess. 574.

We have for many years paid particular attention to the Book of Job. In all these investigations, no particular bias has been on the mind; and the conclusion to which our mind has come is, that the book itself did not appear till the Chaldaean era of Hebrew literature;—though the tradition of the existence of a Job might have been in vogue during the captivity, and made a lesson for the groaning sons of Jacob in their servitude. We do not recollect as Josephus ever speaks of the book, or a Job. How can this be, if he really was?

II. This brings us to notice the reality of such a person. So far as the design and composition of such a work is requisite, there is no more need of supposing such a character really was, than that the subjects of parables, tales, plays or comedies are real. The book is the same, its principles are as good, as if the characters were real. Besides the references of Jones v. 11, and the Latin Vulgate of Tobit, ii. 12, (The LXX and Eng. version have no such allusion,) can be explained in the same way, as we refer to the Rich man and Lazarus, Prodigal Son, Ten Virgins, &c. It was the idea and not the person referred to that was sought.

The work is of a class with Ecclesiastes in the philosophic conception of Providence, though the books look not, as from their design they should not, upon it in the same aspect. If Job was taken for a consolatory lesson to the Hebrews in their adversity, and made to represent the nation, the book is a historical fiction, and closely follows the model upon which it is based. Further, if this opinion is well founded, the book is more easy of explanation than usually supposed; especially if we do not cast off as spurious the prologue and epilogue.

We must not mistake, however, and suppose the character given Job in the prose prologue his real one, further than his own estimation of himself.—('Righteous in his own eyes.' xxii. 1.) Job's repentance and return to God's illy agrees with the usual character given him before his troubles.—The conclusion of our own mind is, that no such historical person as Job in the book of this name, ever existed, but that the writer created his hero, and the subsidiary characters that appear in the book, and carried him through a series of trials to convince him that in his riches and power he had (unconsciously he is willing to allow) forgotten God; and to bring him back by repentance, it was necessary that he should become humbled; for a man in his state can hardly be brought to repentance as the Saviour allows. Riches choke the word.—After a series of afflictions and expostulations during all which time Job esteems himself righteous, the Lord takes the matter in hand, and Job is humbled, reforms, and his prosperity returns.

This work is a sublime conception, and highly useful to all who understand it. It is of universal application, though the theology is superceded like all the older writings, by the Gospel of Christ.

THE CHRISTIAN SELF-DEFENCE.

The spirit of the Gospel has no fellowship with the principle of 'an eye for an eye,' 'a tooth for a tooth,' 'life for life;' but it directs us to 'resist not evil,' to retaliate not, to 'overcome evil with good.' There is also a truism abroad in the world, which declares that 'self-defence is the first law of nature.' The Gospel in no wise contradicts this law, but it points out the true manner by which it may be observed. It directs us to love our enemy, and do him good; for by so doing we heap coals of fire on his head, which in the end penetrate and warm his heart. This is the true mode of self-defence. It does more than resist an attack when made; it prevents the attack being made—and of course is the safest method of self-protection.

Have you not seen the instance, reader, of a good man having passed through life without an enemy, with whom none presumed to seek a quarrel, and who never had a law turmoil in the world? The instances, I acknowledge, are rare; but such instances do exist. If a man insults him, he passes it by in silence; and the insult is not repeated.—If wrong is done him, he returns it by doing good; and thus gains a most glorious triumph. The virtuous honor him, the vicious turn from him, and the meek follow his example. Such a man evinces the true spirit of the Gospel, and overcomes evil with good.

It requires a strong moral integrity, and firm presence of mind, and a constant command of feeling,—in short, it requires the spirit of the Gospel of Jesus Christ,—to enable a person to practice always the true system of self-defence. Temptation to anger comes without any forewarning; and a person is then easily thrown off his guard. A man may resolve to be as calm and firm while passion rages around, as the majestic mountain oak which towers above the storm; yet before he is aware, if he be not really Christ-like in soul, the tempter leads him captive at his will; and afterward, bitter remorse preys upon his wounded spirit. It requires, therefore, the constant presence of the Gospel spirit, to enable a person to practice the true system of self-defence,—that of rendering good for evil.

But does it never happen, that a man is required to defend himself by force, by physical power, by exercise of the principle of retaliation? If the good man were struck to the earth by a robber, would he not be justified in defending himself by taking the robber's life? In the estimation of human law, he undoubtedly would; but I think the requirement of the moral law would be, that he should defend himself, if possible, without turning aggressor and destroying his assailant. I know the natural impulse of passion would be, that he should do as he was about to be done by—that he should take the man's life who was about to take his; but I apprehend, if the calm and deliberate spirit of Christ were there, the sword would be plunged into its sheath, and the head would not be struck off, when striking down the hand would do. Let the principle of rendering good for evil, be observed in this case; and while the person assailed would be rendered safe, by an exercise of physical power, the assailant would be secured from doing further harm, and at length subdued from sin by the embers of kindness upon his heart.

I regard the rule of turning, when smitten upon one cheek, the other to the hand of the smiter, as having especial reference to the ordinary affairs of social life, rather than to extreme cases of personal safety and danger. In social life, there can be no doubt, the Gospel principle, 'render good for evil,' is the safest and the best. In every case it preserves one of the parties from guilt; and if it will not preserve him from injury, and restore the other to virtue, no principle under heaven will. And in extreme cases of personal danger, the soul should be rendered steadfast by the Gospel spirit; when, if so great an exercise of physical power is necessary, in self-defence, as to destroy the life of the aggressor, the destruction of life would not have been the object of its exercise, and he who wielded that power would not be guilty of death. In such a case, there could be no departure from the Christian spirit. But suppose that the true Christian be assailed, and his life immediately destroyed—what then? Why, the Christian spirit triumphs in his death; he has only done what his duty demanded and what thousands have done, who were weak in body but strong in spirit,—fallen a martyr in defence and illustration of the spirit of his religion; and whoever else may be guilty, his soul is as pure as the light emanating from God's throne.—From what has been said, therefore, I infer, that true self-defence consists not in retaliation, but in a strict adherence to the Gospel principle, 'render good for evil.'

LETTER FROM ELDER D. HOLMES.

REV. D. SKINNER—Will you allow me to occupy a small space in the Magazine and Advocate? My object is not controversy, but the correction of the mistakes (unintentional I am willing to believe) and consequent misrepresentations of your editorial of Dec. 5th, respecting my discourse on Universalism, entitled, 'A House upon the sand.' Should you, upon the receipt of this, decide against doing me this act of justice, you will oblige me by returning it by mail, at your earliest convenience.

In that editorial you represent, that Mr. T. 'is a young man,' in comparison with myself, and that the contest was unequal on that account—that I 'exact-ed unequal and unfair terms of publication for my sermon—that I 'dare not grapple with' Universalism 'on equal terms'—and finally, that I only published a 'meagre synopsis' of Mr. Taintor's sermon, following it with my long reply. To all this I reply: first as to the age of Mr. T. though not particularly informed, I suppose him to be full five years older than myself. (a) But this is nothing to the purpose. I was not attracted by the preacher, but the sermon. I never saw Mr. T. until the hour I heard him deliver his sermon; and the only reason why I selected his discourse as the subject of review, was, that it was the only one delivered on the occasion, that pretended to sustain its positions by argument. The following language in the 'preface' to my pamphlet would have set you right had you taken pains to refer to it. 'The discourse of Mr. T. is only considered worthy of notice, in so far as it embraces the fundamental principles of Universalism: and it is believed that the propositions considered in the following pages constitute the main 'pillars' of this theory. In refuting these propositions therefore, not only is Mr. T. answered, but the whole system of Universalism overturned.' (b)

(a) Having never been personally acquainted with Br. T. we can not contradict Mr. H. But from the fact that he was not yet formally in fellowship as a preacher of the denomination, and we had never heard of him till recently, and moreover that he followed secular employment for the most part, we inferred that he was a young man.—But let that pass: as Mr. H. says, 'this is nothing to the purpose.'

(b) Yes, Mr. H. if you had refuted Br. T.'s propositions, touching the final destiny of man; but unfortunately for your argument, they remain untouched.

† See Prov. xxviii. 2, i. 7, xxvi. 6, xv. 11, xlii. 5, xvii. 28, xxvii. 16, 17, xxviii. 8, xx. 7, x. 7, and others. So Ecclesiastes; but it is evident that Solomon did not write this book, so we need not no reference to it here.

‡ De Wette, Section 291, Vol. 2, page 569, note says 'the language has a strong tendency to the later Chaldaean Hebrew,' and refers to words in xvi. 19, xiv. 20, xvi. 14, ii. 10, xlii. 28, xxvi. 9, xxi. 21, xlii. 3, vii. 3, xviii. 2, xli. 4, xxi. 12.

As to my having 'exact'-ed unfair terms of publication, it is so far from being true, that I never 'exact-ed' any terms at all, or even sought the publication of my discourse in any Universalist paper. I did indeed consent, upon the urgent request of Mr. Brown, that it should be published, and even proposed, if it could be published in pamphlet form, in connection with the sermon of Mr. T. that I would bear my share of the expense of publication. (e) But to this Mr. B. objected, and preferred that the sermons should go to Utica. Well, they went to Utica. I only reserving the right to reply in 'equal space' to any strictures that might be made. (d)

As to the length of the sermon, it is no fault of mine. I never sought room in your paper for either a long or short sermon. Mr. B., Mr. T., and the other Universalists who seemed interested in obtaining its publication, knew the length of it before they asked a copy for your paper. Why were they so anxious to obtain it, if it was too long and it would be 'unfair for Universalism' to admit it to your columns, &c.—1. The sermon, long as it was, was sought for your paper, without any objection as to its length. (e) 2. It is denied a place in your columns on account of its length. (f) And 3, I am blamed for exact-ing terms unfair for Universalism. (g) A strange conclusion, for so specious a beginning! The proposition you made to obviate the difficulty you seemed to discover in the length of the document, and to make the terms fair for Universalism, has at least the merit of being characteristic. It is in substance as follows: viz.—you agree to publish, according to Mr. B.'s agreement with me—providing I will allow some reviewer to make such comments upon the sermon and its author, as may suit his taste, (without the privilege of reply on my part) until his strictures, together with Mr. T.'s sermon shall be equal in length to mine—then, after that, I might reply to any thing that should be written, in equal space. (h) &c. Wonderful generosity! But suppose no one had been disposed to enter the list, after all this had taken place? what then? (i) Why nothing, only I allowed myself and my sermon to be the subject of criticism, and perhaps ridicule to the amount of eight or ten columns, and have no remedy, that is all.

Whether I was afraid to 'grapple with Universalism on equal terms,' I leave your readers to judge, after perusing the following statement of facts.

1. The Universalists were permitted to occupy the Methodist house of worship in Groton, to hold an Association—and Mr. T. was granted the privilege of reading his sermon twice, (the second time

(c) That would have been about three fourths of the expense, according to the relative length of the sermons. Did you offer to be at three fourths the expense?

(d) Yes, Mr. H. after you had first occupied three times the room of the Universalists, you would then be willing to divide the remainder of the room equally!—Very fair!

(e) Not by us or any connected with the paper.

(f) Not so, but because we were prohibited from replying to or reviewing it in equal space.

(g) No, Mr. H., not strictly speaking, for exact-ing terms, if you did not, propose the publication, but for interposing conditions of its publication unfair for Universalism.

(h) Not so, Mr. H. You have not honestly, or if so, certainly not correctly stated the case or our terms. Our terms were that after publishing your sermon and Mr. T.'s, the Universalists should 'occupy as much space in reply as will, together with Mr. T.'s sermon, be equal to the space occupied by Mr. H., and then subsequently each party occupy equal space, not exceeding two or three columns at once.'

(i) You would have had the privilege of replying to the reviewer, as a matter of course; according to the terms proposed, and if no Universalist had seen fit to rejoin, it would have been evidence that were we disposed to let our cause go by default. But you need have had no such fears, if you had furnished any argument on your side.

at his own request,) from the same pulpit, to as many as chose to hear—but my reply to him was only delivered once. (k)

2. When Mr. B. suggested the idea of publishing the sermons, I gave my consent—and proposed to bear my share of the expense of publishing in pamphlet form. (l)

3. When Mr. B. objected to this arrangement—and made a formal request, I granted him a copy for your paper, only reserving the right to reply to strictures in equal space. (m)

4. After your refusal to publish—and I had made arrangements to publish it myself, in reply to certain propositions from Mr. T., I informed him of my readiness to meet him, Mr. B. or Mr. C., in a public debate on the two main propositions of his sermon: and upon his declining the acceptance of the challenge, I farther notified him of my readiness to sustain my views in opposition to the above named propositions, in a written controversy with any respectable Universalist preacher in the wide world. These proposals have not yet been withdrawn. (n)

As to the 'meagre synopsis' of Mr. T.'s sermon published in the front of my pamphlet, it will be enough to remark:

1. It is all I ever had of Mr. T.'s sermon in my possession. I should have published more, and probably the whole, if it had been in my hands. (o)

2. I was under no obligation to publish any portion of it, especially, after you had refused to publish mine, according to the request, and under an agreement made by your own brethren.

In conclusion, permit me to say, I have read the remarks of A. C. B. And were I permitted to occupy your columns in reply, I should not deem it worth my while to do so. Such logic can never impose on men of sense. Moreover, as the reviewer aims his strictures at the author, full as much as at his production, and as he has brought to his aid, sarcasm, ridicule, and personal abuse—any reply from me would require a species of self-degradation, which I can not consent to incur. (p)

Yours with respect,

D. HOLMES.

Groton, Dec. 22, '45.

(k) All this was right, fair and liberal. We wish such instances of liberality were more frequent than they are. Universalists have often done the same for Methodists and others.

(l) In reference to this, we refer our readers to Br. Taintor's letter, published in this paper of Dec. 19th by which it seems Mr. H. declined uniting with Br. T. in publishing in pamphlet form, each occupying equal space and bearing half the expense. We doubt not Mr. H. would have united if he could have occupied three fourths of the pamphlet and Br. T. borne half the expense. This, in his estimation, would have been equal and fair!

(m) That is, after you had first occupied nearly three times the space of your opponent!

(n) We doubt not, now Elder H.'s challenge is published and known, that some of the Universalist preachers in or near his region will be ready to meet him, in either written or oral debate. The only ground on which we can suppose any of them might decline would be, the apprehension, from the weakness of his late publication, that he was incompetent to defend his own faith, or make any respectable resistance to ours. But perhaps his 'House upon the sand,' was intended as a lure or decoy, and his great strength is all reserved for a future and more serious contest. We shall see.

(o) Why then did you refuse to publish the passages of Scripture referred to in his synopsis, when he especially requested you to do so? Were you fearful they would refute your own discourse?

(p) We have seen nothing in Br. A. C. B.'s review which favors in the least of personal abuse of Elder H. If, in the review, he makes the Elder appear rather ridiculous, it must be attributed to the truly ridiculous positions and arguments Elder H. employs, rather than any efforts of Br. B. at ridicule. This being the case we see not that Elder H. really has any thing to complain of but his own pamphlet. We should be loath to own such a child. It dishonors its parent.

ANOTHER CHALLENGE—WHO ACCEPTS?

Br. SKINNER—The Rev. Mr. Conklin, (New School Presbyterian) of Warsaw, (County seat of this Co.) has frequently expressed a willingness to enter into a thorough discussion of Universalism as a system of faith.

I called on him a few days since to ascertain if he was willing to discuss on honorable terms. He says he is ready to meet any clergyman having the confidence of the Universalist denomination. He named Revs. S. R. Smith, J. M. Austin, T. J. Sawyer, G. W. Montgomery, and D. Skinner.

He says he is willing to discuss in Buffalo, Rochester, Batavia, or any of the cities or large villages in Western N. Y., where the subject has not been discussed. He wishes the discussion to continue 4—6 or 7 days, or until the subject is fairly canvassed. He says he will propose the questions himself, subject to amendment, or his opponent may present such propositions as will involve a discussion of the most prominent doctrines of Universalism. He will defend the doctrine of the trinity, vicarious atonement, and the existence of a personal devil that was once an angel of light—the endless duration of punishment—take the negative of the question, will all men finally become holy and happy—and discuss the moral tendency of Universalism. He is considered an able controversialist, a sound logician, a gentleman and scholar. I am credibly informed that Mr. Conklin has been preparing for a discussion of this character for ten years. He is publishing this winter a work on Baptism, the materials of which he has been collecting for fourteen years. Proposals for a discussion were made to S. R. Smith, last spring, but he declined on account of his health, so Mr. Conklin told me. I have talked with several of our preachers in whose judgment I place confidence, and they think I had better write to you, and leave it at your disposal. Should such a discussion take place, and could it be reported and published in the Magazine and Advocate, I doubt not it would materially increase its circulation and interest.

Should it not be convenient for you to meet him, perhaps you had better place this in the hands of Brother Austin, or some one else, and let them make their propositions through the Magazine and Advocate, or if they should wish to correspond with Mr. Conklin, his address is Warsaw, Wyoming Co., N. Y.

Yours, &c.,

H. JORDAN.

REMARKS.—We lay the subject above introduced, before the public that the wishes of the Rev. Mr. C. may be fairly understood, and his claims to notice investigated. If Br. H. J. has fairly stated the case (though we are unacquainted either with our correspondent or Mr. Conklin) we doubt not he can be gratified with some one to meet him in discussion.

SKETCH.

I came to my native village. I sat down by the fountain where I sat in my childhood. The wind whistled in bleak murmurs through the grove, and my heart was sad; I drank of the waters of its fountains, but its sweetness had flown, and the stealing tear dropped from my dim eye. I beheld a maiden—she was lovely; but I could not be glad. 'Where (said I,) is Mary of the dark and smiling eye? She who once glided through these vallies? She was fair. Dark was her hair as the plumage of the raven's wings, and floated on the morning breeze as yon wild waving trees nod to the winds.' 'Mary was fair, (said the maiden,) but she sleeps beyond that silent mound, where the dark grass waves. The Autumn winds have scattered the promises of the fair Spring upon her tomb. The cypress shades the place of her rest—but she went to the earth alone: no kind hand scattered flowers upon her lonely bed. Her lover went forth to war; and she faded in death. His name appeared first and brightest among the warriors of his country—he toiled in the battle's front, and was dear to his kinsmen—his name was dreaded by his foes—but she was at rest! The clarion of war sounded victory—he left the clamor of battle; and came to the grove where he pledged his vows. Peace and honor had gilded his banner, but the dream of his earthly love had vanished as the unseen wind. Soon did he sleep in the arms of death. The thistle nods over his resting place, and his ear drinks not of the sound of the trumpet, or the clattering of the war hoof. Peace is with his ashes—he hath passed away and my soul is sad!'

TRULY ELOQUENT.

Washingtonianism has given birth to as brilliant specimens of true eloquence as heart could desire. Witness the following touching appeal to young men, made by an aged man, at a recent temperance jubilee at New Market, N. H.

'I have come twelve miles to attend this meeting; yet I do not value my time; I feel rewarded in what I see around me. My friends, I have seen more of the world than most of you. I have trod the proud streets of London, and the winds of distant India have fanned these furrowed cheeks of mine. My keel has been upon every sea and my name upon every tongue. Heaven blest me with one of the best of wives—and my children—oh, why should I speak of them? My home was once a paradise. But I bowed like a brute, to the killing cup—my eldest son tore himself from his deranged father, and has never returned. My young heart's idol—my beloved and suffering wife—has gone, broken-hearted to the grave. And my lovely daughter, whose image I seem to see in the beautiful around me—once my pride and my hope—pined away in sorrow and mourning, because her father was a drunkard, and now sleeps by her mother's side. But I still live to tell the history of my shame, and ruin of my family. I still live and stand here before you to offer up my heart's fervent gratitude to my heavenly Father, that I have been snatched from the brink of a drunkard's grave. And while I live I shall struggle to restore my wandering brethren again to the bosom of society. This form of mine is bending and wasting under the weight of years. But my young friends, you are just blooming into life—the places of your fathers and mothers will soon be vacant. See that you come up to fill them with pure hearts and anointed lips! Bind the blessed pledge firmly to your hearts, and be it the Shibboleth of life's welfare!'

CHOICE OF PROFESSIONS.

When a youth leaves school, or completes his college course, his education is not completed—he has only laid the foundation upon which he is afterwards to rear the superstructure of his fame and fortune. He has still to go through another course of education. If he have to depend upon himself to make his way in life, he has to choose some trade, occupation or profession. As in this country there are very few who have not to labor in some way; if he do not employ his hand in rough and toilsome labor, he must work with his good right hand.

One of the most important considerations, then, which should occupy a young man when he is about to prepare himself for the active duties of life, is the choice of a trade, pursuit or profession, which is best suited to his genius and capacity; but in nothing are large numbers more completely mistaken. We know something of this from personal experience; had our capacity and inclination been consulted, we would never have been placed behind a counter; but circumstances controlled inclination, and thus it may be with others. Many, however, who are left free to choose, enter upon the study of law and medicine, or engage in merchandise, who are far better qualified to handle the plough. In the fancied superiority of these over all other pursuits, they entirely overlook those for which they are fitted, and hence comparatively few succeed.

It has often been a matter of surprise to us that so many men who have been brought up in the country, should abandon their own 'vine and fig tree,' for the precarious business of merchandise, or the equally precarious professions of law and medicine. Agriculture, when properly attended to, if it do not lead to splendid fortunes, affords the means of independence, while success, in the other professions is uncertain. Both the professions of law and medicine are overstocked. Our medical colleges furnish M. D.'s by thousands every year, and lawyers are manufactured with as little trouble. It is true some make hits, but where one succeeds fifty fail; where one acquires distinction fifty drag on a weary life—a life almost without hope.

In too many cases many enter these professions from a mistaken appreciation of their own talents; many from a foolish pride—from a foolish notion that a practical farmer, or a practical mechanic is less respectable in society; they should recollect that

Honor and shame from no condition rise,
Act well your part, there all the honor lies.'

WOMAN.

Great indeed is the task assigned to woman; who can elevate its dignity? Not to make laws, not to lead armies, not to govern empires; but to form those by whom laws are made, armies led, and empires governed; to guard against the slightest taint of bodily infirmity the frail yet spotless creature whose moral no less than physical being must be derived from her; to inspire those principles, to inculcate those doctrines, to animate those sentiments which generations yet unborn and nations yet uncivilized shall learn to bless; to soften firmness into mercy and chasten honor into refinement; to exalt generosity into virtue; by a soothing care to allay the anguish of the body and the far worse anguish of the mind; by her tenderness to disarm passion; by her purity to triumph over sense; to cheer the scholar sinking under his toil; to console the statesman for the ingratitude of a mistaken people; to be compensation for friends that are perfidious, for happiness that has passed away. Such is her vocation. The couch of the deserted friend, the cross of the rejected Saviour—these are theatres on which her greatest triumphs have been achieved. Such is her destiny; to visit the forsaken, to attend the neglected; when monarch's abandon, when counsellors betray, when justice prosecutes, when brethren and disciples flee, to remain unshaken and unchanged and exhibit in this lower world a type of that love, pure, constant, and ineffable, which in another world we are taught to believe, is the test of virtue.—[Blackwood's Magazine.]

THE SUN AND THE ICICLE.

Lotan was a Jew, living in captivity. His nation was scattered abroad to the four winds of heaven, and he and his family were exiled from their sunny home on the banks of Jordan, to the cold snows of the North. Poverty and persecution pursued them still. Man as well as nature was unkind.

Lotan mourned as one without hope. Love softened, but could not un rivet his shackles. Day by day the iron entered his heart deeper and deeper.

On the bright morning in November, Lotan sat in sadness and grief by his friends. The heavens were 'fretted with the golden fire' of the rising sun. And the icy forests flashed and quivered with a thousand tremulous rays of silver light. A bird, beguiled by the pomp and tranquility of the morning, sat in the garden hedge and swelled her little throat with a hymn to the Almighty, and waked the echoes of nature's solitude, and filled the chambers of the human bosom with glad harmony. But Lotan brooded over his exile and was exceeding sorrowful. The splendor and glorious majesty of the rising king of day communicated no delight. The silent sympathy of Adah, his wife, and the happy prattle of his children, soothed not his chafed spirit.

He thought of his home in the holy land. He remembered the cave in the hill side where his father and mother slept with their fathers. Oh, bitter, bitter exile from those dear scenes of his youthful love!

Lotan repined, and forgot his blessings enjoyed and preserved, in the recollection of his blessings lost. An unholy wish struggled in the depths of his heart, and came into being, like a bubble shooting up from the dark sea. He breathed a silent curse against his enemies, and his countenance darkened with the mingling lines of wrath and grief.

But his eye caught a slender icicle pendant from the lower roof, and glistening pure and keenly in the sun-beam. An image of happy home in the far East, mused the exile. So bright were the joyful hopes that clustered around our little circle, so pure was our love, so calm was the heavens of that blessed home. 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'

The day advanced and the sun poured forth an atmosphere of light, and warmth, and love. When suddenly the icicle was loosened from its frail hold, and was dashed in pieces on the icy pavement beneath the window.

A tear started to Lotan's eye, and his wild thoughts were stilled. I will mourn no more, said he. The little icicle teaches me wisdom, submission. It has perished, but not without cause. The universal sun, that fills the world with beauty and gladness has destroyed it. What carries life to millions, causes death to one. I will weep no more. My home is overwhelmed in the convulsions of the world, and we are cast on this desolate coast, shipwrecked in the world-storm. But the Judge of all the earth does right. His winds and lightnings wreck the lone vessel, but they give fresh life and elasticity to the all-surrounding air. The dark world will be enlightened by the children of God, banished from their Holy Home and wandering in exile. 'The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice, let the multitude of isles thereof be glad.'

And Lotan bowed himself in prayer, and when he arose the wrath and the sorrow had departed, and his eye was calm, and he looked on his wife and little ones, and his heart yearned toward them.

A WELL DRAWN CONCLUSION.—Abulleda, the Arabian philosopher of the desert, being asked how he came to know there was a God? 'In the same way,' said he, 'as I know by the prints that are made in the sand, whether a man or a beast has passed before me. Do not,' he added, 'the heavens by the splendor of the stars; the world, by the immensity of its extent; and the sea by the infinity of the waves that it rolls, sufficiently make known the power and the greatness of their author?'

At New London, Conn., the following inscription is found on a grave stone. The records of ancient Rome or Greece do not exhibit a nobler instance of patriotism:—

'On the 30th of October, 1782, 4000 Englishmen fell upon the town with fire and sword. 700 Americans defended the fort for a whole day; but in the evening about 4 o'clock it was taken. The commander of the besieged delivered up his sword to an Englishman, who immediately stabbed him. All his comrades were put to the sword. A line of powder was then laid from the magazine of the fort to the sea, there to be lighted, thus to blow the fortress into the air. William Hotman who lay not far distant, by three strokes of a bayonet in his body, beheld it, and said to one of his wounded friends who was still alive: 'We will endeavor to crawl to this line, and will completely wet the powder with our blood, and thus will we with the little life that still remains to us, save the fort and magazine and perhaps a few of our comrades who are only wounded!' He alone had strength enough to accomplish this noble design. In his 30th year he died on the powder which he overflowed with his blood. His friends and seven of his wounded companions by that means had their lives preserved.'

After this narrative are the following words in large characters:

'HERE RESTS WILLIAM HOTMAN.'

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 9, 1846.

APPROXIMATION TO UNITARIANISM.

For a month or two past, we have occasionally heard the remark—apparently made in all simplicity and sincerity—that Universalists were fast approaching towards Unitarianism. Knowing as we do, the relative position of the two denominations, we were at a loss to conjecture the origin of such a statement. And it was not until a few days since, when a friend put into our hands the 'Christian Register' of Oct. 4, 1845—that we learned the source of this extraordinary assertion. In an editorial of that date, and of course from the pen of Mr. Upham—(will our good Br. Austin excuse us)—under the head 'Universalist Denomination'—we have the identical assertion in so many words. After giving an account of the meeting of the Universalist General Convention in Boston, in September, among several kind things, he says:—'Just views of a future righteous retribution are prevailing among them. They regard us with respect and confidence, and are advancing rapidly towards an agreement with us in all essential matters of doctrine and sentiment.' Such is the authority for this extraordinary sentiment.

That Universalists, as a denomination, entertain 'just views' of the righteous retributions of God's moral government, there is no good reason to doubt. But it is by no means true, that any important or even visible change has taken place among them in this respect, during the last thirty years. Individual cases may perhaps be produced, in which partial modifications of opinion on this, and other subjects, have taken place—but the general views of the denomination respecting rewards and punishments remain unchanged.

But the important particular in the above extract, is the assertion, that we are making rapid advances towards Unitarianism, in 'all the essential matters of doctrine and sentiment.' Such an assertion, it will be found, is much easier made than sustained. Let the following facts be considered, and it will appear in what direction the approximation proceeds.

1. As far as the doctrine of the divine unity is concerned, it was distinctly maintained by Universalists a quarter of a century before New England Unitarianism was known to the American public. It will not therefore be pretended, that we have made any advances in relation to this particular.

2. The doctrine of vicarious atonement, with all its concomitants, was rejected by Universalists, long before the existence of a Unitarian society, as such, on the continent. Here, then, we have made no advances towards Unitarianism.

3. The doctrine of the innate and total moral depravity of man, was also rejected by Universalists, many years before Unitarianism had a name among the sects of our country. We have not therefore approached them so far as this item is concerned.

4. Universalists have steadily maintained and publicly vindicated the proper paternity of God, much longer than Unitarianism has had a separate existence among us.—Hence we have certainly learned nothing from them on this subject.

5. On the score of vital piety and practical morality, while neither sect has any thing to boast of, it is presumed that Unitarians will not claim that we have acquired any thing at their hands.—But in personal zeal and manly fidelity to truth under all circumstances of praise or blame, all the world will admit that we are far enough from making any approaches to Unitarians.

6. In our endeavors to elevate the character of our ministry by a better theological education, we are no more approaching the Unitarians in the essentials of doctrine and sentiment, than we are the Catholics or Presbyterians. And it will not be supposed that we have any special sympathies for either of those denominations.

With these facts before us—and they will apply to every distinguishing doctrine and sentiment of the two parties—where is the evidence that Universalists are rapidly advancing towards Unitarianism? There is no such evidence, and its assertion is alike absurd and ridiculous.

But the cool assurance with which the Editor of the 'Register' makes the assertion in this instance, demands a passing notice. Some persons have an amazing talent at talking big—consequently—and who from habit seem at length to think that they are entitled to do so with impunity—if not as a matter of right. But we ask very seriously—by what right or rule of courtesy, Unitarians venture to talk and write so patronizingly of Universalists? We are by no means their juniors, and do not particularly feel the need of their counsel. Again, we are both rational and liberal Christians, in every sense to which they can make any pretensions—and in some to which they have not yet aspired; and we are not likely to make further progress in these matters by any encouragement which it is in their power or capacity to give. And certainly our numbers and power, do not authorize the belief that we stand in need of their special patronage. However this may be, we have managed to get along thus far, without their aid, or even their charitable wishes.

In conclusion—This extract from the 'Register,' reminds us of the fly upon the chariot wheel—who as he rolled along over the beaten high-way, and heard much noise and saw but dimly through the clouds of dust—supposed himself the author of all the uproar, and called out lustily to a neighbor fly, saying—'see what a dust I raise!' Such are the assumptions of Unitarianism.

THE ANNIHILATIONIST.

The man who believes in annihilation, destruction, or that death is the end of mankind, is one whose situation can give him but little joy or pleasure, especially when his reflections are upon the frailty of human nature, the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death. He wanders over the world with a mind harassed with doubts and fears, and a deep seated sorrow in his heart. He is a being to be pitied. His situation should, and does call up the deep sympathy from the pious and religious soul, for his days must be days of sadness and distress. To him, how dark and dreary must be many hours. Seeing no evidences around him, of a future state of being; looking into the grave and saying within himself: 'Soon must this silent and lonely abode be my dwelling place; soon must I lie down here, my body food for worms and here my everlasting home!' Heaven deliver us from such a belief, for the very thought does but sicken the soul; and yet here is but a part of the sorrow following from this gloomy faith.

There are those around the unbeliever, whose hearts are bound to his by the strong cords of love and affection. Those with whom he has travelled a long way. Those with whom he has held many hours of sweet and joyous communion. Those who are endeared to him by the strongest sympathies binding man to man upon the earth. Yet like himself, they too are mortal. They can not remain always to cheer him in his lonely hours, or to rejoice with him in the day of prosperity. They are passing away. When one nears the silent sepulchre, about to pass away from the walks of earth, how dreadful the thought which comes over the mind of the believer in the cheerless doctrine of annihilation. It is even like the death chill. That thought speaks with a voice startling and wild itself; a separation for ever! never shall that friend be met with again either in time or eternity.

Death of itself, is sufficiently sorrowful. That our friends must leave us, or we leave them, and go through that dark and lonely valley, is a thought of sufficient sadness; for it is the breaking up of seasons of the most happy and pleasurable enjoyment; the severing of ties tender and endearing; the bidding adieu to joys hallowed and dear to the heart. But that we are not to meet again, beyond the shadow of death is a thought of tenfold more sorrow than that of dying. Ah! the sorrows, the woes, the griefs of the Annihilationist; none but one who has thus regarded man, can comprehend! 'No faith to speak rest to his weary soul; to bring the calm of quietude around his mind; fearful of death and its consequent eternal unconsciousness, a deep mental anguish must embitter every enjoyment afforded him by those things which a benevolent God has created and placed within his reach.

While we deplore the miseries of such an one; while the emotions of sympathy should arise in the heart of every Christian, because of the sorrows around the believer in annihilation; while every one should endeavor to break the gloomy spell which is around him, yet let us all be truly thankful for the better faith which we possess; our gratitude to God should be unbounded for that faith, in a future life so heavenly, and which contributes so much, to our present enjoyment. It opens upon our view a clime of immortal joys; a blissful home for the weary and care-worn pilgrim, afar from the sorrows and trials of the world. And this faith let us cherish until our bodies go down to the slumbering tomb, and our spirits wing their flight to the immediate presence of God! S. J. G.

DOCTOR OF DIVINITY.

Our readers are aware that the above title was recently conferred by Harvard University on one of our most distinguished brethren in the ministry in Massachusetts.—Since then the subject has been somewhat agitated and discussed in several of our Eastern papers. A writer in the Trumpet proposed several other brethren as suitable candidates for the degree; and our good friend 'Corporal Streeter,' editor of one of the Boston Dailies, took him off in fine musical style. Father Balfour, one of the individuals proposed for the honor of the degree, came out straight as an arrow against it, declining it altogether before it was tendered to him, and giving some hard shots to such kind of honors. Now we have very little to say on the subject, and care as little about it, one way or the other, so far as others are concerned; and as for ourselves, if we thought there were any danger of its being tendered, we would, like father Balfour, decline it before-hand. But as there can be no possible danger, we should only make ourselves ridiculous by so doing.

We see no great good or harm the degree can do a good man, or a good preacher. It simply shows in what estimation he and his talents and acquirements are held by the officers of the college or institution granting it.—But we do not believe it will make a wise man out of a blockhead, nor that the addition of D. D. to a minister's name, will make him in reality any more of a Doctor of Divinity than he was before. We introduced the subject just for the purpose of letting our readers see what others think of the matter. The following brief article from the 'Gospel Banner' will show the opinions of Brs. Drew and Balfour: and probably a majority of our ministering brethren will side with them in opinion. D. S.

'THE DOCTORATE.—Some writer in the Trumpet a few weeks ago, (Br. W. Goodrich we suppose,) nominated to Cambridge College, Brs. W. Balfour, L. R. Paige, S. R. Smith and T. J. Sawyer, as suitable persons to have the degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred upon them. In reply to this, Br. Balfour has addressed a long letter to the Trumpet, utterly declining even the thought of such a man-made honor. He says:

'For myself I relinquish, and forever disclaim, having any part or lot in such honors, until the following things are satisfactorily proved. 1. That the precepts or examples of Jesus Christ or his apostles authorizes us to be dubbed a Doctor of Divinity. But where shall I find such authority in the Bible? There is no precept for it, nor do we ever read of Dr. Jesus, Dr. Christ, or of Dr. Paul or of Dr. Peter. It is enough that the servant be as his master; and enough that I be a follower of Paul, as he was of Christ. I have never heard it asserted that D. D. and the other claimed titles had such an honorable origin. It is admitted they came from a very different quarter, against which Universalists have long and loudly declaimed. I deem it safest for me to abide by Scripture authority, for if I begin to depart from it, I know not how far from it I may be led astray.

We care not how learned our ministry may be, the more learned the better; but we should like to have it to say that ours was the first learned ministry that had not a single D. D. in it, or no higher title than that of Brother.—[Banner.]

A VAIN CALL.

In the Magazine and Advocate of the 19th ult., there is a communication from Elbridge, N. Y., in relation to a discourse delivered in that place, on 'the end of the world.' The article is signed 'Inquirers,' and comes from several members of the Presbyterian congregation in Elbridge. It is addressed to 'The Doctors, Professors, and Students of the Theological Seminary at Auburn,' and calls upon them to state whether the exposition I gave of the phrase 'end of the world,' is correct or not.

This is a vain call. It will receive no response. These members of the Presbyterian congregation at Elbridge, should have known the Doctors and Professors of the Auburn Theological Seminary better, than to imagine they would respond to this call. These reverend divines will undoubtedly consider the questions impertinent—absolutely saucy. It is bad enough to be questioned and hounded by inquisitive Universalists; but to be brought to the public bar, and 'cross questioned,' and called upon for 'more light,' by Presbyterians themselves, is an unheard of, and dangerous movement, which can not be countenanced for a moment. What! Has it really come to this pass, that Doctors of Divinity, and Professors of Theology, are to have their constructions of the Bible, called in question before the public, by those whose teachers they are! Are they thus to be catechised by meddlesome laymen! This can not be tolerated—it is setting a dangerous example! If these questions are noticed and answered, a thousand more will come pouring in, to puzzle and torment them! And so these grave Theologians will preserve a dignified silence!!

Do not the Presbyterian laymen of Elbridge know that the policy adopted by the partialist priesthood of this day, is to keep the people in darkness in relation to the true meaning of every passage of Scripture which militates against their creeds? They are determined to prevent the light which is pouring in floods upon the world in regard to Scripture phraseology, from the minds of their people. Their effort is to make their hearers cling pertinaciously to obsolete and erroneous constructions of Scripture which originated in dark and ignorant ages, and which have long since been exploded wherever a single ray of the light of the age has fallen. To the partialist clergy, this is a serious matter. They well know that to allow the knowledge which is spreading abroad on Biblical language, to enter the understandings of their people, would be instant death to their darkened creeds. Hence this must be prevented in all possible ways. And hence also, they strive to keep the faces of their denomination turned toward the darkness of the past, rather than to the light of the present!

This phrase, sunteleia tou aionos, rendered in the New Testament, 'the end of the world,' is a case in point.—The clergy of the popular sects have for ages been teaching the people, that this phrase signified the end of the material world!—the burning up of the earth, and the day of judgment. There never was a greater mistake made in the construction of language. I challenge any man to bring a passage in the Bible, where this phrase teaches the end of the material world! The merest tyro among those who avail themselves of the Biblical light now within the reach of all, well understands this phraseology.

The more enlightened portion of the popular ministry, are perfectly well aware, that the proper interpretation of sunteleia tou aionos, is 'the end of the age'—i. e. of the Jewish age or dispensation: 'They know the most learned commentators of all denominations, with the utmost unanimity, give this as the rendering of these Greek words. But when have they ever told their people so? When have they allowed one ray of the light which is in their own minds on this subject, to fall into the minds of those who look to them for instruction? When have they told them a tithe of what they know themselves, in regard to the original words translated hell—devil—judgment—forever—eternal?

It is high time the people of the partialist sects should understand that their ministers know more on these subjects, than they are willing to communicate to them! It is time they understand that their clergy are striving knowingly and deliberately, to keep them in the dark in regard to these, and other important words and passages in the Scriptures! What man of independence when once convinced of this, will longer put any confidence in their instructions? Let the Presbyterians, and members of other sects, imitate the example of their brethren at Elbridge. Let them step aside from the clouded night-track in which their teachers would still continue to lead them, and seek light for themselves! They will soon discover that they have been in the deepest darkness in relation to some of the most valuable and interesting portions of the Bible! Let inquiry go forward. Truth can never be injured by investigation. Nothing can be injured but error, and the knowing and wilful abettors of error.

Sabbath School Exhibition.

The Sabbath School attached to the Universalist society in Auburn, gave a public Exhibition, on Christmas Eve. The exercises were of a diversified character, consisting of poems, dialogues, orations, odes, &c. These exercises were interspersed with singing by the children of the school. The ages of the scholars who took part, ranged from three to sixteen years. The Exhibition gave great satisfaction to those in attendance, and I trust, awakened and strengthened their interest in the Sabbath School cause. The house was well filled with an attentive audience; and the avails of the Exhibition was about $35. The money thus obtained, will be devoted to the enlargement of the Sabbath School Library. J. M. THANKS.

We can do no less than express our heart-felt gratitude and thanks to our friends, one and all who have recently, and so kindly come to our aid. Letter after letter comes to hand with 'a happy New Year,' and an indubitable proof of the sincerity of the wish, in the shape of a list of subscribers names and the money enclosed.

Each one seems to have an awakened interest in the welfare of the Magazine and Advocate. Regrets are expressed that it should have been suffered to become so limited in circulation, and all concur in saying that it ought not and must not be discontinued, that it must be sustained.

We are rejoiced moreover to say that those friends not only say that it must be sustained, but they do the very thing which will sustain it. We received several promises and pledges of assistance previous to the close of the last volume, and those pledges have been nobly redeemed. It will be remembered by those who received the last volume, that we published the letter of one of our ministering brethren, pledging himself to furnish us a 'baker's dozen.'

He has more than doubly redeemed his promise. Others have done equally well, and have shown what may be done by a little exertion. All have cheered us, not only with kind words and wishes but by actions that 'speak louder than words.' We think we may safely say that our list will be nearly doubled, and with this assurance, and the bright hopes that are consequently awakened within us, we feel impelled to renewed exertions to give our patrons a 'feast of fat things full of marrow' the coming year. If each and all can continue their efforts to increase the circulation of the paper, thereby we trust, increasing not only our benefit but the welfare and happiness of their neighbors, friends and fellow beings around them; we shall be made grateful and glad in more than one respect.

For the kindness already manifested then, brethren, may God bless you—may the ensuing year be a happier one to you than previous ones have been—may you receive in their full fruition, the fruits of that faith, which alone can bring peace and joy to the troubled soul. So mote it be.

CATHOLIC LIBERALITY.

The Calocagathian Society of St. Mary's College (Catholic) at Baltimore have elected Rev. J. Shrigley (Universalist) an honorary member of their body by a unanimous vote. We believe this is the first instance of a Protestant clergyman being elected a member of that, or any other similar Catholic society. The letter from R. B. Sutton, Cor. Secretary, to Br. Shrigley informing him of his election, compliments him very highly for his eloquence and the enthusiasm which he was elected. Br. S. in a letter to the Christian Messenger says, 'Is there a Methodist, Presbyterian or Episcopalian College in the United States that would permit a Universalist clergyman to be elected an honorary member of any literary Association under their influence? I have never yet heard of any such manifestations of liberality and Christianity by either of the three sects above named, and until I do, I must abide by the conclusion to which I have already come, that the Catholics are more liberal and tolerant than any Protestant partialist sect in existence. Honor to whom honor is due.'

MOBILE.

By a letter in a late number of the Christian Messenger from Br. I. D. Williamson, we learn that he is again at Mobile preaching the Gospel of universal grace to the people of the South; and on account of his state of health (an asthmatic complaint) will probably remain there.—The Church that his friends lately purchased and paid for was found to have a prior claim on it to that of the society of which it was purchased; and the 'uncertain law' has decided that the claim is good. Hence our friends have got it to pay for again before their title will be good. Well, Br. W. says the money, some $3000.00 is mostly raised for the purpose, and thinks the Universalists will still secure by again buying the house. We hope so.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—The Universalists of Cleveland have recently purchased a large two story brick edifice commenced for a Methodist church. But as the Methodists were unable to finish or pay for it, the Universalists have purchased, and are preparing it as a commodious place of worship for themselves. We hope they will soon complete and long enjoy it as their sanctuary.

THE GOSPEL TEACHER, devoted to the Sabbath School cause, has just closed its first half year of Vol. 7. It is published in Boston by Br. J. M. Usher, and edited by Br. J. G. Adams assisted by Br. G. DEDICATION.—The new Universalist church recently erected at Exeter, N. H., was dedicated to the purposes of Divine worship on the 18th ult. Sermon by Br. H. Jewell. Br. H. G. Anderson is now ministering to the society in Exeter, and represents the occasion as a joyful one and the house splendid and commodious and the society prosperous.

PROFANITY.—He who takes the name of God in vain insults his Father and offends all his children who truly venerate the Author of their being. Moreover, he practices a sin which can neither do him nor any body else any good; if hungry, it can not feed him; if thirsty, it can not give him drink; if naked, it can not clothe him. What good then can it do? What temptation can there be to the practice of profanity? D. S.

The WESTERN LUMINARY has just entered on its fifth volume, with a new heading, and thus far improved in appearance. SUBSCRIBERS

Please read the following instructions from the Post Master General:—

'Money may be left with a Post Master, in no instance exceeding ten dollars, for the purpose of being paid to distant publishers, if said publishers shall so desire, for any newspaper or pamphlet, deliverable from his office. The Post Master may retain one per cent, and give his receipt for the balance. He is immediately to report the payment with the names of the parties, to the Post Master through whom said amount is to be paid to the publisher, and to charge himself upon his 'general account with the United States' with the amount received, deducting the one per cent. under the head of 'moneys received for subscriptions,' stating the name of the payer, the name of the payee, office where payable, amount, and time when received, and shall make a full and faithful return to the General Post Office of all such cases at the end of each quarter. When presented, the Post Master at the office where payable, is to pay the amount in said receipt, deducting one per cent., which receipt, after being endorsed by the publisher, he will forward as his voucher of payment.'

Now Read This.

It is at the option of the Post Masters to attend to the above instructions or not, as they please—they are not obliged to do so. The Post Master at this place, (Utica) declines paying these orders, or issuing any. Therefore it will be useless for subscribers to endeavor to pay us their subscriptions in that way. Indeed we think our Post Master quite justifiable in paying no attention to such instructions. It makes him a great deal of trouble in keeping a long account of small items, for very small pay. It is of no advantage to the subscriber; for in order to secure the payment of his subscription to the publisher, he must take a receipt of the Post Master when he pays the money, enclose it in a letter to the publisher, pay the postage on his letter, while the same letter would just as well have taken the money as the receipt, thereby saving the publisher the trouble of running to the post office to present said receipt, as well as a discount of two per cent. on the money. We see no sort of benefit in this permit, if we may so call it, except to obviate the risk of sending the money by mail, and there is very little risk in doing that if the money is properly enclosed. A. W.

SPIRITUAL BANKRUPTCY.

Br. Rogers in his late 'Memoranda,' speaks of being violently attacked by a New Light preacher, at the close of an evening meeting at Clear Spring, who 'upon two points was sure,' says Br. R. 'that he could hem me in past escape.' After disposing of the first point he thus proceeds.

'His second dilemma was based on the case of the servant, in the gospel, who was cast by his offended Lord into prison until he should pay the uttermost farthing. 'But,' demanded my querist—who assumed the applicability of the case to the future state of sinners in general—'but as he 'had nothing wherewith to pay,' how is he ever to discharge that debt and get out of hell?'

'He must take the benefit of the insolvent act,' answered I.

'Can you point to me any such act,' he demanded, 'in the Gospel economy?'

'Assuredly I can, my friend,' was my reply, 'and here it is: 'All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; being justified FREELY by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.' Here, I think, is an act of universal absoluteness from a condition of universal insolvency; an absoluteness co-extensive with the indebtedness of our whole race.' It were strange, indeed—think you not so, reader?—if the statutes of heaven were less benevolently considerate of human incapacity than are the laws of man!'

Br. Tompkins—Br. Wm. M. DeLong of Binghamton, N. Y., says you may set him down for four copies of the Quarterly.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach at Mechanics' Hall in this city next Sunday.

CONFERENCE AT HOMER.—A Conference of the Cayuga Association of Universalists, will be holden in the Universalist church in the village of Homer, Cortland county, on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in January, 1846; for the purpose of organizing a Missionary Society, on a plan similar to that established in the Chenango Association, unless some better plan should be presented at the time. All societies within our bounds, are requested to send delegates—and it is desired, that those towns where no societies are in existence, if they contain but one believer in Universalism, should be represented either by delegate or letter. It is also particularly requested, that all our ministering brethren belonging in the Cayuga Association should be in attendance on that occasion—and we shall also greet with a hearty welcome, all who shall visit us from other Associations, to aid us by their counsel and cheer us by their presence. Br. T. J. Goodrich, is, I believe, pledged to be present with us; and we trust that others who are not pledged, will be equally faithful in attending. Public exercises will be held in the church, during Wednesday, Wednesday evening, and Thursday.

H. L. HAYWARD.

CONFERENCE.—A Conference of the Black River Association, has been appointed at the village of Mexico, Oswego county, on Wednesday and Thursday, January 14th and 15th, which will be during the week in which a public discussion has been agreed upon at that place.

DEATHS.

ANOTHER LABORER IN THE GOSPEL MINISTRY 'GATHERED UNTO HIS FATHERS.'—At his late residence in Ellisburg, Jefferson county, on the 14th ult., Rev. OLIVER WILCOX, aged 40 years. Br. W. was a man whom the great Author of nature endowed with physical, moral, and intellectual energy sufficient to rise from obscurity into distinction, and even eminence; and the God of all grace richly endowed him with the influence of his spirit, and the power of his truth and love, that he might become an able minister of the New Testament. He possessed an unblemished character and inflexible integrity. Whatever he thought to be his duty, he desired and delighted to do it. For about 15 years his labors in the ministry have been indefatigable, and for a few years past were probably excessive, to the injury of his strong physical frame. He has left a companion and nine minor children, in narrow circumstances, to mourn their loss. His funeral was numerously attended by friends and acquaintances, and a discourse delivered by the writer of this notice, who was assisted in the public services by Brs. Persons and Rice.

In this world of imperfection, toil, care, pain and change, who among us shall first follow our departed brother to a 'far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory?'—[Luminary. P. MORSE.

In Scipio, Dec. 20th, 1845, Miss ELIZABETH VAN LIEW, aged about 21 years. Her disease was the consumption.—She was a person of very amiable disposition, and shared largely in the affections of the whole community, as was abundantly manifested on the day of her funeral. The church on that occasion was crowded to its fullest capacity, by a deeply affected audience, to whom the writer 'preached Jesus and the resurrection.'

At the time our Sabbath school was organized, in the fall of 1844, the deceased presented herself as a teacher; and continued to discharge, in a most faithful and profitable manner, the duties of her station, until sickness deprived her of the pleasure of meeting with us. Long after she was too feeble to spend the day at church, she would come in the morning, remain through the exercises of the school, and then return home to rest. She was also a beloved and prominent member of our choir, and her voice, inspired by a kind heart and a cheerful faith, made melody to the Lord. Very affecting indeed was the scene, when the remaining members of the choir, came in a body, to take a last look at the cold features of her, whose voice had so often mingled with theirs in sacred song. Not soon will our beloved sister be forgotten by any who knew her in life. The members of the choir and the Sabbath school particularly, will long cherish the memory of their friend and companion, who has gone before them 'where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest.'

THE POWER OF FAITH.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

When shall I leave this vale of tears,
Cast of the weight of grief and years,
And ever freely rove
Through those fair mansions of my God,
The spirit's beautiful abode
Of holiness and love?

O! why should ever death look grim?
Faith gives me power to welcome him,
As I would greet a friend,
What joy the full assurance gives
To know that my Redeemer lives,
Whose love shall never end!

Though death's domains are dark and cold,
I shall my Father's courts behold,
Where all is light and life;
Angels will meet and guide me through
The regions of ethereal blue,
From every earthly strife.

How bright were this terrestrial sphere,
Had evil never entered here,
And marred its beauties all?
But grace o'er sin shall much abound,
Salvation!—oh the rapturous sound,
A world redeemed from thrall!

Thanks to the Universal King!
In life and death his praises sing,
And his abounding grace,
For he assuages all our woes,
And sweet parental care bestows
Upon our feeble race!

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A PREACHER....NO. 2.

Once on a time, as stories generally begin, I was journeying from Bridgewater to Cazenovia, in the State of New York. On my passage I overtook a weary footman, who requested a seat in my wagon. His request was cheerfully granted, and by mutual consent, we were soon engaged in social chat upon matters and things in general. By and by, our conversation took a religious turn, and we were soon at issue upon many points of theology. I soon discovered however, that he was more of a wag than philosopher or theologian, for if he failed in argument, he never failed in wit. At length he seemed rather inclined to dismiss the subject, and remarked as follows.—“I am not much of a theologian—indeed I have but little religion, and I have sometimes thought, that what little I have got, is a damage to me.”

Reader, did you ever think of that? It came from as genuine a wag as you can find in the Empire State—but notwithstanding all that, there may be truth in it. What! says the reader, religion a damage to a man—how can that be? Reader, will you lend me your attention while I ask you a few questions? Undoubtedly you will, for I take it for granted, you are pleasant—good humored—accommodating man. Do you ask me why, I have formed so favorable an opinion of you? My answer is—you read the Magazine and Advocate undoubtedly—and he who can read that sheet one year, and not be a pleasant, good humored, accommodating man, must have been far removed from a good man in the commencement. But it may be after all, the writer is mistaken all round. You may not be the man I think you to be. You may not read the Magazine, only as you borrow it now and then. If such is the fact, and such your unfortunate situation—just let me whisper in your ear—subscribe for the Magazine, man. Read it attentively one year—and if, at the conclusion of that time, you are not what I supposed you to be in the commencement of my talk—drop me a line; and I'll prescribe again.

Reader, we will suppose you to be a religious man. And now to my questions. Does your religion fill your head with partial views of God and his government? Does it induce you to believe that he loves his friends, and hates his enemies—that he will bless those who bless him, and curse those who curse him? If such is the spirit of your religion—my word for it—and the word of God which is far better,—your religion is a damage to you. Has your religion induced you to deal in hard words, bitter invectives, and ungenerous insinuations? Has it taught you to call some brother of an other faith—Deist—Atheist, because he differs from you in some points? Has it caused you to pick up, and circulate every little story that evil men have invented, to traduce the character of an opponent? If so, your religion is a damage to you—and a curse to the world. Mother, are you bending over the lifeless remains of your beloved offspring?—did he die without the pale of your church? and does your religion teach you that before his body is in the grave, his soul will be in hell? Oh, Mother, Mother; renounce and denounce that religion—for it is a libel upon the character of God—a curse to you, and a damage to all who embrace it. ‘A word to the wise.’

REFLECTIONS ON A FORMER ARTICLE.

Mr. SKINNER—Dear Sir: In the 47th No. 16th vol. of the Magazine and Advocate, I read an article taken from the New York Observer, over the signature of a ‘Country Pastor,’ and your comments on it, which have awakened some reflections in my mind on the subject therein discussed, viz: the propriety—or as the Pastor would have it, impropriety—of youths reading the works of somewhat liberal authors. I send you a few crude remarks, which you may publish if you think proper, and perhaps you will think proper to comment on my article, as you have on his, in order to point out to the public, the rock on the one hand, as you have the whirlpool on the other. I propose to advocate the affirmative side of the question—Ought youth to be allowed to read and hear the opinions of others, fully, freely, and candidly expressed in chaste and decorous language, on both sides of all subjects relating to their well being and happiness. In matters of law—legislation—politics, and all the ordinary concerns of life, the absurdity of a negative answer would be so glaring, that any one would make himself perfectly ridiculous, who should undertake to sustain it. The question then, seems to be confined to religious subjects only. I shall endeavor to be very brief: occupying but little of your valuable space. That truth is good—productive of happiness—and that falsehood is evil, and productive of opposite consequences; is but the veriest axiom or truism. Equally plain and simple, appears to me the answer to the question—is truth best elicited, by an exparty investigation and advocacy of any matter? These short sentences seem to me to cover the whole ground, and establish triumphantly the affirmative of the question. But as the Country Pastor, and probably millions of others, would still insist on the soundness of the negative; we will assume, or presume, some of their reasons and consider them.

The Pastor, &c., would no doubt assume the ground, that youth would be led into falsehood, and into licentiousness by such freedom of discussion and investigation.

First, then, of falsehood—how led into falsehood? By and through the total depravity of their vile natures? I contend that it is as natural for men to prefer truth to falsehood, as it is to prefer good to evil, in any moral or physical matter whatever; and that there is no such propensity, or inclination in man, as to wish to be deceived, or to embrace a falsehood in preference to truth. Further—if public sentiment would permit—and such freedom of discussion were now to be instituted; would not the advantage be found infinitely against liberal sentiments, though the almost universal forestalment of the prejudices, and prepossessions of the people, by this exparty system? and also, through the equally universal odium, thrown by the same instrumentality, upon every thing of the character of liberal opinions? Is it not easy to see, that the laboring oar would be cast upon the liberal party, and that the difficulty of being believed when they spoke of the truth, would be with them? How then by possibility, would falsehood be propagated from this side? The idea that falsehood would be promoted by a free and candid hearing of both sides of the question—and that truth would be best established by an exparty hearing—is alone worthy of priestcraft, which would seek to hold an arbitrary supervision and control over the minds—the consciences—the beliefs—and actions of men, for its own supposed advantage; and more particularly so, over those of youth with whom its efforts tell to such infinite extent.

Next of licentiousness—and for arguments sake we will admit, that youth would be led into more liberal sentiments by and through this freedom of investigation; and perhaps become more licentious. Two questions here present themselves, at whose door lies the fault? And what is the cure? We have shown (at least to our own satisfaction) that youth would not be thus led beyond the precincts of truth; and if in emerging from error to truth, and from mental bondage to liberty, they should be guilty of some excesses of liberty, which is licentiousness, where shall we find the cause? The matter may be exemplified by the case of a man suffering severely with hunger; when he comes within reach of food, it is difficult to restrain him from excess. Now what is the remedy; shall we continue the starvation for fear of the excess? Or shall we feed him with suitable food, and instruct him that the consequences of excess, are destructive to his happiness? Do we not thus see that the inclination to excess is caused by the starvation, not the feeding—by an unjust—unrighteous restraint from liberty and knowledge, those immense sources of happiness, and not by the obtainment? And that the cure is instruction in the knowledge of what constitutes our true happiness? E. M.

REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS.

The doctrine of rewards and punishments is as clearly set forth in the Christian Scriptures as any sentiment on record. We see this written frequently on the pages of both the Old and New Testament.

No sentiment is more clearly taught than that 'he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons.' Col. iii: 25. This is as it should be with regard to human governments and administrations. There should be no respect of persons, but he that doeth wrong should receive for the wrong which he had done. And I see not why this is not consistent with the divine administrations. Who can object to the wholesome sentiment that virtue should be rewarded, and vice punished? All would seem to answer: 'no one.' Yet strange as it may seem there are thousands who labor, and toil, and spend their days mainly for the very purpose of doing away this just and wholesome administration: at least, they labor to enforce the hypothesis that such an administration is contrary to the principles of the Divine administration. Why is this so? The voice of inspiration is explicit on this point. It declares that 'though hand join in hand the wicked shall not be unpunished.' Prov. xi: 21. 'Say ye to the righteous it shall be well with him; but unto the wicked, it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him.' Isaiah iii: 10, 11.

'Great peace have they that love God's law and nothing shall offend them.' Psalm cxix: 165. But 'the wicked are like the troubled sea that can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace saith my God, to the wicked.' Isaiah lvii: 20, 21. And why should it not be so? If it were not, man might sin with impunity, regardless of the sanctions of heaven's best and holiest laws. If it were not so, man would have no incentives to obedience and happiness, and no dissuaves from vice and misery. If it were not so, man might expect a reward of good for disobedience, and also a recompense of evil for obedience and well doing. Would this be right, to punish the righteous and reward the wicked? All would answer no. All would see at once the inconsistency of such an administration.

But what system of theology is it that attributes just such an administration to the Divine being? Reader: you need not go far to ascertain this.—Who is it that preaches an escape from just and deserved punishments? And how often have you been told that this way of escape was the only plan of salvation through Jesus Christ—nay; that this was the very Gospel itself—that all mankind in consequence of the lapse of Adam deserved endless punishment, and that the only way that any could be saved would be by saving them from that which they justly deserved—that they, the wicked, may escape; but if so, their substitute the innocent Son of God must suffer what they, the guilty deserved? Is this the doctrine of rewards and punishments? Nay, this is a perversion of it. The language of Scripture on this point is: 'I will punish the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity.' Isaiah xlii: 11. But if God does this according to the theory under consideration, he can not save an individual of the human family. For if he saves them he can not punish them as they deserve; and if he punishes them as they deserve, he can not save them. Salvation is inconsistent with just punishment, and just punishment is inconsistent with salvation—if this is so, how then can the doctrine of rewards and punishments be maintained?

If those who are saved, are not punished for their sins in this world, nor in the future, how can these passages of Scripture be true which declare that God 'will render to every man according to his deeds,' and that every transgression and disobedience, shall receive a just recompense of reward?—All such passages are false, if this theory be true.

The Bible uniformly declares that mankind shall be punished according to their wickedness. If this is so, it is right and just that a just punishment should be administered to them. If it is right and just that a just punishment should be administered to them, it is not just and right to suffer them to escape such punishment, or save them from it. This being the sentiment of the Bible and also a wholesome common sense sentiment, why should a different sentiment be taught, and enforced, and insisted upon with so much tenacity? But so it is.—This is the employment—the duty—the all absorbing interest of the modern Christian. Nay, it is deemed the sine qua non of vital Christianity to save man from a just and deserved punishment—to save him from that which the Bible declares he shall not be saved from—but shall surely receive.

Now it is easy to perceive that that religion which is diametrically opposed to the uniform testimony of the Scriptures can not be of God. No truth is more clearly settled than this.

But where are such sentiments taught—sentiments so opposed to the Scriptures? We might ask where can we go and not find them? Take up a religious tract—peruse its pages—this is its very theme. Take any religious book or publication of the Orthodox stamp, so called, it is the Alpha and Omega of such publication. Go into any of the Evangelical churches, so called, and here it will be the all pervading, all absorbing theme. The zeal of each church will be directed to this one thing, viz: to save mankind from a just and deserved punishment. To save the wicked from that which the Bible declares they shall in no wise escape. 'Though hand join in hand the wicked shall not be unpunished.' Now is not this warring with the Bible? Most certainly it is. And yet notwithstanding this ungodly warfare, it is still persisted in as the vital, all absorbing principle of Christianity.

They tell us the sinner deserves endless punishment, and that God's law requires that it should be inflicted—that it is right and just that it should be inflicted; and yet they are working with all their might to prevent that which is just and right from taking place! They are exerting themselves to screen the wicked from that which is just and right—and from that which they justly deserve.

More than this, they tell us that God is engaged in the same work—that He is endeavoring to save them from that which they justly deserve—from that which his law requires—from that which his justice requires—that He has given his Son for this purpose, viz: to save them from just and deserved punishment. They tell us this was the object of his mission unto the world, viz: to save them from that which the law requires. Is not this, to destroy the law? But Christ says, 'I came not to destroy the law—but to fulfil. The Bible no where recognizes the sentiment that man shall escape a just punishment for sin. It no where recognizes a salvation from just and deserved punishment.

The doctrine of the Bible is a forgiveness of sin, not of punishment. It is very explicit on this point. To clear the guilty without administering to them a just punishment would be to suffer them to sin with impunity. Hence, the Bible testimony is 'forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty.' That all are guilty the Bible plainly declares. 'Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law, that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God.' Rom. iii: 19. Those guilty ones God will BY NO MEANS clear, without administering to them a just recompense of reward. 'Unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy; for thou renderest unto every man according to his work.' Psalms lxii: 12.

IS GOD IMPARTIAL.

'Let but such a pestilent doctrine be admitted as that the divine favor is bestowed not merely in disregard of virtue, but in contempt of it, and then religion, with all its power, goes over to swell the torrent of impurity, enmity, and malice.'—ISAAC TAYLOR'S 'Fanaticism.'

It is a prophetic truth, and proven by experience, that every man will walk in the name of his God. And if his Deity does not take cognizance of good and evil—reward virtue and punish vice, and deal out justice on the principle of merit—if he bestows blessing and sends cursing upon mankind irrespective of individual character, the worshipper will become thus reckless. And surely no doctrine could be propagated more detrimental to the morals of community, than that the Almighty, whom Christians acknowledge as the only Supreme, in his dealing with his children of earth, bestows his blessings and sends evils upon them irrespective of their moral characters.

That our God is impartial is true. That he bestows blessings upon the human family 'without partiality,' is a truth taught by nature and revelation. But there is another truth that should not be overlooked in this connection, viz:—All men do not receive these blessings in equal proportions, because they do not obey the laws which communicate these blessings to individual characters.—God sends his rains and snows upon the earth by continued operations of his laws, yet all fields of the same texture of soil do not yield the same amount of grain, from the fact that all fields are not equally cultivated. The same law, it is believed, will hold good in the moral world. All men, in proportion to their several capacities, do not enjoy the same amount of blessings within their reach, because they do not obey the laws, obedience to which, communicates these blessings to the soul.

Distinctions should be kept before the mind, between the temporal and spiritual blessings of the Almighty, and the obedience to certain requirements which enables individuals to receive these blessings. A man may have one of the most productive lots of land, (if properly cultivated,) and yet it may yield the most meagre crops of grain; and the reason is obvious. The mariner whose moral character is as black as the pirate Gibbs, by obeying the laws of navigation, and securing at his outfit a strong ship and abundant provision, would be able to bid defiance to the ocean's rolling billows, and cross its broad bosom in safety: while an old and frail bark, whose captain and crew were of the meekest of Christ's followers, but ignorant and regardless of nature's laws, would be dashed to atoms and every life lost, by waves over which the pirate ship sailed proudly.

To enjoy the temporal blessings of God, we must obey the requisite laws. God does not by a miracle feed and clothe the sluggard. If he would enjoy the comforts of life, he must labor to procure them, or rely upon the charity of his friends or fellow citizens. Man can not enjoy the genial rays of the sun while shut out from them—he can not inhale the refreshing breeze of heaven, if he locks himself up in a hot-house, or unwholesome den.

Nor can any one enjoy the spiritual blessings of God, without yielding an obedience to those laws upon which these excellences depend. Does the Deity communicate peace and comfort to the profane and morally reckless? When the Scriptures assert that God is impartial, do we infer that the character of the drunkard and that of the pious follower of Christ are equally approbated of him?—Does God love the character of the murderer as he does that of the purest saint? Certainly not. The murderer's character is hateful. God is love; and he can love nothing which is opposed to his nature. God loves the world of mankind, because there is something lovely in the nature of the most depraved. But the more a character assimilates to God, in the same ratio it becomes lovely to him.

God then, does not bestow his blessings in contempt of virtue. His impartiality prompts him to place blessing within the reach of all his creatures, and by obedience to his laws all men can be made happy to the full measure of their several capacities. But the ungodly do not obey God's spiritual laws, and hence are morally miserable in proportion to such neglect. J. R. J.

HAPPINESS.

Reader, would you like to be happy? I know you would, for it is human nature, right or wrong. And for one, I am free to confess that in my opinion there is nothing wrong about it. True, professedly good and wise men tell me, that before I can be qualified to enter heaven, I must be willing to go to hell. That in order to be saved, I must be willing to be eternally lost. But of one thing I am quite certain, if we are never happy until we are willing to be miserable, we shall never be happy. And I half suspect, reader, that after all is said and done, those over pious mortals, who prate so much about their resignation, and willingness to be damned for the glory of God—feel about as anxious to be saved and made happy as you and I do.—But if they are disposed to contest the point, and proclaim their willingness to be eternally miserable, if it please God to make them so—why then I move, the Lord take us all at our word—send them to hell—take us to heaven. Then we shall all be reconciled to God, and consequently happy. What say you, reader? PONTIAC.

GOOD WISHES—BUT WRONG MEANS....NO. 2.

Mr. B. the associate of Mr. A. in the building of the meeting house before described, is a very good sort of a man. He has his strong and weak points, religiously considered—he is highly esteemed by his neighbors, who have honored him with some important offices—he has a strong desire to have the faith of a world's salvation extend, and the regenerating spirit of the Gospel made manifest in its elevating hopes and purifying influences on the heart and the life. These wishes are truly good, and the sacrifices, in money at least, have been great to obtain them, and yet apparently, they are no nearer being realised now, than when the first outlay for the church was made.

Mr. B. is becoming discouraged, and why should he not? He has paid money and paid money for years, and where is the return? There is no extension of his faith in his neighborhood,—no increase of the fruits of religion in his household.

Now why this disappointment? Truly he 'has spent his money for that which is not bread, and his labor for that which satisfieth not.'

In the first place, excitement brought dissimilar elements together, and there was no affinity between them; for the worshippers of Mammon have no common bond of union, and he and Mr. A. could not agree. In the next place, the care and management of a 500 acre farm leaves the possessor but little time to attend to the things of his peace.

Beside, Mr. B.'s better half has gained possession of one leg of his pants, and it is only by agreement that the legs move in unison.

Thus while the good wishes of B. for the cause, and his liberal contributions for its support are abundant, his cares rise mountain high between him and the kingdom, and his situation prevents his exerting that influence he desires should be felt in community.

He tries to realize an abundant harvest without a proper cultivation of the soil, and with a provident hand scatters the seed by the way-side—on the green sward, and on stony places, and wonders why it is, that his harvest is so scanty? Alas! his good wishes are unavailing, while the means of their gratification are wrongly applied.

Money can not purchase the grace of God. Nor the worldling advance the kingdom of Christ. Repent ye, and try again. UNCLE ZEKE.

A WORD RESPECTING OPPOSERS.

BY REV. E. W. REYNOLDS.

'How long halt ye between two opinions?' was the question which the Prophet put to the people of Israel, when they had gathered themselves together on mount Carmel, to determine who was most worthy of their adoration—the living God, or the idol worshipped as Baal. Let those who are unbelievers in God's unlimited and impartial grace, be questioned after the same manner. They find that the doctrine of endless-hell-torments is unsatisfying; and many of them frankly confess it. They find a great void left in their souls—a longing for something more congenial to true happiness, and more in accordance with the desires of a Christian, than the cold and cheerless doctrine of unending woe.

And yet they can not be persuaded to look to the true source of Christian enjoyment. They have heard the doctrine of Universalism represented in so disgusting a light—have become persuaded of the truth of so many vile calumnies which have gone forth against it, that they think it impossible for this doctrine to afford consolation to any save to the wicked and depraved.

Deluded beings! would they but examine the system of faith which they so violently assail, they would see that it is in entire accordance with the teachings of the Great Founder of Religion. Can this be said of any other faith under heaven? It can not. Jesus taught that the Christian's yoke was easy and his burden light; so believes the Universalist. He taught that there was a reward for the righteous, and a punishment for the wicked in the earth—that immortal happiness was not the reward of good works, but the gift of God—and that of all that the Father gave him he should lose nothing, but raise it up again at the last day. Universalism teaches precisely the same great truths, which can not be said of any other doctrine, and yet it is denominated a doctrine of the devil!

Although God has not sent literal fire down from heaven to confirm the truth of our faith, as in the case of Elijah and the prophets of Baal, yet there has been sufficient manifestations of its genuineness, to convince any candid and sensible mind.—Universalism does not manifest itself in the wind, the earthquake, or the fire; but in the still small voice of undying love. Its spirit has manifested itself in the reformation of the inebriate, and a glorious triumph has it achieved in the cause of virtue and humanity. The voice of threatening was first employed; but it could do nothing toward reforming the drunkard, and a voice of despair went over the land, saying that there was no hope of him.—Then Universalism entered into the work, and lo! the wine cup was no more sought after—the inebriate stood awed by the magic power of love—he wept tears of regret over his past actions—he saw that a place was still reserved for him in society, and he hastened to fill it. And in the steps that are now being taken for the reformation of the criminal, the spirit of Universalism is also seen; and it will be seen in all the philanthropic movements of future time.

Then why hesitate to receive it? How long will the multitude halt between two opinions? Thank God there is a time coming when all shall know and appreciate our most holy faith. It will be 'in the dispensation of the fullness of time.' Let us hope that the night is far spent, and that the day is dawning.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Chester, Randolph co., Illinois.

Br. SKINNER—Having in my youthful years been so fortunate and highly favored (as I think) with the teaching and preaching of that able advocate of a world's salvation, the elder Hosea Ballou, I early imbibed that soul-cheering and soul-satisfying doctrine once delivered to the saints; but having emigrated to the west in 1818. I have never had the pleasure of hearing a real Gospel sermon since. My only consolation and support aside from the Bible, has been received from the Advocate and Magazine, which I have taken since 1834. I am now living in the midst of the professed teachers of the way of life, viz: Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists. I am supporting them from a want of the privilege of sustaining the truth in full, although, at the same time, I openly, as ably as I can, advocate the restitution of all in Christ. I reside at Chester, Ill., on the Mississippi river, eighty miles below St. Louis, and should esteem it a great privilege to have some travelling preacher call on me. I will try to make him comfortable, as long as he can stay with us. There are many believers in the true faith; but we lack a teacher. If you will forward to me by mail, to the amount of $5, such works as you think will give most light, or best advance the cause, I will, on the receipt of the same, remit the $5, free of postage, as directed by you. A sincere believer and advocate of the cause. SETH ALLEN.

REMARKS.—We give the above letter a place in our columns in order that, should it meet the eye of any of our travelling preachers at the West, they may so shape their course as to visit Br. Allen and preach in his neighborhood, where we doubt not they will be abundantly welcome and do good to the cause of truth.

Respecting the Books, of which he speaks, we remark that, as the bill for postage would amount to considerable, and there would be some risk in sending, perhaps he would do as well to send to Br. Gurley of Cincinnati, if he has an opportunity of doing so. But if he chooses to send us $5, and run the risk himself, we will cheerfully mail $5 worth of books to his address.

In reading the above letter, we could not but think, in contrast with his condition, of the great privileges enjoyed by believers in our blessed faith in these regions and New England, who have books and papers in abundance almost at their doors, and the privilege of hearing the Gospel of impartial grace on each returning Sabbath; and that too many of those enjoying these inestimable privileges are far too remiss in duty, and too negligent in availing themselves thereof. Brethren, do you realize your privileges as you ought? D. S.

CONTRAST OF UNBELIEF AND FAITH.

In Rev. Orville Dewey's 'Discourses on various subjects,' he speaks of the glory of the religion that 'hath brought life and immortality to light,' and laments the desolation of the affections of those who spurn its precepts and doctrines in the following touching language.

'I have wandered among the tombs of such a people; I have wandered through that far-famed cemetery, that overlooks, from its mournful brow, the gay and crowded metropolis of France; but among the many inscriptions upon those tombs, I read scarcely one—I read, to state so striking a fact with numerical exactness,—I read not more than four or five inscriptions in the whole Pere La Chaise, which made any consoling reference to a future life. I read, on those cold marble tombs, the lamentations of bereavement, in every affecting variety of phrase. On the tomb of youth, it was written, that 'its broken-hearted parents, who spent their days in tears and their nights in anguish, had laid down here their treasure and their hope.' On the proud mausoleum where friendship, companionship, love, had deposited their holy relics, it was constantly written, 'Her husband inconsolable;' 'His disconsolate wife;' 'A brother left alone and unhappy' has raised this monument; but seldom, so seldom that scarcely ever, did the mournful record close with a word of hope,—scarcely at all was it to be read amidst the marble silence of that world of the dead, that there is a life beyond; and that surviving friends hope for a blessed meeting again, where death comes no more.

'Oh! death!—dark hour to hopeless unbelief! hour to which, in that creed of despair, no hour shall succeed! being's last hour! to whose appalling darkness, even the shadows of an avenging retribution were brightness and relief,—death! what art thou to the Christian's assurance? Great hour of answer to life's prayer,—great hour that shall break asunder the bond of life's mystery,—hour of release from life's burden,—hour of reunion with the loved and lost,—what mighty hopes hasten to their fulfilment in thee! What longings, what aspirations,—breathed in the still night, beneath the silent stars,—what dread emotions of curiosity,—what deep meditations of joy,—what hallowed imaginings of never experienced purity and bliss,—what possibilities shadowing forth unspeakable realities to the soul, all verge to their consummation in thee! Oh! death! the Christian's death! what art thou, but the gate of life, the portal of heaven, the threshold of eternity!'

EXCOMMUNICATION FROM THE METHODISTS.

The circumstances connected with the expulsion of Mr. Adam Pervis, as a member of the Methodist church, were as singular as was the expulsion itself. It appears, that, in the year 1841, Mr. Pervis made application to join the M. E. church on Cumberland Plains. This application was accepted. The time was appointed for his examination and initiation. All was satisfactory, except one point, namely, his belief in future endless punishment. This, he informed them, he could not believe, and never did. Well, what was to be done? why, that if you, Br. Pervis, will say nothing about it, or will only keep it still, we will take you in. Accordingly he joined, as he wished to enjoy the privilege of some meeting where he could be, or feel, at home. But whether he took the oath to keep still upon this point, we are unable to state. Be this as it may, look at the circumstances of this connection with the letter of his dismission and then judge. Here it is, a true, faithful, and correct copy of the original:

'To ADAM PERVIS, member of the Methodist E. church of Cumberland Plains Station:

RESPECTED BROTHER: You are hereby requested to meet the society of which you are a member, or a select number of them, at the dwelling house of Samuel Gurney, member of the same society with you, on Saturday 21st day of the present month, at two o'clock P. M., to answer to the following charge preferred against you by brother Joshua M. Rideout in behalf of the church on the aforesaid Cum. Plains Station. Charge. Imprudent conduct. Specification 1st, going to Universalist meetings, and patronizing the preaching of that doctrine, that promises salvation to all irrespective of character, thereby 'strengthening the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life.' Ezek. xiii; 22, Specif. 2d. Talking in favor of, and thereby advocating the doctrine of Universalism, so called. Respectfully, J. S. RICE, Preacher in charge.

Cumberland, June 16, 1845.

Thus we see that, 'going to Universalist meetings,' is 'imprudent conduct;' that is, it is behavior which is indiscreet, injudicious, rash and heedless. Now, be it borne in mind, that we once saw this same J. S. Rice in our meeting, on Sunday Oct.

27, 1844, as good and attentive hearer as we had; so attentive was he, that he did not even rise from his seat in prayer! More than this, most of his church was with him! We hope the Conference will see to this business.

Again: We would repeat, that while we were a member of the Methodist church, we knew repeated instances of profanity, drunkenness and theft; and all were covered over, and not considered heinous enough for expulsion, but attributed to errors. O consistency, thou art a jewel! Henceforth, let it be understood among all good people, that 'going to Universalist meetings' is the first imprudent conduct in the Methodist E. church on Cumberland Plains. Pure church that!

Again; 2d specification, or crime, is 'Talking in favor of the salvation of all men.' Look at this in the face. They believe that Christ died to save all. Is it 'imprudent' to talk about it? If so, then Christ committed a most heinous crime in dying for all. We hope they will not pray for all, because it will be strengthening the hands of the wicked. How? Why if they are the righteous, the wicked read 'that the prayer of the righteous avail much.' Hence, he can rest assured that their prayers will be answered in his salvation. Be careful and watch your doctrine lest you find some Universalism in it.

Besides, the Charge makes moral character the basis of destiny; that is, as a man dies so he will be. If so, then the future state will be just like unto the present. On this opinion, save the infant, Br. Rice, if you can. I mean on the ground of moral character. What character will you give the infant and the idiot? Look at it for a moment. 'Physician, heal thyself.'—[Gospel Banner.

J. H. SAWYER.

A PIOUS GATE KEEPER.

Br. E. Preston gives us in the article, below, quite an interesting account of a conversation held with a gate keeper on the turnpike.

Br. GURLEY: While on my way from Chillicothe to the Queen City, I had occasion to travel on the Chillicothe and Cincinnati Pike. When I arrived at the first gate, the keeper informed me that it was customary to let clergymen pass free—wherefore I went on my way rejoicing nearly ten miles. At the next gate I said to the keeper, (J. Ross,) it is the custom for ministers to pass free, is it?

'Yes, yes—to-be-sure,' he replied. 'Are you riding a circuit?'

No sir; I am going to Rainsborough to-night, if I can.

'Ah! you are the Presbyterian minister.'

No sir, I am better than that—a Universalist, sir.

'What! a Universalian—who tells the people that they may steal, lie, &c. What do you preach? Eternal death? endless misery?'

No sir; neither did Paul.

'You can't go, sir!'

You let other preachers go free, don't you?

'I do, sir.'

If others go thus, I must.

'You sha'n't, sir! No man that does not preach eternal death shall pass this gate free! If you preach endless misery you can go—if not, you sha'n't.'

I replied, that I would sooner travel in a swamp than do that; so we parted. If the devil should happen to employ him for a door keeper, doubtless he would be more liberal with Universalist than other preachers. E. P.

It is a happy circumstance that Mr. J. Ross is not door keeper of the kingdom of heaven, for if he were, judging from his conversation, the Universalists would hardly get in by paying double toll. I could name to him a gate, however, which he could probably keep to the satisfaction of his employer, admitting his doctrine true. As he appears to be very much in love with the preaching of hell and the devil, he can probably guess the name of the person to whom he should apply for the situation. [Star in the West.]

JUDGE GRIDLEY'S ADDRESS.

We received, some weeks since, an Address delivered before the Literary Societies of Hamilton College, in July last by Hon. Philo Gridley, of this city, and intended to have acknowledged and noticed it sooner; but by some mishap it was overlooked or forgotten until now. We have read it with lively interest, and think it a happy and able production. Its subject is Enthusiasm in the pursuit of intellectual and moral excellence. He has presented his subject with great advantage, and given it a lively interest by the cases cited of difficulties surmounted and eminence and glory attained, by dint of enthusiasm and persevering efforts; and instances a Cæsar, a Hannibal, a Napoléon, a Milton, a Shakespeare, a Locke, a Newton and other eminent characters. One of the happiest cases illustrative of his subject is the following, which he cites on pp. 15, 16.

One of the most remarkable instances of that enthusiastic resolution, which is born of necessity and conquers difficulties, is exemplified in the life of Nelson the blind teacher, in New York, as it is given in a most interesting biography of one who was his pupil.—Total blindness, after a long and gradual advance, came upon him about his twentieth year, when terminating his College course. It found him poor, and left him, to all appearance, penniless and wretched, with two sisters to maintain,—without money, without friends, without a profession, and without sight. Under such an accumulation of griefs most minds would have sunk; but with him it was otherwise. At all times proud and resolute, his spirit rose at once into what might be called the fierceness of independence;—he resolved within himself to be indebted for support to no hand but his own. His classical education, which from his feeble vision, had been necessarily imperfect, he now determined to complete, and immediately entered upon the apparently hopeless task. With a view to fit himself for a teacher of youth, he instructed his sisters in the pronunciation of Greek and Latin, and employed one or the other constantly in reading aloud to him the classics usually taught in the schools. A naturally faithful memory, spurred on by such strong excitement, performed its oft repeated miracles; and in a space of time incredibly short, he became master of their contents, even to the minutest points of critical reading. At this period a gentleman who incidentally became acquainted with his history, in a feeling somewhere between pity and confidence, placed his two sons under his charge, with a view to enable him to try the experiment. A few months' trial was sufficient; he then fearlessly appeared before the public, and at once challenged a comparison with the best established classical schools in the city. The novelty and boldness of the attempt attracted general attention; the lofty confidence he displayed in himself, excited respect; and soon his untiring assiduity, his real knowledge, and a burning zeal, which, knowing no bounds in his devotion to his scholars, awakened somewhat of a corresponding spirit in their minds, and completed the conquest. His reputation spread daily; scholars flocked to him in crowds; competition sunk before him; and in the course of a very few years he found himself in the enjoyment of an income superior to that of any College patronage in the United States; with to him the infinitely higher gratification of having risen above the pity of the world, and fought his own blind way to independence.

This is, indeed, a most remarkable instance of the triumph of an enthusiastic and energetic spirit over difficulties, before which ordinary minds would have sunk in hopeless apathy.

We should have been glad to have seen the opposite side of the question discussed, had the limits of his address permitted the Judge to have done so; i. e. the excess and abuses of enthusiasm pointed out. We believe this part of the subject is quite as prolific as the other, and of equal importance. But one address must necessarily be too limited to do justice to both sides of the subject; and Mr. G.'s is an admirable plea for the advantages of enthusiasm when rightly directed in a noble cause. From the Christian Messenger.

LECTURES BY A CLAIRVOYANT.

Br. Price—Permit me through your columns to make an important announcement, which will doubtless be of interest to the public. Many of your readers have already heard of A. J. Davis, the celebrated Poughkeepsie Clairvoyant. He is now in this city in company with Dr. S. S. Lyon with whom he is engaged in the treatment of diseases. I will not trouble you with a description of the wonders which he has accomplished. Suffice it to say, that he is among the very few Clairvoyants in the world who are capable of being put in a state of mental exaltation, in which neither the will of the magnetizer, nor any influence of the external world, can pervert his vision; and what he says in the transic state, can be depended upon. In his examinations of the human system and prescription for its diseases, he uses the technical nomenclature of anatomy, physiology and materia medica, though in the waking state knows nothing of the language of those sciences, never having received an education of beyond five months schooling.

Mr. Davis has recently commenced a course of lectures of the most astounding character, whilst in the Clairvoyant state, into which he is thrown by Dr. Lyon. That the public might have the means of testing the authenticity of the lectures when published, Mr. Davis, while in a state of Clairvoyance, made choice of three witnesses, all or a part of whom are to be present during their delivery, that they may testify to the medium through which the communication is given to the world. These witnesses are Rev. J. N. Parker, 139 Avenue D., J. S. Smith, M. D., 384 Broome street, and Mr. Theron R. Lapham, 236 Canal street. The choice of scribe has fallen upon the writer.

In this brief communication, we can give but little idea of the plan of Mr. Davis' work. We can only say that it is to have a general bearing upon the evils of society and their remedy. He establishes a new foundation of reasoning, and some of his lectures we can truly say, exhibit cogency of argument and a clearness and expressiveness of phraseology that scarcely have a parallel. He clearly and intelligibly explains the phenomena of Animal Magnetism and Clairvoyance; and from these and various other premises, he clearly and fully establishes the important conclusion that the proper reality of all things consists in an inward, hidden, and invisible principle: the all visible and tangible substances in the outer world, are but transient forms and effects of this principle; and that from this principle, considered as a cause, we must reason, if we would arrive legitimately at specified and particular conclusions. He shows that matter came from spirit; and that in its progress of refinement, from the earth to the plant, from the plant to the animal, from the animal to man, &c., it will finally form spirit individualized; and that this is endlessly progressive in knowledge and refinement, continually approaching nearer and nearer to the Great Eternal Positive Mind, the Fountain and Controller of all existence! These and other things which are yet to come, are to serve as a key to a REVELATION! Which is to compose the second part of the work. And from the whole he is to deduce practical rules which he promises shall be of the utmost importance to the world.

Permit me, Br. Price, as a personal witness, to express my deliberate and earnest conviction of the solemn importance of the work, judging from the lectures that have already been given. Independently of the forthcoming portions, that which has already been delivered, is destined to be read in all languages and admired by all who are capable of appreciating thought and instruction. It is by no means a senseless jargon, presuming on the credulity of minds tinctured by marvellousness; but it appeals directly to REASON; and will sustain itself independently of the almost supernatural phenomena connected with its production.

The curious are earnestly requested to institute such inquiries as may satisfy them as to the truth or falsity of the foregoing announcement. If there is imposition in this affair, let it be exposed now, before the work is published? Is not this fair?

Farther inquiries may be made of the appointed witnesses as named above, or of
WM. FISHBOUGH,
Appointed Scribe, No. 24 Vesey-st.

This is to certify that we have severally been present at the delivery of one or more of the above named lectures, and that the announcement thus given to the public is true.

AGES OF ORTHODOXY AND UNIVERSALISM.

By 'orthodoxy' we mean Calvinistic Congregationalism, for this claims to be the orthodoxy of New England. By 'Universalism' we mean the doctrine of the final reconciliation of all things to God. Which of these two doctrines is the oldest?—as a matter of Church History. Calvinism, which is the orthodoxy of Congregationalism, is other than Congregationalism itself. John Calvin himself was not a Congregationalist as we know of. He was the father of a system of doctrines in the church known as Calvinism. Of course, Calvinism is not older than Calvin himself. Well—when was Calvinism born? When did John Calvin construct that theology? Answer—not until after the Christian church had been in existence over fifteen hundred years. From the time of the apostles, more than a century and a half rolled away before modern orthodoxy was born. This was in the year 1536. So that Calvinism itself, even at the present day, is about 300 years old. And then there is one fact in relation to it, that is worthy of notice in passing,—that in the very place where it was born, Calvinism has long since been dead and defunct. Calvin lived and died in Geneva; but there is no Calvinism now in that theatre of his power and triumphs.

Congregationalism arose in England in about 1616. It was many years, however, before it arrested much attention or respect. It adopted the Calvinistic faith, and hence became orthodox. Orthodox Congregationalism therefore is but about 229 years old—not a very great age to boast of, one would think. At least, it hardly becomes Congregationalists to taunt Methodists, Baptists, Universalists, or any other sect with not having age enough for their doctrines to entitle them to the claims of truth.

But how old is Universalism? as a matter of historical existence in the Christian Church. Is it younger or older than Calvinism? Answer—Universalism was an undisputed doctrine in the primitive Christian church for the first three hundred years—longer than Orthodoxy has existed since its birth to the present day. Traces of this doctrine (Universalism) are found in the writings of the earliest Christian fathers. Clemens Alexandrinus believed it. He was personally a pupil of St. John the Evangelist, received his doctrines from his lips, and lived under the influence of his teachings. He was a Universalist. The celebrated Origen, who flourished in about the year 230, the most honored and distinguished of all the early fathers, was a Universalist, and has left evidence of this in his writings now extant. Titus, Bishop of Boston, who flourished in 347, was a Universalist. Gregory was a Universalist. He lived in 370. St. Jerome was a Universalist. He wrote in 380. John, Bishop of Jerusalem, also believed in universal salvation. Indeed this doctrine was unquestioned in the church for nearly five hundred years. At length, after heathenism had corrupted the church, and it began to lose its primitive character, and to descend into the dark ages, then, but not till then, more partial doctrines began to prevail, and these did prevail till finally they reckoned the strongest party in their favor, and in the 5th General Council, which met in 553, Universalism was for the first time censured and condemned. Roman Catholicism thenceforth had its sway till the Reformation of 1500, when it began to meet with a check. Orthodoxy, however, came up then, still clung to the Catholic doctrine of endless misery, and has contended for it ever since.

But in point of fact—historical fact—Universalism was a favorite doctrine of the best men and earliest fathers in the church, hundreds and hundreds of years before Orthodoxy had its birth. Let not the Orthodox again—because it is not becoming in them to do so—taunt the Universalists as if their doctrine were not old enough to be true. It is just as old as Christianity, to a day.—[Gospel Banner.]

WORK FOR CHILDREN.

There is no greater defect in educating children, than neglect to accustom them to work. It is an evil that attaches mostly to large towns and cities. Children suffer much from it. The parent never considers whether the child's work is necessary or not to the child. Nothing is more uncertain than their future independence and comfort—much depends on being accustomed to work—accustomed to provide for the thousand constantly recurring wants that nature entails on us.

If this were not so, still it preserves them from bad habits—it secures their health—it strengthens both mind and body—it enables them better to bear the confinement of the school-room—and it tends more than anything else to give them just views of life.

It is too often the case that children, provided they spend a half dozen hours of the day at school, are permitted to spend the rest as they please. Thus they grow up in the world without a knowledge of its toils and cares. They view it through a false medium. They can not appreciate the labors you bestow, as they do not know the toils they cost. Their bodies and minds are enervated, and they are exposed to whatever vicious associations are within their reach.

The daughter, probably, becomes that pitiable, helpless object, a novel-reading girl. The son, if he surmounts the consequences of your neglect, does it probably after his plans and station for life are fixed, and when knowledge, for one of its important objects, comes too late.

No man or woman is fully educated if not accustomed to manual labor. Whatever accomplishments they possess, whatever their mental training, a deduction must be made for ignorance of that important branch.

COUNSELS FOR THE YOUNG.

Never be cast down by trifles. If a spider breaks his thread twenty times, twenty times will he mend it again. Make up your mind to do a thing, and you will do it.—Fear not, if a trouble comes upon you; keep up your spirits, though the day be a dark one.

'Troubles never stop forever.

The darkest day will pass away!'

If the sun is going down, look up at the stars, if the earth is dark, keep your eyes on heaven! With God's presence, and God's promises, a man or a child may be cheerful.

'Never despair when frog's in the air.

A sunshiny morning will come without warning.'

Mind what you run after! Never be content with a bubble that will burst, or a fire-work that will end in smoke and darkness. Get that which you can keep, and which is worth keeping.

'Something sterling that will stay

When gold and silver fly away.'

Fight hard against a hasty temper. Anger will come but resist it strongly. A spark may set a house on fire. A fit of passion may give you cause to mourn all the days of your life. Never revenge an injury.

'He that revengeth knows no peace.

The meek possess a peaceful breast.'

If you have an enemy, act kindly to him and make him your friend. You may not win him over at once, but try again. Let one kindness be followed by another, till you have compassed your end. By little and little, great things are completed.

'Water falling day by day.

Wears the hardest rock away.'

And so repeated kindness will soften a heart of stone.

Whatever you do, do it willingly. A boy that is whipped in school never learns his lesson well. A man that is compelled to work cares not how badly it is performed.

He that pulls off his coat cheerfully, strips up his sleeves in earnest, and sings while he works, is the man for me.

'A cheerful spirit gets on quick;
A grumbler in the mud will stick.'

Evil thoughts are worse enemies than lions and tigers, for we can keep out of the way of wild beasts, but bad thoughts win their way everywhere. The cup that is full will hold no more; keep your heads and hearts full of good thoughts, that bad ones may find no room to enter.

'Be on your guard, and strive, and pray,
To drive all evil thoughts away.'

POPE'S PRAYER.

'Let not this weak, unknowing hand
Presume thy bolts to throw,
And deal damnation round the land
On each I judged thy foe.

If I am right, thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, O teach my heart
To find that better way.'

It is not our intention to write a dissertation upon this poem of the poet, for we feel wholly incompetent to the task; but we only intend to contrast the spirit of the above quoted lines, with that of the prayer many pious persons who may be found within the pale of the church, as directors, a kind of spiritual guide-boards, to point the way-worn sons of men onward to that kingdom of love

'Where the soul wears its mantle of glory.'

We are not of those who wholly approve, or totally condemn; who discard entirely, or extend the hand of open fellowship, blind to the faults of the individual upon whom judgment is placed. No; but we hope we are of those who are disposed, as far as lies in their power, to give credit where, and to whom it is due; and to condemn where one may be obnoxious to condemnation. A deed of kindness and love should be acknowledged, though executed by the hand of one whose general disposition is vicious; and a noble thought should be treasured up, though it may have originated with a mind accustomed to reflection of a nature far from being virtuous. In this respect, there is a wonderful difference in the minds of men, and we can account for it in no other way, than by supposing it to be the effect of the difference in the religious education of the different members of community. The popular system of divinity, either wholly approves or wholly condemns. A man who is blessed with a place in the kingdom of everlasting glory, either by election, faith or works, receives no condemnation whatever, no less glory for any thoughts or actions which were evil and iniquitous indulged or performed while he was an inhabitant of this lower world. And on the other hand, one who is so unfortunate as to be doomed to the shades of endless perdition, either by reprobation, evil doings, or a want of faith, receives no mitigation of suffering, no praise, no commendation for ought of a virtuous nature, prior to the hour of the mortal coil's being shaken off! And the dispositions of mankind, and their practice, being influenced more or less by their religious opinions; they form a judgment of character in this world, upon the same principle upon which they declare the judgment of God to be based in eternity. If one is within the pale of the church; a hanger-on at the sanctuary; though his character may be very questionable in a moral point of view; he is not unfrequently regarded by many as a saint; while he who has not been 'born again,' though a man of strict integrity, is never 'named in the bond.' Following out such a principle, there are very many who condemn the author of the Universal Prayer, and though they are taught by the Master to judge not, that they may not be judged; yet they are far from being sparing in their condemnation. Now we are aware, that in one particular, Pope was not unlike other men; i. e. he was no better than he ought to have been, but we have never learned, that he would suffer in comparison with many pious disciples of Christianity who have labored in behalf of the cause of religious faith, and whose praise may be heard in nearly all the churches. And had Pope repented in the popular acceptance of the term, he would have ascended to an honorable and glorious sainthood, and his errors been declared to be the offspring, not of the inner, but of the outer man, and which were atoned for by the death on Calvary. The world is wise, especially the church-going portion of it; and 'Wisdom is justified of her children!' Let us take up the prayer.

The spirit of that prayer breathes as pure Christianity as ever graced the prayer of a human heart.

'Let not this weak, unknowing hand
Presume thy bolts to throw,
And deal damnation round the land,
On each I judge thy foe.'

That language is graced with sentiments purely moral and holy, and it speaks a volume in praise of the mind in which it originated. It is the supplication of one aware of the fallibility of human judgment, and who was not so far biased by self-conceit as to look upon himself as the paragon of perfection, and the judge to pass sentence of condemnation upon the wayward children of men, as the especial agent of the great Everlasting. And again;

'If I am right, thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, O teach my heart
To find that better way.'

This is far superior to many a prayer offered up in the sanctuary of public worship; by many who have been set apart to the work of the ministry, to employ their talents in evangelizing the world; to instruct mankind in the knowledge of righteousness, and to direct them upon the high road to a spiritual clime. Too many lay hold upon the cudgel of retribution, and deal valiantly, right and left, hurling bolts of condemnation upon those whom they judge to be the foes of God; and those so condemned, of course, are all those who do not believe precisely as they do, and who do not bow to their every 'beck,' saying, 'even so has it been ordained; and ye are the lights of the world.' They have no doubt of their own feet's being in the way of rectitude, and that God will grant them grace to go on in the same way, is not a matter of much question. He is bound to bestow upon them the favored gifts! 'If I am wrong'—oh no; the thought is never entertained, for peradventure they may be enabled to trace the Holy Spirit in its descent from the great Teacher, through the period of eighteen hundred years, down to their excellent selves; the honored and favored of Heaven; though perhaps the line through which it has travelled was corrupt in many places by corroding vice and iniquity.

Alas! that there should be so many who have espoused the cause of the Christian religion; so biased and governed by self-righteousness; so blind to their own faults, and yet seeing the faults of others with so quick an eye. But in our contemplation of the character of others, we should not lose sight of the feelings of our own minds or the sentiments of our own hearts, or neglect to correct our own errors. While maintaining a becoming humility, we should make our prayer like the poet's; supplicating grace to keep us in the right way, if our feet are already therein; and we should be sparing in our condemnation of those whose sentiments are different from our own, for then and not till then, shall we have the enjoyment following from the approbation of God. S. J. G.

A GENERAL LETTER.

I have been compelled, by various causes, to keep so long out of these columns, that I doubt not many of our readers begin to think it high time to remove my name from among the long list of Editors. Indeed, I myself would have requested its removal some time since, but for two reasons—1st, the paper has a small circulation—may, perhaps, even die—and my withdrawal might appear like deserting it on that account. Now, whatever other and numerous sins I have, to answer for, I trust I am no rat that I should desert a sinking ship! 2d, I have still hoped to be able to justify the use of my name as one of its Editors; and perhaps I may, to the extent of an article per month during the 17th volume. Be this as it may, I will essay an article for January. And as I am behind hand in my correspondence, as well as in editorial, I will endeavor to make said article answer a double purpose.

We left Maryland in March last—rather suddenly, and after a very brief deliberation. I felt doubtful whether my health would endure the fatigue of preaching in four or five places, all distant from my residence—and I was sure that it would interfere greatly with what I think I have a right to consult at present—the comfort of my family and myself. But I still believe that had my health permitted, I could have permanently located myself in that section. One or two places I would probably have had to abandon, and one or two others I should probably have occupied in their stead. This would have increased my travelling, but it would have secured my pecuniary support—and, in a very short time, another preacher could have come into the field, and found his labor much easier, and his support more readily obtained, than mine had been. Such is my opinion—and I hesitate not, therefore, to say, that if any spirited, well trained preacher wishes a southern location, in one of the richest sections of the Union, and is willing to labor hard for one or two years on a bare support, to procure it, he will find just such an one in Franklin county, Pa., and Washington county, Md.* He will find there a number of friends, widely scattered—some, Universalists indeed; others, Universalists not yet freed from the influences of Partialist feelings; and others still, who need truth for their heads, as well as love for their hearts and morality for their conduct, before they are really worthy of the name. The opposition he will find to be, generally, as cowardly as it is bitter and unscrupulous. There are, however, a few exceptions. So much, then, for Maryland, Pennsylvania and Virginia along the narrow path of the former.

We arrived here on the 2d of April last, and gathered together the scattered members of the family, and again set up our home. E. Allen remained in Philadelphia, until late in the Summer, when business and health both failing, he returned home. But shortly after, a vacancy offering in Lewistown, he departed for it, and is now aiding his uncle, M. Montgomery, Post Master in that place. A friend, Jno. K. Wright, having been appointed Post Master in this place, and needing a clerk, Hosea obtained the place, and has been busy in it ever since July last. Malvina reached us, from Utica, in July, and with the rest, is at home. All of us have enjoyed good health during the spring, summer and fall—my wife endures cold weather as well as ever—and even I, (though my right arm and shoulder have been very painful at times, for several months past, and the left side of my head has suffered from tic douloureux occasionally,) have been able to preach every Sunday, and attend and speak in our social meetings every Wednesday evening. I have missed very few meetings of my Lodge, and Encampment, and Degree Lodge; and, except in one case, have been able (and have generally attended) to attend two sessions of our Sunday School every Sunday. Surely, then, I have no reason to complain of ill health, when my general health has been so very good. As to writing, I am satisfied from past experience, that I must do less than formerly. A little each day may be allowed me in connection with considerable exercise—but much at a time, especially if continued from day to day, I find to be injurious.

On arriving here, we found a good, and tolerably large society, in possession of an excellent brick meeting house, with 68 pews, beside a gallery on three sides, a good hall in the basement, and surmounted by a steeple with a bell in it. The interior of the house has been recently painted, and elegantly papered in imitation of seinite granite at the sides, and lead and flesh colored paper at the cornice and ceiling—with an excellent imitation of pillars and arch in rear of the pulpit, and in the arch a large painting (about 8 feet square) representing the All-seeing Eye, and a hand sustaining the Gospel scales, showing the equality of the numbers who die in Adam and are made alive in Christ; and below is the inscription—'A just God and a Saviour.' This painting which cost about $50, was a gift from one of the Keim family—the first family of open (and among the most liberal) supporters of our cause; but now unfortunate, and scattered, and some departed to their final home! The good old General, G. D. B. Keim still lives here—but is much secluded from society, and considerably depressed in spirits as well as in fortune and in health. But he still trusts in God as the Saviour of all men, and rejoices in the hope that even his enemies will be saved from all sin and suffering.—May our venerable friend's last days be yet his best and happiest days!

But, to return to society affairs. By a long series of ill management and ill luck combined, they got almost inextricably involved in debt—some $7,000 or $8,000—when summer friends left them, and professed friends pitied them—but few were found to aid them. Once, they almost resolved to sell out to the Methodists; but ruced bargain just barely in time. Under the pastoral labors of Br. Samuel Ashton, who proved himself a most energetic, stirring, persevering manager, and aided by the energies and means of several most prudent and efficient laymen, a plan of extrication was laid—the house was repaired gradually—the basement converted into a hall—a small cemetery purchased, enclosed, and laid out into lots—preaching sustained—the public appealed to and their aid secured—and in a few years the debt was released and paid, together with current expenses, so that now their debt is reduced to less than $1500 dollars.—The very striking similarity between this society in origin, date, numbers, debt, difficulties, and every thing except the result, with that of Utica, has often struck me with great force. Our Borough is also about as large as your city—numbering over 12,000 inhabitants; and a more bitter, ungodly, and wealthy opposition you never had. Two of our clergymen here, have utterly refused to walk with me at funerals, when they were solicited to do so by Committees of Odd Fellows. Others have not refused. But more of this, at some other time; for there are some amusing as well as painful exhibitions of bigotry in this place.

Our congregations varied, during the summer and fall, from about 100 to 200 in the forenoons; and from about 150 to 250 in the evenings. The 68 pews on the ground floor will hold 5 to 6 persons each—the gallery will hold probably 150 to 200 persons.—Since fall, the congregations have increased to about 100 persons more—and while we are losing none, (except by deaths and removals,) we are gaining steadily from the ranks of the indifferent, and occasionally even an opposer comes over to us—while, from the strangers who are continually arriving and settling here, we get our proportion. You may judge of our increase of population by the following facts. In 1843 about 100 new buildings were erected here. In 1844, about 150 were erected. In 1845 about 260 buildings were erected—11 only, of which, are wooden buildings; nearly all the rest are brick. And yet great difficulty exists in getting a house here, even now, for next spring! And it is said that there are more buildings contemplated to be commenced and completed in 1846, than all our brick yards (and we have 7 or 8) can furnish bricks for!!! And brick is the general material here.

The reasons for this rapid increase, are to be found in the late development of our immense mineral resources, in conjunction with the very advantageous location of our Borough. Reading is about equi-distant from Harrisburg and Philadelphia—about 50 miles from each; located in the heart of a most fertile country, well peopled by good farmers, mostly of German descent. Our hills and valleys are full of the richest iron ores of various kinds. Pottsville with its coal region, is but 30 miles distant, and the Schuylkill Navigation, and the Rail Road, both connecting that coal region with Philadelphia, pass through this place; while the Union Canal connecting the Schuylkill and Susquehanna rivers and the Pennsylvania canal, binds this place to Middletown; and an excellent Macadamized road connects us with Lebanon and Harrisburg. Thus advantageously located, iron works have sprung up here in great abundance and variety, furnishing employment to several hundreds of laborers and mechanics.—We have one anthracite furnace which casts 30 tons per week; one forge, two rolling mills—one with some 25 or 30 nail and spike machines attached; two foundries, with machine shops attached; beside the extensive works connected with the Rail Road Depot. A cotton factory has been in contemplation for some time; and very sanguine expectations are entertained that Congress, or the National Executive, will locate a National Foundry here.—You will perceive, therefore, that our population is not an idle one—indeed, except on holidays, loufers are a curiosity. But suppose not, from the close attention of every one to work, that we are a selfish or unsocial people. On the contrary, I never was in a place that contained more associations in proportion to its population. We have here a Masonic Lodge (and a Chapter, I believe), three Odd Fellows Lodges, (including an African Lodge of the Grand United Order, or Sheffield (England) Unity), a Degree Lodge, and an Encampment (with a talk of two more subordinate lodges—one, to work in the German language); two divisions of the Sons of Temperance; at least five beneficial or mutual societies, besides two or three fire companies, as many military, and literary and charitable societies at pleasure—and the most of these have each a large list of active members. Our religious societies are—a German Lutheran, a German Reformed, a Catholic, an Episcopal Methodist, a Presbyterian, a Universalist, a Baptist, an English Lutheran, a German Methodist, an Episcopalian, a Friends or Quaker, and an African Society (of what denomination I know not)—all of whom own houses of worship. So much, at present, for Reading and its societies.

We had a very good Exhibition of our Sunday School on Christmas night, crowdedly attended, and much admired and approved—the first of the kind ever held here. Our receipts, with 'levy' (shilling) tickets, were about $54. We repeated it—or about one half of it, with 12 new pieces—on New Year's night. That day not being a holiday here as much as it is in New York, our audience was not quite so large; and many tickets of the former sales coming in, our receipts were yet smaller—a little less than $40. But we shall gain by both, about $80, clear of all expenses, wherewith to replenish our class books and library—besides, what is more worth, a great amount of public favor, the destruction of much prejudice, an increase of teachers and scholars, and a removal of a paralyzing fear of inability to do whatever we resolve to attempt. This last on the part of teachers, pupils and friends, made the getting up of the Exhibition truly an uphill work; even up to the evening of performance, 'failure' was apprehended so strongly, that a position near the door, so as to secure a speedy exit in case of a break-down, was sought by some of our best friends. And yet every scholar on the list, (except one, who was detained by illness) spoke, and not one broke down—while the most of them, including the smallest as well as largest scholars did as well as any I have ever heard. And what seemed to astonish our opposers, (and even some of our friends,) was, that sound religious and moral instruction, as well as other interesting and useful information, could be inculcated in the pieces spoken, and thus utility be blended with amusement. Several of our secular papers noticed it approvingly. Indeed, we find no difficulty here in getting notices inserted by our Editors generally, nor are they backward in speaking of us in a favorable manner, when we succeed in pleasing them in any exhibition, excursion, or other general matter.

But I must stop this gossip, begun last year and to be ended in this. You will probably receive another general letter before long—as my stock is not quite exhausted.

☞ Br. S. R. S., yours of 6th inst is received. Also of the 10th.

'My yoke is easy, and my burden is light.' Matt. xi: 30.

All who bear or assume the Christian name have not yet learned to respect this testimony. Many will have it that there are serious restrictions to be put upon it. Why?

The Pacha of Egypt abandons his own realm and comes to this 'land of the free,' intending to become a permanent resident, provided matters suit his preconceptions. Now he may be happy here, if he will but respect the institutions, privileges and requirements of the government. But no, he has not come here through any love for these; he came here expecting undeserved emolument. Add to this an extreme partiality for the institutions of his semi-barbarous nation, and you are introduced to the peculiarities of the stranger. He determines, just as far as may be, to indulge the detestable propensities which he has fostered at home. He desires to regulate all matters to suit himself, according to the idle caprice of the moment; to domineer over his countless hosts of serfs; to feed his vanity upon the flatteries of polished courtiers and scrambling office-seekers. These he was accustomed to in Egypt.

But as he looks about this new country, he finds that the distinctions peculiar to the genius and character of its government are entirely different from those under which he was educated. And though he may proclaim that he was a ruler at home, and a titled dignitary, though he talks much of the happiness of those who are still in Egypt; though he boasts of the self denial, and meritorious sacrifices he has made in refusing the enjoyments of his home land; these will avail him nothing. He may become a citizen if he will, by acknowledging the government of the free. But he spurns naturalization; he rejects the obligations of equality. And the result is that he constantly complains of the hardness of his lot, compared with what it was in his old country.

Now the reason of all this is evident. He came within the province of our laws attached to his old customs and habits; and determined not to give them entirely up; hence the inability to gratify them, originates his disappointment and murmuring. The fault is not in the new government, but in himself, and in his obstinate adherence to his old follies. He is endeavoring to act the tyrant in a free government. He will not allow others to become as high, or as safe, or as great as he is; and hence, instead of being what he wishes to be, a ruler—or what he might be—a prominent and useful and happy man,—he sinks below both, and is a mere pensioner under the protection which the law affords to those whom it knows not. He is trying to be a citizen-Pacha, and he can not be—and he never will be!

The reader thinks this a little too much fancy for a sermon. Perhaps it is so—but look. There have been thousands of just such pacha dwellers in spiritual Egypt, who have been just such contrary beings, after they pretended to leave that country. Take any of these persons and examine him. He has travelled long in the road of vice, and been a leader or chief among sinners. He is familiar with all the windings, and scenery, and excitement of wickedness—with the treacherous bowl, the giddy dance, the laughing club, and the thousand enticements by which sin's votaries are deluded into the belief that they are happy.

For some reason our Pacha has left his former associates and pretended to seek the company of the children of God. Here you may see him with a gloomy countenance a frowning brow, and a haughty look, dictating to the spiritual interests of mankind, and endeavoring to rush in between the sinning and the uplifted arm of justice—trying all the time to put aside the law of truth. He talks of the deep hardships which he endures, and which he represents as the sequents of a Christian life; he boasts of the self-denial which he is obliged to exercise in tearing himself from his old associates, and represents it as a terrible thing to bear the scoffs and sneers of the world's people. His estimate of the disciples of Jesus, is such that he professes to have given up expecting any happiness or rest this side the grave. He regards the merriment of those old thoughtless companions of his, the wealth of his former wicked associates, the titled honors which are worn in his old pathway, as evidences of the happiness of which he has deprived himself. He is miserable; and as he pretends to be a disciple of Christ, he is continually restricting the import of our text. He is a grumbler at every thing.

Now, do you not see, reader, the reason for all this? He does not profess to love the law of God. He occupies his present condition, because he hopes to secure a monopoly thereby. His heart, his thoughts, his habits, are all allied to the old scenes of the past. His affections are away back in the spiritual land of Egypt, and yearn for its flesh-pots and its bondage. While, with all his professions, he will not subscribe to the law of spirituality. He persists in being an alien in the kingdom of God, and a contender for castes among the citizen brotherhood.—The fault is in him, and in the notions which he has brought along with him from his old estate.

The words of the text, then, are uncontradicted by fact. Hence if you ever know a person to contradict them by word, or discredit them by practice, set him down as one striving to be a citizen pacha in a free land—a sinful Christian in a kingdom which he has taken by force.

INSTALLATION.—Br. W. H. Ryder was installed pastor of the Universalist church and society in Nashua, N. H. Dec. 25th. Sermon on the occasion by Br. A. A. Miner of Lowell. Brs. T. Whittemore, G. W. Gage, and Rev. Mr. Bulfinch (Unitarian) assisted on the occasion. May this connection be happy and lasting.

The new and elegant Universalist church in Exeter, N. H., was dedicated on the 18th ult.—sermon by Br. H. Jewell, pastor of the society. The brethren in E. are entitled to much praise for the erection of this house.

The elegant new granite meeting-house lately erected by the Universalist society in Chester, Vt., was dedicated to the Almighty God the 5th inst. Sermon by Br. D. Forbes, of West Bridgewater, Mass.

A new Universalist meeting-house was dedicated in Sandwich, Mass., on the 18th ult. Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner. In the afternoon of the same day, Br. L. W. Manning was installed pastor of the society at Sandwich. Sermon by Br. R. Tomlinson.

A new Meeting-house is being erected by the Universalist society in East Middlebury, Vt.

ORDINATION.—Br. L. F. Monroe was recently ordained at Caledonia, Marion county, O. Sermon by Br. N. B. Johnson.

Br. S. Brimblecom, formerly of Norridgewock and Westbrook in this State, has removed to Dudley, Mass., to take charge of the Universalist cause there (under God), and wishes to be addressed accordingly.

The following is from the pen of Br. R. Thornton of the Primitive Expounder.

ADVICE UNASKED.—We advise Br. Drew not to grumble publicly, if Br. Cobb did get a few subscribers in Maine for the Freeman which Br. Drew wanted. We advise Br. Cobb not to trespass again upon Br. D.'s Territory, without getting his consent. We advise Br. Smith of the Star to be more careful and guarded in his manner of expression, if he does not mean to subvert Christianity itself; and we advise Brs. Miner and Brooks to have no further newspaper discussion with him on the subject. We advise the proprietors of the Western Luminary, and of the Magazine and Advocate not to be so jealous of each other, nor strive so hard to supplant each other. If there is not room and support enough for both, then unite; and till then let each do as he would like to be done by. These brotherly grumbles I despise. And being an As-sociationist, I hope to see the Expounder, Ohio Universalist, Western Universalist, and Covenant, united in one grand phalanx, before either is left to sink so low as to begin to grumble with its neighbors.

For that part of the above intended for us, we take the liberty of giving the gist of an anecdote we recollect reading not long since, of Frederick the Great, for Br. Thornton's edification. It was something like this.

A woman complained to Frederick that her husband ill treated her. That is none of my business, said he.—But persisted she, he speaks disrespectfully of you. The King's answer, 'that is none of your business,' summarily concluded the dialogue. W.

In the Magazine of the 9th inst. (last week) Br. H. Jordan states in an article over his signature, headed, 'Another challenge—who accepts?' that Mr. Conklin told him that 'proposals for a discussion were made to Br. S. R. Smith last spring, but that Br. S. declined on account of his health.' In answer to that, Br. Smith says—'That S. R. S. never declined a debate with Mr. Conklin, on any account—for proof I refer to Br. E. W. Locke.'

Original Sermons are thankfully received from Brs. U. Clark, E. W. Reynolds and J. Britton, Jr.

The notices of Conferences at Fly Creek and Paine's Hollow received from different preachers somewhat conflict with each other, and we publish them as they now appear, by the authority of Br. Tuttle whose notice was last received, and who says he is authorized to fix them thus. Ed.

Br. Hammond's letter heretofore mentioned and promised to the public, he has since very prudently concluded to withdraw, and now requests us not to publish it.

The Cause in Auburn.

We take the following pithy sentence from a business letter of our worthy Br. I. Curtis of Auburn.

'We are in a very prosperous condition—church not large enough—frequent applications by dozens for slips—all sold or rented—must have a larger church. We are getting up a tract society and by its influence we expect to penetrate the benighted minds of those who sit in 'darkness and shadow of death' eternal,—a shadow of vain, ignorant and superstitious minds.'

The Golden Rule.

The first number of the 4th volume of this excellent weekly has come to hand. It is devoted to literature, amusement, miscellaneous news and to the exemplification and promulgation of the principles of Odd Fellowship—Friendship, Love and Truth, Benevolence and Charity. It is published in octavo form—two volumes per year—making over 800 pages yearly of a good variety of reading matter—we can vouch for the volume that has just closed. A steel plate engraving accompanies the first number of the new volume—one of the richest in design, and execution that we have ever seen. It contains the emblems of the order, with their mottos, such as 'Faith, Hope, Charity,' 'But the greatest of these is Charity,' 'Visit the sick,' 'Bury the dead,' 'Relieve the distressed,' 'Protect the orphan,' &c. We notice an article in this number from the pen of Br. A. B. Grosh, who is a frequent contributor among other excellent writers. It is published by E. Winchester (late publisher of the New World) 24 Ann street N. Y., at the low price of two dollars a year. Subscriptions received at this Office.

The January number (7) of the FARMERS LIBRARY and Monthly Journal of Agriculture is issued by Greeley & McElrath, Tribune Buildings, N. Y., and contains a continuation of Mr. Thae's principles of Agriculture, relating particularly to the theory of the soil, manuring it, &c., besides the usual Monthly Journal. The last named portion contains several valuable and interesting articles and treatises, both to farmers and mechanics. Among which are to be found a 'treatise on milch cows,' 'farm buildings'—their locality and construction,' 'illustration of plans,' &c. The uses of the Hydraulic Ram and the Screw are also explained by illustrations, besides much other useful information to the agriculturalist. This number contains 179 pages 8vo. UNIVERSALIST THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

During the last ten or fifteen years, as is well known, much has been said among Universalists on the subject of a Theological Seminary, for the better education of young men preparing for the ministry. At first the suggestion was received with general distrust, or met by a decided, and in some cases, by a violent opposition. Some feared that such an institution would produce nothing but disaster, and others even threatened, should it be established, to withdraw from the denomination!—The advocates of the measure, though few in the outset, had too much confidence in the wisdom and necessity of its adoption to doubt its final issue, and therefore calmly awaited the slow but certain operation of those causes which they clearly foresaw must ere long work a change in the public opinion and feeling, and ultimately effect the establishment of such a school in despite of prejudice and opposition.

In the progress of an improving public sentiment, one or two ineffectual attempts have been made to carry out a plan of operations and found the desired seminary; but, as is often the case in all early efforts, they ended in apparent failure.—Yet, like the child's first attempts to walk, though unsuccessful, they have not been altogether useless; on the contrary, they have at least taught us some important lessons, and thus, I hope, prepared the way for wiser, or perhaps I should rather say, less comprehensive measures.

The history of the Seminary recently opened in this place is exceedingly brief and simple. Experience and observation had conspired to satisfy some among us how difficult it must be, even in the present state of public opinion, to raise funds adequate to the establishment of such a school as the circumstances of the denomination imperiously demand. What then was to be done? Obviously nothing at all, or else only so much as the few deeply interested in the cause of theological education could of themselves accomplish. There appeared no alternative. It was felt that a beginning must be made on a scale so humble as to involve no considerable expense, and believed that money sufficient for this purpose, I mean sufficient to meet the merest necessities of the case, could be raised by subscription from a small number of individuals, who had the good sense to perceive, and the generosity to provide for, one of the most pressing wants of the denomination—that of a Theological Seminary. Could not one hundred Universalists be found, even in the State of New York, who would willingly pay Five Dollars a year for this important purpose? And to give a little degree of permanency to the enterprise, would they not agree to pay this trifling sum annually for the term of five years? With the meagre sum of five hundred dollars, the hope was entertained that a school might be opened, which, though poor and insignificant in comparison with what every important interest of the denomination requires, would still be far superior to any thing ever enjoyed by us before, and which, under ordinary management, could hardly fail to prepare the way for something better and worthier of a large and flourishing Christian sect.

Under these convictions and hopes, the subject was laid before the members of the New York State Convention, at its session in May last, and the plan suggested, met with general approval.—A subscription was immediately opened, and several names were placed upon it. At that time I had little expectation of seeing the measure so soon carried into operation, and still less of being myself intrusted with so important, so responsible a charge as this infant institution necessarily imposes. But soon after the meeting of the Convention, I received an invitation to assume the Principalship of the Clinton Liberal Institute; and to the acceptance of that invitation I was urged in no small degree, by the hope of being here more useful in forwarding this great object, and if possible, of commencing what might at least be a very humble apology for a Theological Seminary. At the time I resolved to embark in this enterprise, there were not, I believe, fifty dollars a year subscribed for the support of the school, but I knew that I had the sympathies and should receive the countenance and encouragement of some of the best men in the Universalist ranks in this State, and I therefore indulged no fears for the result. At present the subscription amounts to only about two hundred and fifty dollars per annum, but I shall be much disappointed if Universalists are wanting in their duty to this young but promising institution.

But it was not the pecuniary means alone that engaged the thoughts and awoke the anxieties of the friends of this measure. There was another of equal, or even more vital concern than this.—That a few hundred dollars could be raised for the support of a Theological Seminary was not to be doubted, but when the school should be once opened, would it be filled with young men preparing for the work of the ministry? This was a question on which, I confess my own expectations were far from being sanguine, and which time and trial alone could determine. And what, thus far, has been the answer?

The Seminary was nominally opened on the 3d of September last, though for the want of books and other causes, little or nothing was done till two or three weeks after that date. At the commencement of the term, there were present three students, and confident expectations were entertained that the number would be increased by the addition of three more before it closed. The first term has now ended, and instead of six students, we have twelve. And judging from my correspondence with several young men in various parts of the country, and from advices otherwise furnished, I can not doubt the summer term will open with twenty students, and that at the expiration of the first year there will not be less than twenty-five students in the Seminary. Such, at least, is the prospect at present. Nothing is more certain than that the young men of the Universalist denomination, who are looking forward to the clerical profession, are also asking themselves how they can best be prepared for its duties. They are seeking the best facilities for this preparation.

I will not insult the denomination by inquiring whether the education of these young men is a matter of indifference to it, and the cause it espouses and defends. For the labors of well educated ministers there is, as we all know, an increasing demand. And how shall it be supplied, if we adopt no means for promoting Theological education.—One fact is certain; the greater number of our candidates for the ministry are quite unable to educate themselves. They are poor and need assistance. That assistance can in part be most effectually rendered by establishing a school where tuition, the use of text books, library, etc., shall be without charge, and where they may enjoy the advice and instruction of some of our most judicious and most learned divines.

That our Seminary here is all this, it were ludicrous to pretend, nor is it to be expected that with the annual sum of $250, or even $500, it is possible to do what the necessities of the denomination demand. In the first place we have no building for the School. For our Theological Seminary, contrary to what has been so thoughtlessly asserted, is no 'department' of the Clinton Liberal Institute, and has no connection with it. For the accommodation of the School I have hired a tolerably convenient room, furnished with plain benches. At first we occupied, like the early Christians, 'an upper room,' and while there, the students, in the true style of Judea, stood during the lesson, the teacher alone enjoying the privilege of being seated. The room contained but a single chair! Could some of our eloquent talkers at the great Convention festival in Boston, have looked in upon the humble appointments of the Theological School at Clinton, I doubt if they would not have lowered their tone somewhat, and concluded it best to have something besides a vacant subscription paper for its support, before they entered largely upon 'glorification.'

In the second place, we are much in want of a sufficient number of text books. Many of the students are unable, with their other necessary expenses, to provide themselves with the class books they should use, and for their want we are obliged to do the best we can with those of an inferior character. It seems to me that books might with equal propriety and ease be furnished, to be the property of the School, and to pass from class to class, thus saving the students an unnecessary outlay at a time when they can least afford it, and effecting all the purposes of the Seminary.

In the third place, we have but a very moderate Theological Library. This consists of the Universalist Historical Society Library, and my own.—It should be the aim of the denomination to commence at an early day the collection of a well selected Theological Library, to constitute a part of the material of a thorough and liberal Theological education.

But in the fourth, and for the present, the last place, the time is not far distant, when the services of another Teacher will be required in this school. Even now, with my other duties, the Theological School occupies nearly all my time. In the spring another class must undoubtedly be formed, and how I can manage to give it that attention which it will require, I confess I do not now clearly see. Under these circumstances I turn my eyes to the east. We have but one Doctor of Divinity in the denomination, and it is as plain as the sun at noon day that he ought to stand at the head of this Divinity School. And he may be placed there any hour when New England, or perhaps I may say Massachusetts, will lay aside a little local feeling, which its neighbors honestly think sometimes produces obliquity of vision, and come out and act nobly for the good of the whole. That a Theological School for Universalists may as well be located here as any where else is quite easily shown; and without any predilection or partialities, I believe it may be satisfactorily proven that Clinton has advantages for this purpose over most other places. It is, perhaps, as near the geographical centre of the Universalist denomination as can be pointed out. It is as easily accessible from the east, west, north and south as any other place.—It is a pleasant village, of good morals, and reputation. It is the seat of a respectable Academy under the control of Universalists; and finally, the expenses of living here are as moderate as any other place equally accessible.

Brethren of the east, will you think of these things?—[Ch. Messenger.] T. J. SAWYER.

LIFE AND TIME.

BY U. CLARK.

'The time is short.' 1 Cor. vii. 29.

Though said by the Apostle on the eve of a great event in which that age was peculiarly interested, yet in our ears may still be repeated the significant sentence—'Time is short.' St. Paul would agitate the minds of his brethren with themes of thrilling interest, which came home to their hearts; and stirred up the slumbering energies of their moral nature. A mighty revolution was rolling on to overturn the established systems of ages, and build up the kingdom of Gospel promise. Calamities wide and devastating were on the approach; and it were well that the little time left, should be seized in its swiftness and be applied to preparing for the great day of divine visitation.

Standing, as we now are upon the verge of those great divisions in time, termed the Old and the New Year, it may become us, as hasty travellers to the Unknown land, to consider the fleetness of our journey. No peculiar event in the history or change of nations may be hanging over us, but every day of our lives goes to make up the great sum of human existence. Count up the years that have gone since the creation of man, and the ages that have fled are made up of those shortest of moments which are passing by unheeded. Second after second has beaten its pulse in the great heart of time, till the Old man has grown grey with the frost of five thousand years. And each little point or minute hand on the dial plate of Time has gone round and round, and made up the great epochs in the history of man. Every moment makes a period in our lives, and these little periods form the chain of events reaching from the past far down into the future. As part after part, privilege after privilege wings its way from the present, we scarcely mark the revolutions going on around us.

'How soon Time flies away! yet as I watch it, Methinks, by the slow progress of this hand, I should have lived an age since yesterday, And have an age to live. Still on it sweeps, Each little moment at another's heels, Till hours, days, years and ages are made up Of such small parts as these, and men look back, Worn and bewildered, wondering how it is. Thou travell'st like a ship in the wide ocean, Which has no bounding shore to mark its progress.'

When life first begins to dawn upon the youth and the giddy world holds out its flattering prospects, the young mind bounds into the future, and longs for Time to hasten its changes. Months are tedious periods hardly to be borne in the impetuosity of youth, and a year seems never to have completed its rounds. Time hangs heavy, and seems to be an enemy that holds us back from the prospects after which we are grasping in the warmth of buoyant hopes. But the aspiring youth soon finds himself into the lapse of years. And how does the boy or girl start up as from a long and pleasing dream, and stand back confounded, when the age of fifteen or twenty is told out by the shrill tongue of Time! And the man of thirty starts again, and feels that life is scarcely begun. But few feel, even in the meridian of their years, that what they have realized is real, or that life to them has really come and is now rapidly hastening to its last drama. Something seems to be still wanting, and that want is Time, into the lap of whose future we anchor all our hopes. Man is seldom content with the present. He looks around him and feels dissatisfied with all that he has enjoyed or attained. The old man turns his feeble gaze back over the wastes of the past, and wonders how the moments have slipped away as they have, and how life has been so fleetingly spent in accomplishing the labor of a day. He no longer wishes the present hour to be gone or the future to come, unless life is worn down to its last stage and the soul years for its final rest. He feels then like the traveller who has been whirled on his journey with such rapidity as to forbid him a moment's pause for observation. Man sets out upon a journey with high ends and hopes in view. But he seems to mistake the means. Can he only arrive at the end, all would appear to be secured. And while he is hurrying on bent upon the accomplishment of his journey, he forgets the thousand objects in his way which call for time and attention. The richest landscapes,—golden streams—beautiful prospects—deep rivers—precious fruits—paths of pleasantness and peace and usefulness—scenes of surpassing delight—treasures of enduring worth along the wood of life, have been swiftly past in that giddy race which is now hurrying to its close. We seem like the child that chases the butterfly, while around us lay the mines of eternal truth, and over our heads hang the fruits of everlasting life, and on either hand arise mountain scenes of grandeur from whose glorious summits is seen the magnificent harvest field of humanity, which bids us 'say not there are yet four months and then cometh the harvest; but to lift up our eyes and hands now, for the field is already inviting the laborer.'

Nothing can be more natural than our lamentations over the shortness of Time. 'Be wise to-day; 'tis madness to defer,' was once a stale and unheeded maxim. But with most of us it is now passed into a stern and rebuking truism. Few or none have lived as they would live had they another life to pass through, through which they would carry with them all the lessons which past experience has impressed upon their minds. How often do we start up and with mortification discover where we have failed. It is then that we boast of what we would do, were it ours to be placed in like circumstances again. How many a ghastly form has shrieked out life upon the dying couch, with the light of this discovery coming too late! Freighted with the dark and spectral deeds of the past, as they come up crowding around the scene of a supposed death bed,—victims have plead and prayed and agonized for life's span to be protracted a little longer to give space for amendment. But, too often, when that prayer has been answered, and death has delayed, and the terrors of his grim visage have gone,—the spared probationer upon Time, has relapsed again into his old habits of life, and no longer remembers his promises of reformation. And this is the frail proneness of our perverted natures. Why do we regret the past and ask for its privileges to return? Could the scene be changed, and Time roll us back upon its wheel to where we once were placed, the same circumstances, perhaps, would still surround us, and who knows whether we should feel or act differently from what we did in our first estate?

What, then, can we do? What shall we do? No moments of sighing or regret can call up the moments that have gone with all their accounts into the eternity of God. It is well that we pause—well that we weep and mourn over the memory of Time wasted and misimproved. But well that we indulge in no childish or despairing emotions.—From the past we may draw deep and heartsearching lessons for the future,—but why need we spend our lives in weeping over the memory of years that can never return? Time is too precious and fleet-winged to be wasted in useless penances. While we feel to regret its wasted moments, let us waste no more of its moments in despondent whimperings. The best way for man to show penitent regret, is to show it by beginning to do the duties he has left undone. Repentance speaks not alone in sighs and tears, but in acts and deeds that atone for the past. Lost Time can be gained only by improving the present. Call up the long-sleeping energies of soul and body, and set them at work now. This desponding lethargy over the past but illy becomes beings of God's image, who should confide in Him to whom are committed the events and destinies of Time. We may regret a thousand things that have transpired and the years that have fled forever. But they have all gone into the great counsels of Him who rules the empires of creation with a benevolent design, and to whose eternity 'a thousand years are as a day.' Life is made up of small parts and pieces, and amidst the multiplicity of things which engage our time and attention, when a month or a year has fled, we can hardly remember what we have been doing. We have gained some knowledge and experience, and, perhaps, improvement; but how, or when, or where, we are unable to tell. We can fix our mind upon no point of Time—and yet we have lived, and acted, and been borne along with the multitudinous tide of human beings. The very knowledge we now have that makes us regret the past, perhaps, was gained during those moments which we are now regretting. All that has transpired with us has gone to make up what we now have and are by the providence of God. It is a glorious faith and confidence in the Great Ruler of events,—which may teach us that all our regrets, our sorrows and delinquencies are permitted to chasten us for the best, the wisest and the most benevolent purposes. In God, then, shall we trust, while we bury the past, seize the present, and hope for the future. These are the three great indissoluble links, which connect man to God and earth to heaven—whose vast unfoldings shall reveal the dispensations of infinite wisdom, when the past, the present and the future shall end in the eternity of God and in the immortality of man.

We tread now upon the threshold of another year in the dismission of human calendars. We stand now upon the grave of buried hopes and smiles and friendships and prospects which shone bright with promise but a twelve month since.—Alas! over the ruin and the blight of that short period, how many now weep and mourn and despair! The tomb has thrown up its dark shadows, and multitudes are seen no more amidst the busy crowds of the living. With the old year have departed twenty millions of our race, and as many more are hastening on to close the death record of the year upon which we have now entered. Pray with the Psalmist, 'So teach us, O God, to number our days, as to apply our hearts to wisdom.' But with true confidence in God's benediction, let us reckon our lives, not by days and weeks and months and years,—but by holy thoughts and purposes—by great and good and noble deeds. It is ours to think of life and Time as the gifts of Heaven—given for high and virtuous attainments.

'That life is long, which answers life's great end.
The time that bears no fruit deserves no name.
The man of wisdom is the man of years.'

Contentment consisteth not in adding more fuel, but in taking away some fire.

THE DEVIL'S DOCTRINE.

BY F. M. ALVORD.

Perhaps there is no one charge, which is more frequently preferred against the believers in the 'great salvation,' than this; that the doctrine of the final and complete salvation of a lapsed and sinful world, is the identical one, preached to our first parents, by the great adversary. Now, why is Universalism, called the devil's doctrine. Do the advocates of the restitution, manifest any particular love, or regard, for the father of lies, or for the doctrine which he inculcates? The serpent told mother Eve, that she should not surely die, on the day of transgression. Or in other words, that she could sin with impunity. Is this Universalism? Does it harmonize with our principles, and our doctrines? Do we ever preach to the world, that sin can ever go unpunished? Do we ever say, that 'great peace have they,' who riot amid scenes of dissipation and death? That there is happiness and joy in the hard way of the transgressor? On the contrary, is it not a distinguishing feature of our theology, that sin and misery are inseparably connected, that 'though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished?' Most certainly. Why then say, that we preach the serpent's doctrine? It is an undeniable fact, that Universalists are the only denomination of Christians that believe in the absolute certainty of the punishment of all transgression and crime—that positively and unequivocally declare that there is no possible escape for the guilty sons and daughters of Adam; but on the contrary ever preach that misery and sorrow and mental anguish, invariably follow in the wake of transgression. And yet, men will have the temerity to accuse us of advocating the serpent's doctrine!

But our object in writing this article, was to relate a short controversy, which we had about a year ago, with a Christian minister, upon this subject. We were preaching in an adjoining town upon the nature and happy influences of Gospel faith and hope—their tendency to inspire joy in the heart,—to dry the tear of sorrow, and to lead men to an humble and confiding trust in God—in the rectitude of his government, and in the benignity of all his judgments. There were two Christian clergymen present, and one of them begged the privilege of 'reading a few plain passages of Scripture.' Of course it was granted. He proceeded to quote many passages of Scripture, without note or comment. Among these, were Gen. iii: 2. 'And the serpent said unto the woman, ye shall not surely die.' To this we replied, in substance, as follows. 'Br. B. quoted this passage of Scripture for the purpose of carrying the impression that Universalism is the devil's doctrine. Though he made no application of it, yet this, obviously, was his object. It is a serious charge, my friends, to accuse, either directly or indirectly, a denomination of Christians, as being in fellowship with the arch adversary, in propagating doctrines to deceive and delude mankind. And especially, such charges should never be preferred without the most convincing evidence. And how stands the case here? Suppose now, that there is such a being in the universe, as a personal, omnipresent and omnipotent devil. Suppose also, that Br. B. and myself are travelling in company, and we meet the evil one, with his cloven foot, and with all his infernal apparatus.—Nothing daunted, we enter into a conversation with his satanic majesty. He asks me, what doctrine I preach, I reply: I preach in the language of inspiration, that the seed of the woman, shall bruise the serpent's head. That sin shall be finished, and transgression ended. That the devil and his works shall be destroyed. That your dark empire shall come to an end—your kingdom annihilated, and that you, yourself, shall at last, go down to the tomb of eternal oblivion,

* Unwept, unhonored and unsung.

Not very well pleased with this doctrine, he turns to Br. B. and inquires what he preaches.—He receives the following answer: 'Why, sin, I preach that, notwithstanding it is written of Christ that he shall finish sin, destroy the devil, and save the world, yet it is all a delusion. For sin will never be finished, the last enemy will never be destroyed, and the world will never be saved. For your kingdom shall last forever. Your dark sceptre shall be swayed over countless millions of God's intelligences, as long as his throne shall stand.—The time will never come, no, not in the long cycles of eternity, when you will not have more subjects, more influence and more power than Christ, or the eternal Father.' Now which doctrine think you, would the devil acknowledge as his own? Which would please him most?

Now, is not this a fair representation of what both Partialists and Universalists believe, in regard to Satan? Do not the former all declare that he shall exist throughout eternity's wasteless ages, while the latter, with one accord, affirm, that Christ's triumphs shall be so complete, that not even one enemy in the wide universe shall be left, to blight the hopes, impair the peace, and mar the happiness of the children of the resurrection? Why then say, that we are the devil's preachers? Who will answer?

FREE AGENCY.

Much is at the present day said of man's free agency, by which he is empowered to do just what he pleases, or in other words the right to do good or evil as it may best suit him. This idea has been introduced into the church for the purpose of surmounting a difficulty which exists in the doctrine of eternal election and reprobation. This doctrine, it is seen, detracts from the goodness of God, in that it makes him purpose the misery of a part of his children, which can not be made to harmonize with his nature. To obviate this difficulty and to throw the blame upon the creature, the doctrine of free agency is introduced, by which man makes his own eternal destiny just what he pleases whether joyful or wretched.

But in obviating this difficulty they have run into another more absurd if possible than the first. They have made the Divine wisdom, in arranging his plan, and devising means by which to accomplish his object, introduce into the scheme a principle peculiarly calculated to thwart his purposes. viz: He has, in the arrangement, given man a power over which he himself holds no control; and that too, with a perfect knowledge of the sinfulness of man's nature; by which he may ruin himself to all eternity; thus charging him with folly in that his arrangement is not adapted to the accomplishment of the object which he designed.

To show the true light in which this presents the Deity let me suppose a case. A Father has a family of children, whom he loves and whose happiness he desires. He arranges a plan by which to gratify his own desires and benefit his children. Among other things he grants a free use of intoxicating drinks, knowing at the same time he grants the indulgence that the children have a strong inclination for its use. The result is this; the children, or at least a part of them, by an exercise of the liberty which the father has conferred upon them, become intemperate and thus destroy their peace, thwarting the object had in view by the parent. I need not tell you that the parent who would do thus with such a knowledge, is short sighted and foolish, for you must discover it at once. The illustration applies well to God; who has a family of children in whom he delights and which he would make happy; for he grants them among other things, a free use of sin with all its intoxicating and peace-destroying power, with a full knowledge of the inclination of his children.

This doctrine with its indulgence destroys the accountability of man in that it gives him the same liberty to sin that it does to practice virtue; consequently in practicing either, he is not violating the freedom of the will which has been given him. A parent presents a child with a cup of milk which the child knows is nourishing, and also with a glass of alcohol, which he knows is injurious, and tells him that he may drink just which he pleases.—Does the child in drinking the alcohol, although he knows its injurious effects, violate any requisition of the parent? Most certainly not, but he violates a law which he knows exists in his own nature.—This being the case, it will be seen the parent grants the child liberty to violate a law of his nature, thus charging him with inconsistency to say the least.

But says a reader, 'has not God said to man, 'choose ye this day whom ye will serve; if the Lord be God, serve him, and if Baal, then serve him?' I answer no. He has never uttered such language. By referring to the 24th chap. of Joshua it will be seen that Joshua, after the children of Israel had entered upon the promised land, recounts to them the blessings they had received at the hand of the Lord; and, in view of them, calls upon them to serve him, but adds, 'If it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord,' or if you will not serve him, 'choose ye this day whom ye will serve;—whether the gods which your fathers served which were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites in whose land ye dwell.' The liberty of choice it will be perceived was only between two evils, upon the principle of the old adage, 'of two evils choose the least.' By a recurrence to 1st Kings xviii: 21, we find the other part of the old antiquated passage which the reader quoted, and by an examination thereof it will be seen that there is no permission given to serve Baal only upon condition that he should prove to be God.—The old idea that man has liberty to serve God or the devil is without foundation, and the matter appears in its true light, viz: that he has liberty to serve none but the true God, the Lord of heaven and earth.

But says the reader, is not man a free agent?—I answer, not in the sense in which the phrase is used. Man, it is true, is free to do as he wills, but he has no freedom farther than this. He has no freedom of willing; this is under the control of another, and by this he is constituted an agent and by it bound. The term agency implies a binding, if not, there is no responsibility on the part of the agent. I said he had no liberty to will, I do not mean by this, that he has no power to do so, but simply that he has no liberty. If he has, he has a liberty to fight against God. But although man has the power of willing, a moment's reflection will show that even this, is controlled by circumstances; consequently under the circumstances which exist, he can not avoid willing as he does. I will show this by a simile. A parent presents his child with an Eagle and a Dollar, with the value of which the child is perfectly well acquainted.—He says to the child, 'you may have just which of these you please. The one is just as free as the other, and in taking either, you will not impoverish me.' I ask, under such circumstances, especially is the child in want, can it will to take the Dollar in preference to the Eagle? Most certainly not; for the preponderance of power, or the motive to choose, is such as to forbid it.

Man, it is true, wills the less instead of the greater, in willing to do wrong; but it is through a false impression that he shall be benefited by it, which impression is opposed to his knowledge of right and by willing which he becomes criminal. The operation of a controlling power I can no better illustrate than by a familiar figure. A father calls his son to him and says, 'George, you have been obedient for a long time, and as a reward therefore you may do what you please to-morrow.' The child has a great relish for various amusements, and in an instant begins to resolve in his mind what he will do. He finally decides to spend the day in hunting, which is a very dangerous amusement.—The father knowing the inclination of the child, and that he loves books as well and better than hunting, purchases some that are new and interesting, and in the morning presents them to his son.—George being, as I said, a greater lover of books than of hunting, immediately forms a new determination, giving up the old, and spends the day in examining his new books. In this instance it will be seen that the child willed as he pleased, but at the same time, the father controlled that will.

On this hypothesis it will be seen that the control of the will is in a power higher than man, consequently that he is a creature dependent in a great measure on circumstance, thus demonstrating the fact that we are not our own keepers. Where then, say you, lies the criminality of man? I answer, in his receiving this or that as being the most beneficial, or the greatest good, when at the same time the higher order of his intellect or rather his conscience, teaches him that another is the true course, or in other words, in cultivating the lower instead of the higher sentiments, or violating the dictates of his own conscience.

This to my mind is the true doctrine of agency, teaching as it does that God, ruleth all things, and directeth according to the counsel of his own will.

ELDER HOLMES AND BR. TAINTOR.

Harford, Jan. 12th, 1846.

BR. SKINNER—I notice in the Magazine and Advocate of the 9th inst., a letter from that famous builder of 'A house upon the sand,' Elder D. Holmes, in which he speaks of his challenge to me for a public oral discussion of the two main propositions of my sermon which were,

1. Men are to be saved from sin, and not from punishment.

2. Salvation is for the whole family of man and not merely for a part of it.

The Elder's challenge reads as follows. 'Though you made five propositions [for publishing our sermons] in your letter, there is one proposition which for some reason you omitted. I will supply this deficiency by making the following propositions, viz: 'If we can agree upon preliminaries that will be fair and satisfactory—and you will open your church at Virgil, [meaning Harford] I will meet you in open debate on the two main points in your sermon, as follows:

1. Does the Bible teach the doctrine of salvation from punishment?

2. Does the Bible teach that no human being will, or can ever be lost?

To which I replied as follows—'To this proposition I remark, 1st. Your first question is well enough as far as it goes, but it does not cover the whole ground in dispute between us, and you have no others that supply the deficiency. 2nd. Your second question has the very singular merit of being a negative question, and if debated would exhibit the novelty of requiring the negative to precede in the debate. 3d. I not only believe that human beings can be, have been, and now are lost, but I also believe that Jesus Christ came into the world 'to seek and to save that which was lost,' and that he will finish the work which he came to do. You will therefore undoubtedly discover that this question is not a very proper one for me to debate. 4th. I have no inclination at present to engage with any man in such a discussion. 5th. I look upon this proposition for a discussion as a mere effort to raise the dust to cover your inglorious retreat.

If, however, you are desirous, or even willing, to engage in an oral discussion of the following conjoint questions:—

Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of endless punishment for any portion of the human family? or

Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of the final salvation of all men?

I will procure a man, an honorable opponent, to meet you in the Union Church, Harford, at such time, and under such preliminary arrangements, as you and he may agree upon. 'These proposals have not yet been withdrawn.'

In his reply he acknowledges that he had not correctly stated the proposition of my discourse, and then states the questions thus:—

1. Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of salvation from deserved punishment?

2. Do the Scriptures teach that all men, indiscriminately, must, and will be, finally, and inevitably saved?

He then extended the 'area of freedom' a little, by saying, 'if, as you intimate, you are unwilling to engage in it—though I am not so anxious for controversy as to hold myself open to meet any one that may be named—yet, if Mr. Brown or Mr. Clark, choose to take your place, I have no objection.'

Thinking it was not his prerogative to point out whom I might choose to take my place in the debate, I replied to him as follows:—'In conclusion I would return to you my most sincere and heartfelt thanks for your kindness, in pointing out whom I might select as my substitute to meet you in open debate, thinking that I shall duly appreciate your favors when I am under obligation to accept either of the individuals you name. At present I think myself capable of selecting my own man. And I would here state to you as plainly as possible, that I have no desire to engage with any man, in an oral discussion of any subject whatever. But if you wish to have an oral discussion of the doctrines at issue between Partialists and Universalists, you have only to signify it by accepting the proposition of my last letter. You need not be afraid of great men, for I do not think it necessary to bring out a cannon to kill a fly. You have had one discussion already,* and your dimensions are definitely known, even if you do propose to discuss in writing the propositions of your forthcoming pamphlet, with any respectable Universalist preacher in the wide world.'

'These proposals have not yet been withdrawn,' and never will be.

You will see from the above, how the matter of an oral discussion stands between myself and Elder D. Holmes. And should he ever conclude to accept the above proposition, I will endeavor to have my man 'on hand,' and ready to discuss this matter, to his heart's content.

Yours truly, but in haste.

ERVING TAINTOR.

P. S. The reason why the Elder did not have any more of my sermon in his pamphlet, is because he never asked for any more. I presume he had all he wanted.

MESMERISM.

We give the following communication from a well known correspondent, a place in our columns; and our readers must take it for what it is worth. In answer to the questions of Br. A. C., we remark that we are not acquainted with Mr. Poe, and know not that we ever read any of his writings on this subject, but the article we published on the Vankirk case: and whether that was truth or fiction we had no means of knowing. We left our readers to judge for themselves. We do not intend to make the subject a leading one in our columns. But as it is exciting much interest in some minds, we are willing to publish occasionally such facts or statements concerning it, as its friends may desire for the information of the public. We have seen enough to satisfy us that it is not all humbug—that there is some truth in it; but how much, time only can determine. We care not whence truth comes if we do but obtain it—whether from the Bible, reason, philosophy, phrenology, mesmerism, or any other science, so we are satisfied it is truth. We believe the Bible to be true—and that no other truth can be opposed to it. We have never read the 'Valdemar case' referred to by Br. A. C. and consequently are unprepared to express any opinion concerning it. Possibly some correspondent may be able to give some light on the subject.

D. S.

BR. SKINNER—I wish here to address you on a somewhat different subject; and I was about to write for the Magazine and Advocate. But as to that, I will leave it with you. I wish to know how you wish to be understood on the subject of Animal Magnetism. About a year ago an article appeared from the pen of Edgar A. Poe, which was copied into many of the New York city papers, afterwards, that is, last summer it appeared in the Luminary, and then in the fall following in the Advocate, though not mentioning the name of the magnetizer, Edgar A. Poe. After that Br. Skinner next introduced an extract from the 'Seherin of Prevorst.' This last, however, was accompanied with suitable remarks. I have perused the work and say, with Br. Skinner, I shall not deny that it is true. I have no doubt the Seherin had all the appearances, at least the thoughts. But to tell the truth, it appears to me like reviving the days of Witchcraft. I do not think the work will do the rising generation any good, especially the juvenile portion of community. I think the work ought to be suppressed, at least, from our children. Were they all to peruse it, they would soon fear their own shadow in the night, if not in the day time.

But what I wish more particularly to call your attention to, is the introduction of Mr. Poe's articles on the subject of Mesmerism or Animal Magnetism in our papers without note or comment. Do you introduce his 'revelation' in which a Mr. Vankirk was the subject mesmerized, and which appeared in the public prints about a year since, as a matter of fact, or of fiction? How are we to understand that article? you have not stated. Mr. Poe we understand is allowed to amuse the reader with a great deal of fiction. Somebody said he was a professed Christian. If this article was designed as fiction, then we must allow that he is sceptical on the subject of Mesmerism, and to make it appear ridiculous, it would seem he would do as all opposers do to the systems they wish to invalidate, viz: carry them to the greatest possible extremity and further. I do not say this is so in the Vankirk case. If this is fiction it exhibits some of the cogitations of a brain busily employed in deep thinking, though perhaps opposed to Mesmerism. But in the 'Valdemar case' none can deny.

This I suppose you have seen as it has made its appearance in the 'Quarterly Review,' 'Evening Journal,' and I suppose will be next in the Advocate; headed perhaps as the Journal does, 'Facts in the Valdemar case.' But are they facts as there 'succinctly' given by Mr. Poe? We should like to know. Mr. Poe says the 'extraordinary case of Mr. Valdemar has excited discussion,' &c. 'It is now rendered necessary (he says) that I give the facts as far as I comprehend them myself. They are succinctly these,' &c. &c. He speaks of Harlaem, N. Y., as being the residence of his subject, Mr. Valdemar—of his person—of the two attending physicians—of the two nurses, &c. &c. But are facts and fiction one and the same thing? Can a man talk through the organs of a mass of putrefaction, and that too seven months after the death of the body?!! If Mr. Poe writes fiction, and if he has the common sense that has been generally attributed to him, he would at least give us something probable. Verily my bump of credulity is not large enough for all this; though I must confess I am not sceptical on the subject of Magnetism. As to its truth, I have not the least doubt. Phrenology also I have tested the truth of to my satisfaction through the agency of Animal Magnetism. All the different organs as located by Gaul and Spurzheim, responding to their exercise in the Magnetic sleep. After putting my subject in this state, I have excited the different organs, viz: time, tune, mirthfulness and philoprogenitiveness, all at one and the same time, and so of the rest. But this making dead people talk or suspending death for seven months, through the agency of Magnetism, is altogether a new revelation. Come Br. Skinner, tell us the facts about this Edgar A. Poe, and the 'Valdemar case.' Let us know what we may rely upon as fact, and also what as fiction.

Yours respectfully,

A. C.

POEM.

Written by Mast. Benjamin Snow, aged 16, a member of the Auburn Sabbath School, and spoken at the late Christmas Exhibition in Auburn.

There's music in the rivulet,
As it swiftly flows along;
There's music in the wild bird's note,
In its soft and mellow song.

There's music in the ocean's roar,
When its waves rise mountain high;
It shows that there's a Power above,
Who rules in earth and sky.

There's music in the rushing wind
Which sweeps o'er sea and land
It speaks to us in accents loud
Of God's supreme command.

Thus in the works of Nature wide,
Is seen by all who look,
The proofs divine of holy truth
Revealed in God's own Book.

Oh! sweet to me that Book of God
Which tells of sins forgiven—
Its sacred pages teach us plain
There's a home for us in Heaven!—

Where angel voices sweetly sing,
A song of praise to him,
Who calmly died to bless us all,
And save a world from sin.

BEREAVEMENTS AND CROSSES IN LIFE.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

When we look abroad upon this earth, which the Creator of all things hath made to be the dwelling place of us, his frail and erring children, how much more of beauty than deformity is beheld; and when we go still farther, and contemplate the capacities for enjoyment, with which all are endowed, and the innumerable sources from whence springs food, if it may be so termed, suited to these capacities—when we compare the joys with the sorrows, the causes of gladness with those of grief, what heart is there so devoid of gratitude, as to refuse its tribute of thanksgiving and praise to the Giver of all good, or who that will deny, that we have abundant reasons for believing, that life with all its apparent and asserted evils, was bestowed upon mankind by its Author, to be enjoyed as a rich boon and invaluable blessing?

But as in this world, however fair and beautiful as a whole, there are objects upon which the eye would choose to close, rather than linger, so also, we can not deny, that in life there are causes for pain—and with all our enjoyment and happiness, there are disappointments, crosses, and bereavements. How often indeed, do we hear the exclamation, as if wrung from souls writhing in agony, 'why, why upon me was sent this severe trial? or why was suffered to come upon me this affliction so much greater than I can bear?' And shall we say, that this spirit of questioning is always one of rebellion?

Let us look upon this lone being, who with quivering limbs and tottering step, is nearing the end of her long and toilsome journey. Once youth was hers, and the brow now so shrivelled, was then smooth and fair. Love, and hope, and joy, were then hers; and the eye now so sunken and lustreless, then sparkled, and with kindling glances, answered back the emotions of other young and happy bosoms—the lips now so tremulous were then wreathed in smiles, and the cheek now so furrowed, then glowed with the flush of beauty. How changed! and, but for him on whom she leans so confidently, she wonders how she could pursue her journey; for he is her 'only son, and she is a widow.' He is her staff, but health, and vigor, and elasticity, are in his limbs. He is her comfort, as well as support; for kindness rules his actions, and gentleness marks his demeanor. How could she live without him! He will lead her to the tomb, and how much more cheerfully will the pathway be trod than it would be, were there none to smooth its roughness, and uphold her trembling limbs! He will close her eyes and lay her quietly in her bed of rest, and his tears will water the flowers he will plant above her resting place; and how much more cheering the reflection, than if there were none of her kindred to perform the last duties which the dead claim of the living! But suddenly, and in an 'evil hour,' the destroyer comes, and her staff, her support, and perhaps her only comfort, is stricken; and motionless and lifeless he is conveyed before her to the tomb. Shall we reprove her grief, or forbid her words, when she exclaims, 'Oh, why am I thus smitten?' Rather would not our sympathies and impulses, prompt us to join her in asking, why he could not have been a little longer spared.

The widowed, who is aged and childless, has cause indeed for sorrow; but because all grief is not fashioned like hers, is it less sincere, or more censurable? Draw a little aside the curtain to this darkened room; but do not enter, for here is a privacy too sacred for intrusion. See that female of fragile form, who with bowed head, clasps almost convulsively a child too young to know the reason of its mother's altered mien. She is alone with her living and her dead, and oh, merciful Heaven! she realizes this to its fullest import! She removes the covering from his face now so cold, so rigidly pale, yet to her all beautiful, and with what unspeakable anguish does her bosom heave! Sobs and groans take the place of calmer grief, and how vain, how idle, are all the words which have been spoken to her for consolation! She does not think of the blessings which are left her yet; but step by step, she retraces the two short years of vanished time, to the day when they two entered life together, with ardent hopes and joyous anticipations. Their plans for domestic enjoyment are recalled—their seasons of connubial happiness, his affection for his babe, his devotion to her, and then again comes the consciousness that these are all at an end—that he the partaker, ay, as she feels, the author of them all, is before her for the last time, and cold in death! Check her not, when she asks, why she is thus smitten, but let her ask on, till grief hath done its work, and the Comforter shall come, and whisper her resignation and peace.

Oh, Death! thou art the destroyer of earthly hopes and happiness, as well as of life, but not to thy power alone, is confined the bestowal of sorrow and misery. Ask of those parents, who though worn down with weariness and watching, yet strive against exhaustion, and appear incapable of partaking of sleep or repose, what to them would afford a remission of the agony of feeling which their tear-swollen eyes and haggard expressions so painfully denote, and they will answer, relief to our child though death shall be the bearer. It will be hard, they will say, hard indeed, for us to part with one so dear, but oh, it is agonizing to hear her groans of suffering, and shrieks of pain. We have stood by her cradle, and seen her with forth-reaching arms and beseeching eyes, implore of us, as from those who she, in the ignorance of childhood, believed could grant what was asked—something to make her better—we have administered all that physicians could advise, or parental fondness could dictate, and with an eagerness and anxiety which none others than those in similar circumstances could feel, watched for their effect, till hours have multiplied into days, and long nights have followed, and still she has grown 'nothing better, but worse.' We have thought of Him who, all love, is said to regard his children with more of affection than does a mother her infant babe, and in our prayers strove to maintain strong our faith, and firm our trust; but we have asked, it may be, in sinfulness, though it was wrong forth by suffering, why, if He has power, is our child permitted thus to suffer?

When scenes like these are contemplated, we think those who are exempt from such causes for sorrow, should be continually thankful, and with gratitude and thanksgiving, remember only their blessings. But is it thus? Ah, no. Our sorrows are expansive, and when comparative slight causes for unhappiness disturb the pleasurable current of life, we deem that our hearts are full, and that seldom ever was mortal more miserable. Dishonor and disgrace mark the footsteps of some one with whom our reputation is connected;—sickness lays its withering hand on ourselves or those closely bound to us; some warm friend becomes estranged; an enemy seeks and accomplishes an injury; nay, even lesser causes, some valuable possession passes into other hands, an expectation has proved vain, a hope has been blighted; and for all these, unpleasant it is true they may be in themselves, is heard the voice of complaint, and questioning with regard to the goodness and kindly dealings of Providence. For such slight causes as these last mentioned, the voice of wailing should never be heard. But that there are deep sorrows, and intense sufferings in life, our unskilled pen has all too faintly pictured, but in truth borne witness.

How many of my readers have drunk deeply of 'this cup,' I know not, nor how soon it may be mine to quaff as deeply as any; but is the question still, why does He who is as omnipotent in power as he is infinite in mercy, permit suffering to exist? 'For our good and profit, that we may be made partakers of his holiness.' This answer has been often read, and more frequently quoted; but it will not convince the understanding until the heart has felt its import. No, not until, as by a refiner's fire, we have been tried by sorrow, can we realize its truth and beauty. But let us, creatures of such frailty and imperfect knowledge, reflect ere we detract aught from the goodness of the great Ruler of all things. When did ever a continued season of prosperity tend to bring out or cultivate any of the best and holiest feelings of man's nature? When, without trials and tribulations, did man's faith ever grow stronger, his hopes brighter, or his trust firmer? Never; and though we may have sorrows and suffering, and because we 'see as through a glass darkly,' we can not always see the good which is to follow, let us still trust in God, and with patience, submission and resignation, follow on in the footsteps of the Captain of our salvation, who was 'made perfect through suffering.'

UNION AND HARMONY IN SOCIETIES.

The importance of union, harmony, concert and perseverance of action in all societies, and especially in all religious societies, is universally felt and acknowledged by all reflecting and closely observing minds. Its value can not be over estimated; and nothing can supply the want of it. A society may be rich, have a splendid meeting-house, employ an eloquent and gifted minister, be furnished with the richest toned church organ and the best choir of musicians, and even have a large and fashionable congregation in regular attendance upon their public services; and yet, if there is no union and harmony among its members, no concert of action; if there be discord, envy, jealousy, ill-will, hatred and strife among the members of such society, it can never prosper—the seeds of death are in it, and will ultimately develop themselves in fatal results. Unless the discords can be healed and the bad feelings removed inevitable ruin awaits it. It matters not what denomination it is, whether Catholic or Protestant, Calvinistic, Arminian, Universalist or Unitarian, the society can never prosper, without union and harmony among its constituent members.

Take, for example, a society enjoying a moderate degree of prosperity, with a neat and commodious church built and paid for, and a minister settled with them of fair talents and character. Let two of the leading members get into a quarrel, use bitter and acrimonious words to and about each other, draw in partisans to their quarrel on both sides, and carry matters to extremes—accusations and recriminations, litigations and contentions without end ensue. And if both are not equally guilty, or even if they are, the one who feels, or pretends to feel, himself the most aggrieved, will perhaps say, 'I can not worship at the same altar and will not attend the same meeting with my enemy.' From that time he ceases to attend the meetings of the society, and either stays at home on the Sabbath, or goes to another place of worship and gives his support to another and a different doctrine. Soon, another similar breach occurs among other members, and another withdraws from the meeting, and another, and another, till some half dozen, or a dozen, of the members wholly withdraw their attendance and support from the meeting, where they once regularly attended and believed, and still believe, the doctrine taught, but will no longer go to hear it, because, forsooth, somebody else does, who, they think, does not live up to the spirit of the doctrine!

Again, the minister broaches a subject, introduces a topic, or makes a remark, or performs some trivial act, that gives offence to some—they think he had no business to meddle with the subject, or it was not at a proper time and place that he did it. And although he was honest and sincere, and meant no harm, yet they will ever after absent themselves from his ministrations and refuse him their support, because they think for once he acted or spoke injudiciously or improperly! And can any society expect to prosper, whose members are thus testy, petulant, thus easily provoked, and thus difficult to reconcile? If so, they may rest assured their expectations will be disappointed. They never can prosper thus.

In the supposed case of the quarrelling members, let me ask the seceding brother, whether he has done right in withdrawing from the society and its meetings? Did you consider it a duty enjoined on you by the Gospel to withdraw? Or did you not rather consult passion and yield to the impulse of ungoverned temper? I trow it was the latter. Did you pursue the course with your offending brother, pointed out in the Gospel? Did you first go to him alone, and in the spirit of meekness and love, tell him of his fault and seek reconciliation? Failing in this, did you, secondly, take with you two or three others, and in their presence, in the spirit of the Master, seek reconciliation? And failing in this, did you, thirdly, tell the matter to the church, or society, and seek for reconciliation through their interposition and instrumentality? If you have not taken all these steps you have disobeyed the Master's injunctions. And if you have taken all these steps and failed of effecting a reconciliation, still you are not justified in withdrawing from the society. You are still bound to attend its meetings and give it your support, if you believe its doctrines are the truth of God. Did the early disciples withdraw from Jesus and abandon the cause, because publicans and sinners ate with him and listened to his gracious words? Did the apostles forsake him and his doctrines, because one of their own number betrayed and another denied him? Surely not. Neither can you innocently withdraw from the profession and support of the truth because a brother has done wrong or treated you unkindly. Indeed, by withdrawing, you abandon the very means that Heaven has appointed as the medium of reconciliation and peace with your offending brother; and therefore you sin in this act, if you have not done so before. Who knows but what your continued attendance on divine worship with the offender, and listening to the same soul-stirring truths, and worshipping at the same altar, may ultimately soften his heart (and perchance your own likewise), and bring your hearts and hands together with tears of mutual penitence, forgiveness and reconciliation?

But suppose the case to be still worse than the above—suppose, if you please, that the society itself has done wrong—that a majority of its members have been misled—that it has taken the wrong side of the question between you and your offending brother, (though possibly it is your own judgment that is in fault,) or that in other matters it has done wrong—that it has dismissed a worthy minister, for a trifling or mere imaginary fault, or for no fault at all, who you think ought to have been retained; or that it has employed an unworthy minister, one who you believe to be unworthy of fellowship and support, or done any other act that you disapprove; are you, even in such case, justified in forsaking the society?

I answer no; certainly not. For your presence, your influence and your action are more necessary now than ever. You are bound to stay with them; and if they have done wrong, to seek to right that wrong—to bring them back to the true and right path. 'Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth!' 'A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;' and your presence and action may save the society from still greater wrong; and bring it back to duty, truth and God. On no account therefore leave it while you believe its doctrines to be true.

Again, in the case supposed of members leaving the society, and abandoning its meetings, because they have taken offence at a word, an expression or an act, of their preacher that did not exactly accord with all their notions of propriety; let me ask, are such men justified in the course they pursue? Let me ask them, are your certain your own ideas of propriety are correct and that the minister was wrong? Are you certain that all sensible and prudent men would agree with you, instead of him, in relation to it? If so, have you ever gone to him, like a Christian, and kindly told him of his fault, if it was one, and expostulated with him, and sought to correct his practice? If so, are you certain that he meant to do wrong; or that he had any evil intention? You answer, 'O, no; but he was imprudent—he mistook his duty and true interest, and I will never hear him preach again!' But stop, brother, let me ask again, Have you never done wrong, or made a misstep in life? Do you expect perfection in any man? Do you expect to find a minister entirely free from faults—one whose judgment is never at fault, and all whose thoughts, words and deeds are the ne plus ultra of perfection? If so, let me assure you you will never find such an one. You acknowledge your minister is a good man and a good preacher—that he means to do right; but he erred once, perhaps twice, through imperfection of knowledge or weakness of judgment; and for this you will abandon and forsake him! Pray God that he may not deal with you as you do with your minister.

Nay, brother; forsake not your minister; leave not your society; abandon not the cause—neither of the former for any trifling consideration, nor the latter for any consideration. If your society has done wrong, still stay with them, be one among them and try to rectify the wrong and repair the mischief. If your minister has done wrong, or made a mistake through error of judgment, forsake him not, but go to him like a man and a Christian brother, advise with him, and be his true friend; and he will listen to you, and be more cautious ever after, if he is a good man, as you say he is. But as long as he is your pastor and the choice of a majority of your society, being of good standing and unblemished reputation in the denomination, forsake him not, but adhere to and give him your cordial support. But on the other hand, if he be a bad man, (though I take it for granted your society would not employ such an one if they knew it,) or, being a good man, a majority of your society believe his talents and manner not such as to promote the best interests of the cause, why then, act with the majority, and dismiss him, and employ one whose standing, talents and manner will be calculated to advance the cause of truth in your society. But never forsake your minister for a trivial cause, nor leave the society and its meetings in a pet, but 'hope on, hope ever,' act on and act ever for the good of the cause, and use all your energies and influence for its promotion and advancement in the world, and especially for the maintenance of union, harmony and peace in your society. Union is strength and life. Discord is weakness and death.

'It must needs be that offences will come; but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh.' Let not this sin rest upon thy head. There are enough other causes of offence without thy efforts to multiply them. Avoid them then as you would the most deadly pestilence. 'Seek for those things that make for peace, and things whereby one may edify (not offend) another.' 'Great peace have they that love thy law and nothing shall offend them.' 'Blessed are the peace makers; for they shall be called the children of God.'

CLINTON, N. Y. AND THE LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

I can make no pretensions to talent or tact, in the science of tour-writing. The very idea of parading the fact in print—that Mr. A. received me with every demonstration of kindness and pleasure; and that his amiable, and accomplished, and excellent wife, actually provided a fine cup of tea for my refreshment after the fatigue of riding half a mile—brings over me a faintness and lassitude that defies my powers of resistance. Besides I have always deemed it extremely hazardous for a visiting clergyman to speak very confidently of the condition, progress, and prospects of societies with which he is not intimately acquainted. He is exceedingly liable to be misled by appearances; and because there happens to be a full house, and some other indications of zeal, to overrate the fact. Not a few mistakes of this kind have occurred among us—to the great annoyance of the sober part of the congregation interested, and very little to the credit of the glorifying minister.

But those who are aware that Clinton was for many years not only my home, but the scene of my most arduous labors—that the friends and enemies of liberal Christianity—the old and young there, are all personally known to me—those I say will hardly believe that I am liable to any important misapprehension respecting the state of affairs in that place.

A recent visit of some two weeks, in that village, has enabled me to form an opinion of the condition of the Universalist society and of the Liberal Institute—to the former the Rev. T. J. Sawyer now statedly ministers; and of the latter, the public is aware that he is the Principal. And while for the last two years a very efficient and successful ministry has been exerted there by Rev. D. S. Morey, he will not deem it invidious when it is said, that the society was never more prosperous than at the present time. The Free Church—in other words, the Universalist Meeting House, was originally built, without a porch and with the pulpit in front,—an arrangement which proved greatly to the discomfort of the preacher, and which most effectually neutralized all attempts to warm the house to the standard of human comfort. By the zeal and enterprise of the ladies of the congregation, these inconveniences have been not merely remedied, but removed. A substantial entry embracing the gallery stairs, has succeeded the pulpit, which has been both wisely and benevolently placed at the other end of the house. The congregation has increased with the means of comfort—and where, while shivering with the cold, I have spoken to some thirty or fifty equally cold hearers—there is now a well filled house of comfortable and attentive listeners to the message of eternal truth.

The time is also favorable to the progress of liberal principles in that village. The several sects—Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, have respectively exhausted their energies and wearied the public, with successive efforts to promote a state of morbid religious excitement. And after some ten years of exertion, the usual reaction is beginning to be felt throughout the community. Under these circumstances—with the ministerial capabilities of Mr. Sawyer, with the increasing activity of the Universalist society, with a circle of females unsurpassed for talents, worth and zeal, every thing compatible with reason, may be hoped for the advancement of Universalism in Clinton.

I have so long and so repeatedly asked the public attention—and especially the attention of Universalists, to the Liberal Institute, that any thing which I can say respecting it, will probably be regarded as a matter of course. Be it so—for it is difficult to find a respectable reason why that institution has not always, as a matter of course, attracted the consideration and awakened an interest in the minds of the great body of Universalists in this State. It may therefore be expected, that when a good word can be spoken for the Institute, I shall not hesitate to utter it—whatever may be the light in which it is regarded.

The public has already been informed by Mr. Sawyer, that the noble and spacious building occupied by the Male Department, had been thoroughly repaired and painted.

Early in September he took charge of the Institution; and being effectually sustained by the other Professors, as well as by the Executive Committee—a new order of things was soon apparent. The confidence of the denomination was to a great extent revived; and before the close of the first term, both patrons and pupils were very generally satisfied, that all the legitimate ends of the Institution were at length to be realized. There was energy and kindness in the government of the school, respect and obedience in the pupils, and order, harmony, and prosperity in every department. And it is confidently believed, that the management and course of instruction are at this time, as near what they should be, as in any similar institution in the State or the Union, and therefore all that its friends and the public have a right to expect.

In the meantime, the Female Department of the Institute, which had been languishing several years, has again revived under the patient toil and judicious management of Miss Richards, sustained by the efficient co-operation of the agent, (Mr. Morey,) and other friends. Parents are once more turning their attention to this branch of the Institute; and pupils are coming in—their reasonable expectations are gratified—and there can be little doubt that the summer term will open with as large a number of female pupils as ever attended the institution. What honorable reason can exist why it should not be so? Are there not daughters enough in the Universalist families of this State—and who will be sent to school somewhere, to fill this department of the Institute to overflowing? Will not the wealth be expended in the tuition of these daughters, whether they be sent to Clinton or elsewhere? What then is wanting to secure their attendance at the Institute? Nothing, but the perception that it is wiser and better to educate them under our own auspices, than to throw them into the institutions and subject them to the control and religious influence of our opposers.

Of the Theological Seminary, it will suffice to say that so far its success has abundantly justified the experiment. It should however, be more generally known than it appears to be, that it is not a department of the Institute. The number of young gentlemen who have already attended the instructions of Mr. Sawyer, and who propose devoting themselves to the ministry, has been much greater than was anticipated for the present. And it has conclusively shown, that they at least, were not insensible to the importance of adequate preparation for the work of the ministry. This, they did not expect—but by availing themselves of existing means, they pledge their endeavors to keep up as far as practicable with the progress of the public mind. And as they come from the various conditions of society—they may be regarded as indices which point out the popular views of the undertaking. It is therefore no longer a matter of doubt, that the public mind of the denomination has kept pace with the views and wishes of the projectors and patrons of this enterprise—and that in due time the necessary means will be embodied, and this incipient school become in fact what it is in name—a Theological Seminary. 'GOD IS LOVE.'

That God is love, is a truth well spoken, both by nature and revelation. These unite in declaring this great and glorious truth; and upon all other subjects upon which they speak, there will be found existing between them, the utmost harmony, when both nature and revelation are properly understood. Nature emanated from the Supreme Being; or perhaps more properly speaking, nature is the workmanship of his hands; the laws which govern the various changes and revolutions of nature, and the laws governing mind, were formed by the all-creative hand of God; and we may rest assured that he has not given to the world, a revelation to contradict the instruction found in the book of nature. Hence if we suppose that we observe any inconsistency between nature and revelation, relative to any subject whatever, we may well conclude that we have misapprehended the meaning of one or the other, and should forthwith apply our minds to a better understanding of the same. But relative to the proposition, that God is love; we ask, does nature so instruct us?

There is not an institution which Heaven has established, but what contributes to the happiness and enjoyment of mankind. None but what has the welfare of the intelligent creation in view, as the great end and aim of the economy of God. Go forth and look upon the great volume of nature, wide-spread and filled with instruction; upon the cloudless sun, pouring his golden beams in glowing splendor upon the world; upon the falling showers with their refreshing influences; upon 'seed time and harvest,' summer and winter, and a thousand other things which might be spoken, and all of them contributing to the happiness and enjoyment of the children of men.—Blessings numberless conferred, morning, noon, and evening, and do they not all speak with the same great voice? Declaring that the Supreme Being is ever mindful of our welfare? that his benevolence is unbounded? and that surely he is love? This truth can not be denied with any show of reason, for it may be read upon all the wonderful works of nature by which we are surrounded, and must carry conviction to the heart of every candid and reflecting man.

Now what says revelation? 1 John iv: 16.—'God is love.' How plain and comprehensive is this teaching.—No ambiguity to confuse and distract the mind, but brought down even to the comprehension of a child. It may be read and understood by 'the wayfaring man,' and observed to be in harmony with the instruction given to man by the works of nature. Yea, both nature and revelation speak to the intelligent world and declare the same great truth, that the Being who created and governs the universe; who breathed the breath of life into man and placed him here as lord of this lower sphere, is love!—Not a love frail and changing in its nature, but the same throughout all periods and all time; now, as when, 'the stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy,' and when time is swallowed up in eternity, the same as at present that love shall continue.

This truth contributes no little to the sum of man's enjoyment while upon earth. How cheering and strengthening to the mind in the hour of calm and sober reflection, to realize that there is a God above, watching over our destinies, and that he is love! It comes like a healing balm to a wounded spirit; like the cool breeze to a feverish brow; like joy to the desponding soul, to drive far away the burden of many sorrows. And never should we be unmindful of this truth, so important and powerful in its nature and so necessary to our happiness while upon earth. And we should at all times, and especially when a shadow of adversity seems to gather around, cherish the reflection, that we are in the hands of a Being whose name and nature is love, and that hence, all shall be well.

VERNON, N. Y.

On Sunday, the 11th inst., I had the pleasure of exchanging services, with Rev. H. Emmons, (Unitarian,) of the above place—('will our good Br. Smith excuse us.') For a long time I have not enjoyed a more agreeable season. The friends seemed to vie with each other to make my stay among them agreeable. The society over which Mr. Emmons is settled at Vernon, is composed of Unitarians and Universalists, in about equal numbers, as I should judge. They have a beautiful church, in a central and pleasant location, which is filled with a good congregation. They appear perfectly united in their pastor, who is greatly devoted to their interests—and all things move on harmoniously and pleasantly, as they ever will, where [the spirit of true Christian toleration prevails!—My message was received with marked respect and excellent satisfaction, by a full congregation.

What sight more beautiful than to behold brethren attached perhaps, formally, to different denominations, thus sitting down harmoniously and pleasantly together to worship the same God and rejoice in the same Redeemer! Thus should it be with all sects. Why should Christians of different classes, who all believe in, a common Father and Saviour, stand apart and scowl at each other, and indulge in bitter and acrimonious feelings, rather than to meet and extend the hand of fraternal regard as brethren should, and mingle their thanksgivings sweetly together?

I am much pleased with this union at Vernon between Universalists and Unitarians. Why should it not be so? Why should those who have so many sentiments, and so many sympathies in common, stand aloof from each other? Where neither party are capable of sustaining preaching themselves, it is assuredly the dictate of wisdom, and Christian charity, to unite and provide themselves with a ministration that shall be mutually satisfactory and instructive.

There are in Vernon, besides the church belonging to the Unitarians and Universalists, three churches—a Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist. The Presbyterians have of late been unfortunate in their minister, Rev. Mr. Brisbane, who was deposed not long since, I understand, for the crime of adultery. Poor, boasting, self-righteous orthodoxy, which has so long put forth a monopolizing claim to all the piety and morality in the land! How often is it compelled to hang its head, and blush for shame, at the continued exposure of the corruption, long festering in its bosom! Will it not at length learn, by these repeated judgments of heaven, to practice a little of the Christian duty of humility—and instead of continually reiterating the arrogant declaration, to their neighbors—'stand by thyself—I am holier than thou'—utter the more truthful and appropriate prayer—'Lord be merciful to me, a sinner'?

Vernon, which includes the place long known as 'Oneida Castle,' is a most interesting locality, connected as it is, with many historical associations in relation to the aborigines of our country. This, from time immemorial, has been the head quarters of the ancient and brave 'Oneidas,' one of the most powerful tribes of that well known confederacy, the 'Six Nations of Indians.' Here is yet standing the hut of their last renowned and eloquent chief, Skenendoah, [I do not know that I spell this name correctly,] whose name frequently occurs in the history of the American Revolution, and of the early settlement of Central New York. And here too, are a few butter-nut trees, the wasting remnants of the 'Sacred Grove' of the Oneidas, where, in the days of their Paganism, their priests yearly offered the sacrifice of 'the white dog,' to their gods, and where in later days, the tribe met in grave council, to smoke the calumet of peace, or engage in the fatal war dance. But these ancient lords of the soil, have mostly departed. The greater portion of the tribe emigrated some years since to Green Bay. A few families yet remain, lingering around the graves of their fathers, as if loath to leave the spot endeared by a thousand associations, connected with their nation's former greatness! Sad relics of a past age—of a vanishing race! May they ever be treated kindly by the white man, whose plough now turns its broad furrows on the ancient battle fields and play-grounds of the noble hearted Oneidas!

THE MORMONS.

These miserable and deluded people are now being rent into fragments and scattered to the four winds of heaven. The frauds, iniquities and crimes of their leaders are being exposed to the world by their own members. Debaucheries, thefts, robberies, forgeries and even bloodshed have long been rife among them, and can no longer be concealed. Still, there are among them, simpletons and dupes, apparently willing still longer to be imposed upon, and are ready to gulp down, as the true revelations of God, any and all marvels, wonders and monstrosities that unprincipled and aspiring mountebanks please to impose upon them.

We have just received a miserable spawn of one of these mountebanks, entitled the 'Voree Warrior,' published at Voree (near Burlington) W. T., by James J. Strang, entitling himself 'a Prophet of the Most High God and an Apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ, unto the Elders of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.'

He pretends to have received a special commission, from Jo. Smith, just before his death, prognosticating his own speedy death, and commissioning him (Strang) to 'lead the flock to pleasant pastures' after death, directing him to build a city at Voree, which should be the Holy City, the city of the Most High, where peace and prosperity, plenty and glory should be their portion. He comes out strongly against the claims of The Twelve, who have assumed to rule the Mormon church since Jo.'s death, and claims himself to have discovered new brassen plates and dug them up from beneath an oak tree, by four of his pliant tools, who of course certify to their having dug them up from the solid and long undisturbed earth, and that this prophet, James J. Strang, by Urim and Thummim, did translate the characters and revelations contained in the brassen plates. And thus assuming the prophetic character, he says, 'The Angel of the Lord came unto me, James, on the first day of September in the year 1845, and the light shined about him above the brightness of the sun, and he showed me the plates of the sealed record, and he gave into my hands the Urim and the Thummim,' &c., &c. This little contemptible sheet is filled throughout with a tissue of this same kind of blasphemous nonsense, mock solemnity, sickening folly and wickedness, to impose on the weak and credulous creatures who are willing to be deceived and apparently anxious to be duped to their own ruin. It is heart-sickening to think of the weakness, folly and gullibility of poor humanity exhibited in these wretched Mormons. But there is no law against people being fools if they are bent upon it.—But against these unprincipled mountebanks and wicked leaders of these poor creatures a stronger feeling of indignation arises, and the voice of the whole community seems to call aloud for their exemplary punishment. Still, it should not be done rashly, nor contrary to law, lest it should seem to be persecution for conscience's sake, and justify the very sins and evils it was intended to cure.

Some astounding disclosures have lately been made of iniquities long practiced among the Mormons at Nauvoo, such as robberies, murders, counterfeiting, &c. It is said the Prophet Joe Smith himself used to work at the business of counterfeiting with his own hands—that among the number now indicted for this crime are Brigham Young, president of THE TWELVE, and Orson Pratt, a prominent leader. We close this notice of the Mormons by the following communication published in a late number of the New York Tribune.

D. S.

'The U. S. District Court—Judge Pore presiding—is still in session. A fearful disclosure has been made before the Grand Jury—no less than the fact—that 'the twelve' leaders of the Mormons have been engaged in counterfeiting the coin of the United States. The disclosures—to those who had any confidence in Mormon virtues—are astounding. It appears that the Holy Twelve have long had a bogus press in operation, and which was worked by these holy rascals themselves. They called it among themselves, 'The Land Office Press.'

This I will explain. Uncle Sam, at the sales of public lands, will receive nothing in payment but specie. The holy twelve, on such occasions, pack up their spurious coin in bones—start off a waggon with it, together with some light articles, shoes, or calicoes, having the appearance of a peddling expedition. As soon as they get into the land district, where specie is wanted, they exchange their specie, which is readily done, for paper:—that accomplished, return for another supply. This is done as long as there is a demand. The spurious coin, from the adulterations and labor, is worth or costs the holy brotherhood about 27 cents the dollar. The article they make must be a very clever one. No doubt a very considerable portion of the money in some parts of the country, where the Mormons perform their operations, is spurious; yet little or none of the counterfeit has been detected.

The Grand Jury, of course, indicted 'the twelve,' (perhaps I should be more correct in saying ten of the twelve) and the Marshal immediately communicated the fact to Gov. Ford and asked him for the assistance of a force to enable him to arrest the culprits. The Governor refused. On this fact I offer no comments. The Marshal, it is now said, will proceed to Nauvoo for the purpose of arresting the indicted, with the hope of obtaining a posse in Hancock county sufficient for the purpose. If he can not succeed, it is understood that he will apply for a U. S. force at the Jefferson Barracks. But before that takes place the 'holy' rascals will make themselves scarce.

Don't you think, Mr. Greeley, that these Mormons will make a sorry nucleus on which to build a great enlightened and virtuous republic on the shores of the Pacific? Do you suppose, because the founders of some of the greatest republics and empires in ancient times were great rascals, such facts are precedents for permitting these Mormons to start an independent community within our territory of Oregon?

THANKS—SECOND EDITION.

We are again impelled to tender our thanks to our kind friends, both ministering and lay, for their exertions in behalf of the Magazine and Advocate. We find that many, in places where the paper has not been heretofore taken, having received a number and taken it upon them to exert their influence and manifest their interest by a small share of well directed effort, have succeeded beyond their expectations, as well as ours. We have long thought that our list might be greatly increased by such means, and that nearly all had those means, and only needed to use them to attain the desired object. Let every one then who feels such interest, (and what true Universalist does not,) use his influence among his neighbors and friends to increase the circulation of the paper, and consequently the good that it may be the means of doing.—It will be seen by a short article in this week's paper that new subscribers can have the paper from the commencement of the volume at the same price that a club does, according as to the number composing that club, by receiving the paper at the same office.

The northern counties of Lewis, Jefferson and St. Lawrence, have nobly come up to the work. Those East have done well, the South hath kept not back and the West has far exceeded our most sanguine expectations. We are specially gratified to see our ministering brethren in the Western part of the State, manifest a growing interest in the prosperity of the paper, some by their pens and some by sending us good lists of subscribers, and some by both. We had long feared from some indications, that a feeling of jealousy and prejudice existed in their minds against the conductors, and editors of the Magazine, that it was covertly infused by certain individuals in various ways. Those fears were continually gaining strength until recent developments have proved conclusively that such was the fact. But we now begin to hope that the tide is turned—that those unfounded prejudices are giving way to holier and better feelings, and that the day is not far distant when all shall be firmly united in peaceful bonds to the furtherance of our good cause.

Brethren, we greet your contributions to our columns, and your efforts in our behalf with a hearty welcome, and may you be amply rewarded by the reflection that those efforts have been made, not only to the benefit of society generally, but to yourselves, and us. Continue then in the good work, assist us to make the Magazine equal if not superior to any other paper in the denomination, and while through your means it is dispensing light, life and truth to others, may God's blessing rest with you as does the gratitude of the PUBLISHER.

Any one subscribing for the Magazine at any time and taking it at the same office with a club, can have it at the same price that the club does with the back numbers. Will our friends who do, or who have kindly taken it upon themselves to obtain subscribers, notice this fact and govern themselves accordingly. PCB.

We have received the 5th number of 2d volume of the GAVEL a neat monthly, devoted to Odd Fellowship and general literature. Edited by T. L. Harris and John Tanner,—published by John Tanner, Albany, N. Y.

It is neatly got up containing some 30 pages 8vo., and is filled with well written tales elucidative of the principles of the Order. The number before us is prefaced with an expressive and well executed engraving of David and Jonathan at the Stone Ezel. One dollar per annum, in advance.

From the same publisher we have also received the first number of volume 1, of the MECHANICS' MIRROR, devoted to the interests of Mechanics and Mutual Protection.

Edited by Robert McFarlane. This number contains 28 pages 8vo., of good and useful reading, specially for those engaged in mechanical business. We heartily commend it to people of that sphere. Monthly, at one dollar a year in advance. Address John Tanner, Albany, N. Y.

THE UPPER LIFE.

Look down from out your azure spheres,
Bright angels of the deep blue sky;
Bend gently down, ye golden orbs,
To this low world, where all must die;
O, hang your harps upon the clouds,
Draw back your fingers from the strings!
While in the broad and airy halls,
The dying notes in parting ring;
Until we think each high-spread wall,
Is but a space of air and dew;
Which, as the seraph's sweetly call,
The music-notes are passing through;
To mingle with the holy strains,
Awaked by the sinless choir,
That gather round the throne of God,
As children gathered round their Sire.
Look down—look down, and let me read
Within your glowing eyes, a truth,
That I have waited to receive,
Since first began my fleeting youth.
Once step aside, from out the track,
Which for long years, you nightly tread;
Or if not all—let one depart,
To whisper blessings o'er my head.
I'll find the brightest, purest star,
That's shining in your courts to-night,
And beg, that to my spirit's eye,
'Twill give one ray of its own light.

Ah! here you are, just o'er the brow
Of this old, rugged, cloud-capp'd hill,
Around whose base, with murr'ring flow,
There sweetly sings a tiny rill.
I've crept unto its very height,
And made a mossy seat my throne;
I've hush'd the echoes of my voice,
That I may better hear your own.
Oh! grant my prayer—in love bend down,
And whisper to my heart a tale,
To give it hope through weary years—
An anchor, that shall never fail.
Now, let me look within your face!
There—on my braids, just rest your hand,
And tell me of the future life,
Oh! tell me of the better land.
For I have wearied of the earth,
E'en though its vales be green and fair;
I'm pining for a brighter home,
Say! shall I find my lov'd ones there?—

The gentle girl who fled away,
In young life's early spring,
Ere o'er her heart despair had spread
Her tempest blacken'd wing—
Whose cup of life seem'd ever sweet,
As dew-drops from the flowers,
Drank, when the sunbeams first awake,
O'er garden, grove, and bower?—

The light-hair'd boy, who long ago,
Gave unto God his breath,
And with a rose-bud in his hand,
Slept on the bed of death?—
The mother, whose fond heart could not Lay in the dust, its idol down,
Still kept her arms around his form,
And wore with him the marble crown?—

The tender friend, who lov'd me well,
Through childish hours and later years;
Whose eye grew bright, when I would smile,
And dim, when mine was wet with tears?—
We saw the dark hair on her brow,
All smooth, and damp, and cold it lay.
The sunshine of our life hath gone—
She bore it from the world away.

The aged man, whose locks were white,
As drops of frost, or flakes of snow;
Whose heart was but a darken'd book,
All written o'er with tales of woe?
The child, whose sparkling eye grew dim,
Ere shaded by a dream of fear;
The sharer of our early sports,
The sister of our baby years?—

We saw them sleeping on a couch,
All cover'd o'er with snowy lawn,

And deem'd they'd waken with the light;
But ah, the morning never dawn'd!
The grave—the grave! 'tis there they rest—
The dearest of our household band—
Say! will they waken from their dreams—
Awaken, in the better land?

There's wailing in those higher spheres,—
The starry host the strain prolong;
A minstrel's vanished from his throne;
Hushed in the music of his song!
Hark! hear them strike their golden lyres,
With gentle songs they woo thee back;
On—upward, through the dewy air,
Speed homeward, in the diamond track.
But ere you gather up your robes,
All sprinkled o'er with gems of light;
Or whisper to my waiting ear,
In gentle tones, a fond good night;
Oh! if it be, that you may know,
One half the praises I would speak;
E'en though they fell from off my lips,
In trembling accents low and weak;
Then listen, ere you plume your wings,
And hasten from my sight away;
Oh! know the thanks I'll ever give,
While I am wearing robes of clay.
Thanks—for the many joys I've found,
Since this soot evening's hours had birth;
Thanks—for the kindness thou hast shown,
In stooping to the curtain'd earth,
And graving on my young heart's page,
In thy soft, glowing, golden beams;
A picture of that upper home,
Brighter than ever seen in dreams—
A picture of the far-spread halls,
Of ruby walls and pearly doors;
O'er which the moon-beams sometimes fall,
And rest upon the silver floor;
That echoes with the gentle tread
Of Angels, through each sunny day;
Who, with white-rose wreaths in their hands,
Seem smiling all the hours away.
No human artist ere could draw,
One half the charms that greet my sight,
E'en, though his pencil he should dip,
In brightest hues of living light.
Ah, gentle star! thine was the hand,
Left the impress and the shade;
Thy skill hath given to my heart
A likeness that can never fade.
And by the glory of the sight,
By each bright eye, I know so well,
By each soft cheek I oft have kiss'd,
Ere o'er it death's cold waters fell,
I judge the upper, Eden-land
Must be all bright, and clear, and fair;
And that our lost ones pass'd from here
To endless life and beauty there.

GOOD WISHES—BUT WRONG MEANS....NO. 3.

The locks of Mr. H. are whitened with age, and for many years he has been a believer in the great restitution.

His anxiety for the spread of this doctrine is great. He takes many steps and uses many words to convince his neighbors of its truth.

He lives—were those of an opposite faith are numerous, and his opportunities are frequent of presenting his views; and in addition to his colloquial powers, which are good, he is faithful in the distribution of papers and books advocating our faith, and yet after years of toil to advance the cause—not one convert has been gained by his labors.—His faith is strong and unwavering—his zeal is warlike—his desires are good, and for a good cause—his arguments sound and reasons clear and strong, and in the main his conduct is good, but he has failings.

He has not yet learned 'that more flies can be caught with molasses than vinegar;' and hence he deals too profusely in acids. There is another failing. While he brings forth reasons 'strong as proofs from Holy Writ' for the truth of the restitution—his breath is tainted with the poisons of the groggery, which casts a mildew over every reason.

No marvel that his converts are scarce. His daughter with whom he resides is a sensible lady—a member of a Presbyterian church, and she can have no faith in his doctrine, and but little charity for its believers, while his example is the only evidence before her of its influence on the heart and life.

Papers and books however clearly they prove this faith to be the teaching of revelation, will not reach the understanding, or carry home to the heart, the universal love of the Father, while this practice remains. Neither is it of any avail, in counteracting this influence to say, there are many believers in the Partialists' doctrine, who are equally, or more sinful. For they verily believe when their members err, it is through the direct agency of the devil; but when a believer in the restitution does wrong, why it must be the legitimate fruits of his faith!! Well, well, it is a sorry comment on that faith, which discards the being of a devil, for any of its professors to act like one.

If H. would 'cease to do evil and learn to do well,' he would give evidence to all that his 'faith worked by love and purified the heart,' and thus with one half of the efforts now made, a thousand fold more good would be done for our common cause and the world at large. Try it, is the advice of

EXTRACT OF A LETTER.

Saratoga Springs, Jan. 14, 1846.

Mr. WALKER—We are getting along but slowly here, as yet, but now that we have Br. Aspinwall settled with us, we hope to build up the good cause. I have a good anecdote for you that occurred near here, about one year ago.

The Rev. Mr. Brown, who is stationed here by the Methodists, was preaching at a school house about two miles south of this village, against Universalism, bringing up arguments in its favor, then attempting to answer them. After proceeding some time in this manner, a young man got up and addressed Mr. B. thus:—'I say, if you want to put down Universalism, you must not bring forward quite so strong arguments, as you have got them a great ways ahead of your own already.' It is said that Mr. Brown had some trouble to resume the thread of his discourse that had been thus rudely broken.

Hoping that your paper will be more fully supported than heretofore, I subscribe myself,

Yours in the Gospel bonds,

E. J. HULING.

FRIENDSHIP; ITS NATURE AND OFFICE.

A SERMON.

BY REV. J. BRITTON, JR.

'Faithful are the wounds of a friend.' Prov. xxvii. 6.

Among the great and valuable blessings, with which the benevolent Author of our being has been pleased to bestrew the pathway of human existence, none are more precious than those which flow from friendship. Unblessed with the joys of friendship, our pilgrimage through life would be dreary and cheerless. We are formed for society, and we delight to form attachments and associations with those, to whom we may unbosom our sorrows and reveal our griefs. How gratifying at all times, and especially in seasons of distress and adversity, to grasp the hand of a true friend, to behold the countenance of one who, we are assured, will be to us more than a brother! I believe in the existence of true friendship, though I am constrained to admit that it is a plant of rare growth. We sometimes flatter ourselves that we have many friends, but when the day of trial comes, when adversity with its iron grasp seizes upon us, many of our friends, like gay birds of summer, which disappear upon the approach of autumn winds, forsake us and we are left to contend without their aid, with the bleak winds of misfortune. Such is man. Society must undergo a thorough change, before genuine friendship will extensively prevail. The selfish, cold and calculating policy of the world is opposed to its mature growth. Thousands mistake the true foundation of genuine and lasting friendship. We choose for our friends those who move in a certain circle, who, perhaps, are wealthy and make a fine appearance in the world; and many, too, are received on these grounds. But it is better to be without friends, than to have only those, who are induced to become so, on account of our wealth or station in life. Let me have for my friends, those who will not avoid me when greater personages may be present, and who can appreciate the worth of an individual independent of wealth and station.

That which bears the name of friendship in thousands of instances, is unworthy the name. I speak of those alliances which are formed, and continued just so long as interest is promoted and no longer, or those which are liable to be broken by the caprice or whim of either party. Solomon describes a true friend when he says, 'A friend loveth at all times;' that is not only in prosperity but also in adversity. He says, also, 'there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother;' 'he is more hearty in the performance of all friendly offices. He reproves and rebukes when he sees any thing amiss.' A brother is backward in reproving a brother, that is, generally speaking, more unwilling to rebuke than a friend. Near relatives may not be so quick to discern, or to acknowledge the faults of each other, as those who are bound by no ties of natural relationship, but only by the ties of friendship. Friendship differs from natural affection. This subsists between members of the same family: it springs out of their natural relationship, and is kept alive by their close intercourse and constant interchange of kindnesses; friendship excludes the idea of any tender and natural relationship.⁽¹⁾ Love or affection is to be found in children, but friendship is the growth of maturer years.

Friendship differs from that strong and passionate attachment which exists between persons of different sexes. Like natural affection, there are several characteristics by which this is distinguished from friendship. Love which is not founded upon esteem or real worth is simply a passion, with which the understanding has but little to do.—'Friendship on the other hand is the entire work of the understanding.'

'Love is blind to the faults of the object of its devotion; it adores, it idolizes; it is fond, it is foolish; friendship sees faults, and strives to correct them, it aims to render the object more worthy of esteem and regard. Love has all the errors attendant upon passion, but friendship which is an affection tempered by reason, is exempt from every such exceptionable quality.'⁽²⁾ Those who form matrimonial alliances should not only be lovers but friends, since without friendship such alliances are productive not of connubial bliss, but of the extreme of wretchedness and misery.

'Friendship is a mutual attachment subsisting between two persons, and arising, not merely from the general principle of benevolence, from emotions of gratitude for favors received, nor from views of interest, but from an opinion entertained by each of them, that the other is adorned with some able or respectable qualities.'⁽³⁾ Mutual friendship, therefore, has its foundation in principle. Unless each person discovers in the other something worthy of esteem, friendship formed by such persons is of an unstable character; it will not abide the test of adversity.

I have remarked that the general character of society was unfavorable to the growth of true and lasting friendship. There is every where and with us all, probably, too much selfishness. We are apt to suspect the friendship of a man, who says or does any thing, which we think prejudicial to our interest. And hence it may be the case, that those whom we regard as friends, are only flatterers. A flatterer, a mere pretender in friendship, is cautious, or rather cunning, and by fair speeches and agreeable words he gains our confidence. Thus the flatterer is taken for the friend. It is by no means certain that those are our best, our truest friends, who take the most pains to please us. I allow that a worthy friend will not uselessly give us pain of mind, or unnecessarily wound our feelings. I allow, too, that 'a friend should bear with a friend's infirmities.' But there is a point beyond which we can not bear with our friend's fault, without forfeiting the reputation of a friend. That is, we do in fact forfeit the reputation of a friend. But the forms and customs of society are such, that we are still called friends to those, whom we see going on in the way of sin without giving them a word of caution. O, we say, these men are our friends, we do not like to displease them, we are for harmony and good feeling; it is an unpleasant task, and therefore, we refrain from uttering a word—and the world calls us friends. And thus the opinions and usages of society operate against the performance of those acts, which true kindness and friendship demand.

But of what use are friends, if they are not permitted to utter a word of admonition? I consider those my best friends, who in the spirit of kindness have spoken to me concerning my faults, and encouraged me to take somewhat a different course. To be sure it is painful to know that our friends are not pleased with our course, but if such knowledge will probably be beneficial to us, it can not in friendship be withholden.

Reason as we may on this subject, it must be conceded that those are our best friends who give us good advice, who warn us of danger, and endeavor to establish our goings in virtue, that we may enjoy consequent happiness. Better would it be for the cause of human happiness, were there more such friends.

The position assumed in this discourse, in relation to the duty of a friend is substantiated by the text and other passages. Thus 'open rebuke is better than secret love.' By this I understand, that a friend who reproves is better, more valuable, than one whose prudence overcomes the promptings of conscience to do his duty, and who is, therefore, silent. The text reads, Faithful are the wounds of a friend. A friend, then may inflict pain, may cause us to feel pain of soul; and moreover these wounds are an evidence of the faithfulness of the friend who inflicts them.

A true friend 'is known by his good and faithful counsel, as well as by his seasonable rebukes. His sharpest reproofs proceed from an upright mind and a feeling heart.'⁽⁴⁾ As I have intimated there are reasons for believing that the happiness of man would be extensively promoted, were there more such faithful friends in the world. All need the kind offices of such friends. All are liable to go astray from the path of duty, and to enter upon practices which will cause us anguish and pain.—The services of a kind friend are peculiarly valuable, and the admonitions of friendship ought to be gratefully acknowledged, and received in the spirit of kindness.

But I regret to say that compliments and flattering expressions, are oftentimes received with more favor, than the gentle, yet faithful expressions of true friendship. I would that a change were wrought in the opinions of men, and that the usages of society were more in accordance with the precepts and examples of our blessed Lord and Master. He taught his disciples, and the command is binding upon us who profess his name, 'If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone.' A brother trespasses against us, when he acts in such a manner as to endanger his own happiness, and also when he brings reproach upon the cause, we mutually profess to hold dear.

The practice of many in the Christian world, is, I fear, far from being in accordance with the spirit of this precept. I ask my friends, if we are sufficiently faithful in this respect? We are governed I think, too much by motives of worldly caution, and pursue the course which the multitude pursue, and that is, to talk with all others about our friend's faults while to him we have said nothing.

There would be comparatively but little difficulty in this matter, if those who are reproved, would consider that those who admonish them were their friends, and not consider them as enemies, because they tell some unwelcome truth. Paul in addressing his Galatian brethren, inquires, 'Am I, therefore, become your enemy because I tell you the truth?' We should esteem no one an enemy, who is striving to do us good. And we should be willing to receive his gentle rebukes without manifestations of ill will. If we have the assurance, or if we believe, that an individual's intentions are good, we should not suffer ourselves to be displeased, even though we may not approve of his course in relation to us.

When friends speak, it is for our interest to listen. We all have friends more or less dear. Husbands and wives have friends in each other. And they may mutually encourage and aid each other to maintain an upright walk and a virtuous conversation. Their words should be those of affection and kindness and of faithful friendship. Each is capable of exercising the influence he or she possesses for evil or for good. Adam, our great progenitor, was led into the path of transgression at the suggestion of our mother Eve. I will say, however, for I believe the facts will truly warrant the assertion, that her fair daughters by their steadfast virtue, have more than redeemed the character of their maternal parent. Since that period many husbands have been saved from wretchedness and ruin by listening to the voice of their wives, while not a few have gone down to their graves in disgrace and shame, because they did not listen to the faithful words of a faithful friend. Let the influence which the wife possesses, always be exercised for good. Let it be exerted in cherishing in her husband the love of home and domestic enjoyments. Let it be her endeavor, as she values her own peace, and would avoid wretchedness in after life, be careful how she encourages him to resort to scenes calculated to unfit the mind to engage in those studies and pursuits, which confer dignity on man, and entitle him to the confidence and respect of an intelligent and virtuous community.

The husband, too, has claims which should secure the considerate attention of the wife, and she should not hastily endeavor to thwart his plans, but reflect candidly upon his suggestions, and learn to regard his words as the words of one, who has solemnly pledged himself to be to her more than a friend. In the conjugal relation there is occasion for much forbearance, and yet it may be deemed necessary to utter words calculated to wound the feelings, though this should never unnecessarily be the case. At all times the husband and wife are to regard each other as friends. This consideration duly regarded will prevent unhappy consequences, when either deems it necessary to admonish the other. In the present imperfect state of human nature, there is occasion in all situations in life, for a reciprocity of kind attentions and well meant admonitions.

Brothers and sisters should be mutually friendly. They are capable, on account of their relation to each other, and their different positions in society, of rendering each other invaluable aid. A brother, how much can he do for a sister in the way of protection and by faithful words? And who can estimate the influence of a gentle and loving sister upon a worthy or a wayward brother? And how may sisters become blessings to each other, if careful to keep alive the true and genuine spirit of friendship! And brothers should ever find friends in each other. Faithful and true are the words of a brother, who is a friend. Why should not such words be appreciated? Strange that men will turn a deaf ear to the kind warning and faithful advice of a son of the same parents, and yet eagerly listen to those persons who have no real interest in their true welfare!

The relation existing between preacher and people, is one in which there ought to exist a reciprocity of friendship. The people should esteem their preacher their friend and in them he should find friends in return. And this should be kept in remembrance at all times, and it will serve to prevent the occurrence of jarring, discord and unprofitable altercation. No man is fit to come before the people as the minister of Jesus Christ, unless he possesses in some good degree that friendship for man, which was so eminently characteristic of the Master we professedly serve. And when the people consider and bear in mind, that their minister is their friend—that their prosperity is identified with his, they will appreciate his words, though these may cause unpleasant sensations, for they will consider him as a faithful friend. It is the province of the preacher as a friend to rebuke and exhort—he must possess long suffering and patience and strive in all possible ways to benefit those for whom he labors.

And permit me to say, also, that as professed believers in the common origin, the universal brotherhood, and the common and equal destiny of our race, that we should show ourselves as the friends of all. We should not suffer ourselves to be the enemies of any. We should indulge and cherish no unkind feelings towards any, for such a course is altogether incompatible with the spirit and character of our religion. We are not to wait till others become our friends, before we become theirs, but imbibing the spirit of universal philanthropy, we are to regard ourselves as the friends of universal humanity.

I have spoken, heretofore, of mutual friendship, of that friendship which subsists between friend and friend. But we must go further than this. It does not necessarily follow, that because a man is not my friend, that I can not be his. I have no fellowship for any such doctrine or sentiment. I do not find it in that Gospel, by which I profess to be governed, which is my rule and guide in matters of faith and practice.

Remember, my friends, the God whom we serve and adore is the friend of all, though some are enemies to him in their minds manifested by their wicked works. He does not wait till we become his friends, before he bestows upon us the blessings of his providence and grace. These he continually bestows upon us. He is kind to the evil and to the unthankful. Think too of Jesus Christ, he who was called in contempt by the proud Pharisees of his age, the friend of sinners. Jesus is the friend, not of the righteous only, but of sinners. As a friend to sinners he is faithful. His intercourse among men and with his disciples was characterized throughout by true friendship. They manifested, at different times, much prejudice and a desire to forsake him, when danger was apprehended, yet there was no diminution of the love of Jesus for them. He was also the friend of his enemies. Notwithstanding all their opposition and hatred, there was no abatement of his desire to do them good. And with his expiring breath, he uttered a prayer for their forgiveness.

‘It becomes us to be guided by his precepts, and to imitate his example, especially in his love for sinners.’ (5) And as we meet in his name from Sabbath to Sabbath, we should think of the friendship of him who died for us all. He spurned none from his presence, he associated with sinners—he sought to raise the degraded from their loathsome condition. Do we possess this spirit? Are we striving to save our fellow creatures from sin?—Have we encouraged them to break off their sinful habits and to come in and enjoy the Gospel feast? Have we taken them by the hand in all their degradation and sinfulness, and said, come with us and we will do you good? I fear we have not done this as faithfully as we ought. As it has been said, ‘none need our pity so much as those who have no pity on themselves.’ Transgressors can be won to duty and virtue only by kindness. And I rejoice in the thought that this principle which constitutes the very foundation of religion is beginning to be better understood. Let all remember, that friendship, love and virtue are the most powerful weapons, we can use in destroying hatred and vice. Let us use them constantly and faithfully. Amen.

NOTE.—The writer of the foregoing sermon submits it for publication, by the request of those he has reason to think his friends. A few sentences are included in quotation marks. Some expressions may occur which are not thus acknowledged.

VICTORY IS SILENT.

BY J. W. MCMASTER.

Yes, victory is silent. True victory has ever been, and ever will be noiseless and unpretending. The deep peals of the approaching thunder, the sullen roar of the vengeful cannon, so far from being preludes of victory, are indications of disorder and defeat! That rumbling in the skies is but the hoarse moaning, arising from the impurity, and disorder of the ethereal element. That roar of hostile cannon speaks not the language of victory, but of death! When and where, has the mere force of arms, with all its noise and thunders ever achieved a true and lasting victory? When, and in what age of the world, has it achieved anything like victory? Perhaps I may be pointed to the battles and bloody fields of Merengo, Lodi and Austerlitz, for an answer. But dost thou call these scenes of victory, O man? Dost thou point me to those rivers of human gore, as instances of triumph? Dost thou tell me to listen to the groans of the wounded, to the last death moan of the expiring, as instances of signal victory? It can not be possible. If this is victory, then what is defeat?—Though Bonaparte fought many a battle, and crimsoned as many fields with human gore; though he destroyed lives enough to immortalize his name with the deepest infamy, yet strictly speaking, he never gained one real and true victory. The destruction of life—a mere triumph over physical strength, is not worthy the name of victory. That alone is victory, which elevates the mind, and convinces it of the right, and the just. And he alone merits the title of conqueror, who achieves such victories. But Bonaparte, amidst all the destruction he heaped upon mankind, never conquered a man. Though he destroyed their bodies, he did not subdue their minds. The lowest, the weakest might say to him, ‘Though it would be in vain for me to resist your power, though my life is in your hands, and though I must yield my breath at your word, yet you and all your hosts have not sufficient potency to subdue my spirit to your unhallowed tyranny.’ Physical instruments may destroy; but they have not the power to subdue. Loud sounds may terrify; but they can not convince. The earthquake, with its roar, may rock the mountains, and shake isle, sea, and earth; but the still small voice alone, can arouse the inner man, and make him work for virtue, and for God. Silence is divine. It is the voice of Deity—the breath of Heaven.

Whenever man is permitted to look into the deep recess of his own soul; whenever he achieves a lasting victory over himself; and whenever the inner triumphs over the outer—the new over the old—it is when his thoughts are hushed in silence, and when a sacred stillness has taken possession of all the faculties of his mind. The most powerful and effective agents in the universe, are those that are most silent, and least observed; among which, are the air we inhale; the gases that support life and combustion; the all powerful and pervading electric fluid; and last, though not least, the attraction of gravitation, that principle which, though unheard and unseen, is the sine qua non; without which man would lose his identity with the earth, and wander into unknown regions of space, without chart or compass to direct him, roving every where, yet tending no where; without which, ‘planets and suns,’ would ‘rush lawless through the skies’—system be piled upon system, and universal anarchy pervade the entire field of creation. It is the deep river that flows most gently—the silent man, that thinks most profoundly. Perhaps he is least the benefactor of his race, who makes the most noise, and thunders most loudly.

Let us turn our attention for a moment to Jesus. It is beautifully published of him, ‘He shall not strive nor cry aloud, neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, until he send forth judgment to victory.’ In our great Benefactor, silence and victory met. One of his chief characteristics was his uniform calmness, and self possession. He thought and felt too deeply, to indulge in loud vociferations, and hollow declamation. When about entering upon his public ministry, he conveyed himself away to the wilderness, where, forty days, and as many nights,—wrapped in his own loved silence, entirely alone, save the presence of the God that watched over him, and the angels, who, in their sacred silence, ministered unto him; he fortified himself, and devised plans, with a God’s wisdom, how he should accomplish effectually and victoriously, the great object of his mission. Of his success, time has ever since been bringing to view the most indubitable evidence. Throughout his whole life, success crowned his efforts. At his death, he overcame the world—prospectively finished the work of his mission, and subdued all things to himself. In his resurrection, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts to men. He is now silently carrying on his great work; triumphing over sin; dispelling the clouds of error, and erecting his throne in the human heart. Yes, under him, our religion is finding its way into the dark corners of the earth;—lifting the veil that has so long covered the face of the universal Father, and reconciling man to his God. Perhaps I may say, our religion, with a peculiar emphasis; for true it is, that that system of Theology which we embrace is, above all others, characterized by its noiseless march and its silent yet signal victories. Universalism utters no loud appeals to the fears and passions of men. It predicts no endless groans and eternal wailings. It points to no molten seas, whose sullen roar goes up and rends hell's concave: but it speaks mildly, yet audibly, to the judgment—to the heart; and points to Heaven, as man's peaceful and everlasting home. It is the only system that aims at victory for the whole human race. All others plead either for partial, or universal defeat! All others declare in substance, if not in words, that countless millions will be defeated in their immortal hopes and desires, and be shut up in dismal dungeons of midnight darkness and sin for ever; that Christ and all the angelic host, will be disappointed; nay, that defeat shall be written upon the larger portion of God's universe for ever; yes, and even upon his own eternal Throne!! But Universalism contends for universal victory. And it must and will triumph. The desires of all the good are enlisted on its side. Angels and all celestial beings are waiting for its accomplishment. Every attribute of Jehovah demands it. The mighty Son of God is now seated on the silently moving car of universal salvation, and will there continue to sit, until every being for whom he shed his blood, is seated by his side; until he has brought forth judgment unto immortal victory, and every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and every tongue shall confess Him, to be Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

LETTER TO THE PUBLISHER.

BR. WALKER—What is every body's business seems to be nobody's, with regard to your paper. Too much asleep and waiting for one another. I again volunteer, feeling for man's happiness here as well as hereafter. It is strange that those feeling friendly to the cause of Universalism, and look upon endless punishment as a heathen notion; are not more vigilant and active in procuring subscribers and extending the circulation of the Magazine or some other paper that teaches the better covenant. I believe that such action even better than with small means to try to support preaching. I would by no means wish to be understood as speaking against the latter, but ten copies of your paper, one year, rightly disposed of, would in comparison with ten dollars expended for preaching, spread the 'glad tidings' far more, and thus do a greater amount of good. It is much more difficult to persuade opposers to hear Universalist preaching, while they will sometimes read a Universalist paper. Should a discourse or two reach their ears, there is no room in their hearts for the good seed to take root, they are such sticklers for endless misery (not for themselves but) for all those who differ from them in opinion, and specially those who believe that in God's own time, all will be made alive in Christ, and God be all in all.

When I use no partiality in soliciting patrons to your paper, it is not a little amusing to hear the remarks made by different persons. Some groan with great seeming pain—Oh!—they can not rest in their belief. And they do not pray in faith nothing doubting, when they pray (as commanded) for all men. This class appears to me like the Pharisee, who thanked God that he was not as other men. What is the matter with them?—are they not a little too strongly possessed with a belief in the devil, and lacking faith and reliance in God? It seems so to me. Another class, that once would groan with horror and despair, now say, that they are physicked out of all sectarianism, have been through the mill and now believe true religion to be this—to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction, and keep themselves unspotted from the world, and add, I have paid five, ten, fifteen and thirty dollars per year to support (support what?) my own will, and the creeds of men—making merchandise of religion. I take no religious paper—I know not that I should differ from the general views of your paper, but it is tainted with sectarianism. Now this class seem to think as the young man thought of his father, whose release from purgatory he had procured by paying the priest a sum of money, 'ye will never catch my father in that scrape again.'

With many, reason and truth have done a good work, and dispelled clouds of darkness and unbelief, and taught them that 'self righteousness is as filthy rags.'

The concluding paragraph of the above letter which here follows, shows what the exertions of our friend accomplished for us.

I enclose $12.00 in this. Please forward 13 copies addressed to R—d P. O., and oblige your well wisher,

'HOW LONG HALT YE BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS?'

That there are many persons in the present day to be found in almost every community who profess great love for the 'doctrine every where spoken against,' and often under certain circumstances talk long and loudly in its behalf, is known to almost every one. And yet they will use their influence to build up and countenance sentiments directly the reverse—sentiments that are as far removed from theirs, as the east is from the west. I have frequently been led to reflect upon the inconsistency of the procedure of this part of mankind. Many of them are respectable, honorable and good men in other respects; but why they pursue such a worldly and time-serving policy I can not conjecture.

Why is this procedure? Do they expect by this means—by bartering away their soul's free and independent birthright, to become popular, to be in favor with all men? Do they expect by being fawning and cringing sycophants, to become honored and respected by the multitude? If this is their scheme, let me tell them, be not disappointed if you find yourselves in the end woefully deceived, and your high and ardent hopes ere they have half been realised crushed and blasted. Declare your honest sentiments to the world; be free, frank and independent; defend them from the assaults of the enemy whenever a favorable opportunity occurs, and always maintain them with dignity and respect. The language of the prophet is very applicable to their condition, 'How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him; if Baal, then follow him.' But it may be that they are not seeking popularity. Is it then, that they are yet in the bonds of a former creed—that they are yet in love with what is denominated 'orthodoxy'—that they are yet under the control of its magic influence—that they love the pomp and show of its profession? This we hardly dare affirm, if we believe the words of their mouth, if we hear them maintain in private the faith, which with their lips, they profess.

Is it that they have doubts in their minds? are they fearful as to what is truth? Then I say they have not yet embraced the faith once delivered to the saints—they have not yet tasted that the Lord is good. Hence again their profession and practice disagree.

To all such let me say, from whatever motive you act, or if from none at all, remember that one has said, 'ye can not serve God and Mammon,' 'that ye can not serve two masters, for either ye will hate the one and love the other; or else hold to the one and despise the other.' Let me put you in remembrance also of the words of Elijah to the unbelieving Israelites, 'How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him; if Baal, then follow him.'

MARRIAGES.

In Salisbury, January 8th, by Rev. J. Douglas, Mr. ABRAHAM MARSH, to Miss ELIZA E. MORSE, formerly of Northville, Mich., now of Salisbury, N. Y.

In Smithville, December 24th, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. HARVEY KNICKERBOCKER, to Miss HARRIET WEBB, both of Smithville.

In Greene, December 31st, by the same, Mr. EDSON HUBBARD, of Smithville, to Miss ORILLIA FRADENBURGH, of Greene.

DEATHS.

In Whitesborough, Oneida county, on the 6th inst., after a short but distressing illness, which she bore with great patience and Christian composure, Mrs. MARGARET FAXTON, relict of the late Mr. Allen Faxton of Marcy, aged 75. The subject of this notice was distinguished for her kindness of heart, her charity and benevolence to the poor and the destitute. She was a Universalist both in theory and practice; having imbibed her faith at the early age of 14, she cherished it to her latest breath with unwavering firmness, and died rejoicing in the full assurance of a blessed immortality for herself and a ransomed world. By her request the writer of this attended her funeral, and preached a discourse to her surviving kindred and friends from Heb. vi: 19. May the rich consolations of the Gospel in which she so firmly believed be freely shared by all her friends and children, the latter, with one exception, being now at the far west.

* * Will other denominational papers please copy this notice? D. S.

In Troy Grove, Ill., Nov. 27th, Mr. JASON GURLEY, Sen., the father of Rev. John A. Gurley of Cincinnati, in the 67th year of his age.

In McLean, Jan 8th, Mrs. MARY ADALINE, companion of D. B. Marsh, and daughter of Hon. J. Boynton, aged 28 years. Thus has fallen in the prime of life one of the best of wives, one of the best of children, one of the best of mothers, and a sincere and devoted Christian. Universalism comforted her in health and life, and it gave her great joy in the hour of sickness and death. Her funeral was attended by the writer on the 10th inst., when the consolations of the Gospel were delivered to one of the largest and most sympathising congregations that ever assembled in our village. May Heaven's blessing rest upon husband, parents, brothers, sisters, and all the family of man.

A. G. CLARK.

In Guilford, on the 8th inst., of consumption, WILLIAM W. THOMPSON, aged 22 years.

Thus has fallen a dutiful son, an affectionate brother, a sincere friend, and a worthy and useful citizen. Ever modest in his deportment, reverent in his language, pure in his morals, and amiable in his intercourse, he was a model well worthy the imitation of the young. His faith in the final salvation of all men gave him happiness in life and calmness and reconciliation in the hour of death. Though early called from earth, he had become strongly endeared to all classes of community, and his death has spread a deep gloom throughout the place in which he resided. Yet loved as he was, he is gone; leaving parents, brothers and sisters, and many relatives and friends to mourn their loss! Gone to that perfect circle, where all shall meet again: where sorrow, nor sickness, shall never come; where death can never tear him from the embraces of those united with him by ties of love; and where parting shall be known no more forever.

His funeral was attended by an immense congregation, in the Presbyterian Meeting House, near the dwelling of his father, on the 10th inst., and in accordance with his request, a sermon was delivered by the Rev. J. T. Goodrich. The Rev. Mr. Cobb, Presbyterian, and the Rev. Mr. Peck, Methodist, aided in the services.

Weep for the dead! the young, the fair
A mind exalted and refined—
Unsuited fame, and virtue rare,
A heart all tender and all kind.

Weep for the dead! the virtuous dead,
No more by worldly tempests driven;
His body sleeps: his spirit's fled,
To find a resting place in heaven!

THE STAR OF THE NEW YEAR'S MORN.

BY E. CASE, JR.

'Twas early morn, ere the dim twilight grey,
Had mingled with the sky's cerulean shade;
And one bright star threw down its mellow ray,
As night's pale host around it seems to fade.
Around my heart, like a sweet, solemn theme,
Did gathering thoughts from their deep fount arise,
Like angel voices in a midnight dream,
Till teary moisture filled my glistening eyes.

Methought that lovely orb did seem to say,
In cherub whispers to my bending ear:
'Behold in me and my bright burning ray,
The star of love that leads the new-born year!
When on the 'verge of chaos and old night,'
It, softly stealing, trembles into time,
'Tis mine in love to pour my early light,
And guide its steps to Earth's ungenial clime.

'Long years ago, when on the Syrian plains,
The Chaldean shepherds fed their gathered flocks,
And wandering bards tuned forth their joyful strains,
Mid tree crowned hills, and mossy caverned rocks:—
As through the dim and starlit realms of night,
O'er them was breathed the music of the spheres,
They worshipped me, as one that beams love's light;
And numbered me to lead the coming years.

'And o'er men's destinies they gave me power,
That prophet bards in my foreshadowing ray,
Might read of fate, with deep and skillful lore,
Foretelling things that wait life's future day.
But years have fled, and with them fled the spell
That then earth's children sought as things divine,
Till scarce a single worshipper doth tell
The spirit's mysteries at my dreamy shrine.

'Yet though no more my altar's incense rise,
And sister orbs have paled in dim decay,
My beam serene still lights the early skies,
And leads the New Year on its joyous way.
And there are those that love, not worship, yet
The cherished memories of my ancient fame;
And dreams of love, and thoughts they'd ne'er forget,
They render hallowed by my vestal name.

'Gaze on thou dreamer! drink life's festal bowl,
While youth and gladness spring in joyous play;
Ere yet it dreams of sadness tinge thy soul,
Or clouds float darkly o'er thy morning way.
Hadst thou but faith, to thee I could reveal
All that the future now conceals of thee;
But, no! I will not mar thy present weal;
A happy New Year! and thy heart be free!

THE SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST OUR EXAMPLE.

BY REV. HOSEA BALLOU.

'For even hereunto were ye called; because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps.'—1 Peter ii: 21.

Two important subjects are presented in the passage above quoted. 1st. That the sufferings of Christ were designed and endured for the benefit of mankind. 2d. That one benefit, which is provided by the sufferings of Christ in our behalf, is an example for our imitation. In support of the first of these subjects, numerous passages of Scripture might be quoted; a few will suffice. 'Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.'—But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.' Isa. liii: 4-6. Let this passage answer as a sample of the prophecies concerning this subject. 'But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man.' Heb. ii: 9. 'But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' Rom. v: 8. 'He that spared not his own son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?' Rom. viii: 32. 'For the love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them, and rose again.' 2 Cor. v: 14, 15. 'Who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time.' 1 Tim. ii: 6. 'For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.' 1 Peter iii: 18. These passages may serve as a sample of the abundant testimony of the New Testament, which fully supports the fact that Christ suffered for mankind, and that he so suffered for all men.

But the principle object of this communication is to present the sufferings of Christ as an example for the imitation of all who profess Christianity and a discipleship of Jesus.

If the doctrine which has been taught by the doctors of the church, and which is now believed by those who style themselves orthodox, be true, that Christ suffered in room and stead of sinners, an infinite penalty of the divine law, of course his sufferings could not constitute an example for our imitation. Christians are not required to suffer an infinite penalty, in room and stead of their wicked neighbors; but they are under obligation to follow the steps of the divine master, and suffer the just for the unjust, in any way which may lead the unjust to God.—There are many instances in which good men may suffer much for the benefit of the wicked; and if all who profess to be disciples of Christ were faithful in such service, sinners would be converted by thousands and tens of thousands, and converts would be as numerous as the drops of morning dew. There is a fellowship of the sufferings of Christ, of which Paul thus speaks:—'That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death.' Phil. iii: 10. The apostle has the same subject in view when he says: 'Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church.' Col. i: 24. If Paul had believed that Christ suffered an infinite penalty in room and stead of sinners, should we have read in his writings anything like this? Dr. Adam Clarke, on this text, makes an effort, by a criticism on the Greek text, to guard against what was evidently the apostle's meaning. He says, 'It is worthy of remark, that the apostle does not say pathemala, the passion of Christ; but simply thlipseis, the afflictions such as are common to all good men who bear a testimony against the ways and fashions of a wicked world. In these the apostle had his share; in the passion of Christ he could have none; he trod the wine-press alone; of the people, there were none with him.' Why the learned commentator should present his readers with such a criticism is difficult to imagine, except we allow that his preconceived notions blinded him. The very word which he says the apostle does not use, the apostle does use in the passage on which he commented. The apostle says, 'Who now rejoice in my sufferings (pathemasi) for you,' &c. See the same word rendered afflictions in Hebrews x: 32. 'But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions,' (pathematon.) See 1 Peter iv: 13.—'But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings,' (pathemasi.) The reference which Dr. Clarke makes to a passage in Isaiah is nothing more than a flourish unsuited to his subject. See Isa. lxiii: 2, 3. 'Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel? I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me; for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment.' No reasonable person can apply this passage to the sufferings of Christ.

The belief which tradition has fixed in the minds of the people, that the sufferings of Christ consisted of a mysterious something, of which mortal man can have no conception,—a penalty of the divine law which doomed the whole human race to endless woe, has dishonored our Creator; and, in the minds of many, has rendered the Scriptures incredible. If man, for his sins, justly deserved endless torments, it certainly is not within our comprehension how it was just for one who was innocent to suffer such a penalty in room and stead of the guilty.

It is a matter of no little wonder that Dr. Clarke, and other learned doctors of his belief, could have overlooked the fact, that none of the apostles, who so much urge it as a duty on Christians to follow the example of Christ, and suffer afflictions according to his example, ever made the distinction between the nature of Christ's sufferings and those which were suffered by his disciples after his example, which they endeavored to make.

We find the sufferings of Christ presented as an example for Christians to follow, in 1 Peter iii: 17, 18. 'For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing than for evil doing. For Christ also hath suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God.' If Peter did not believe that the sufferings which the disciples of Jesus endured for well doing, were of the same nature with the sufferings of Christ, why should he mention the two different kinds of suffering, and one as an example of the other? This duty of imitating the example which Christ has left for his disciples to follow, is thus expressed by the disciple whom Jesus loved: 'Hereby we understand what love is, since he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.' This passage is quoted from Wakefield.

'Be not overcome of evil; but overcome evil with good,' is a divine injunction. It is the righteousness of God manifested in the gospel of Christ; and no man is a disciple of the divine Master, in any greater degree than he obeys this command. Let every professing Christian examine himself; look impartially into his own heart;—compare his motives and actions by this divine rule, and, looking unto Jesus, who endured such contradiction of sinners, be faithful to imitate the divine example.—[Universalist Miscellany.]

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 30, 1846.

THE REVIVAL.

Well, after a sojourn of nearly three months, Professor Maffit, the great Revivalist, has at length departed from Auburn. He has gone to mix up somewhere else, I suppose, his strange compound of religion and 'Boz'—the Gospel, and 'woman as she was and is.' To say that he caused some excitement here, among certain classes, is but to reiterate what I have already stated to the public. It was a marked peculiarity of this excitement, that it was confined almost exclusively to the ladies. Matrons, and grand-mothers, of the mature age of the revivalist himself—ancient spinters and maidens, of uncertain ages—young widows, girls in their teens, and below their teens, have all been touched with the fever. How far this feature of the excitement can be accounted for, by the fact that Maffit declares that he is divorced from his wife, (of which, however, there is some little doubt in my mind,) and is now considered by the ladies, as marriageable, I leave for the reader to determine!

Do you ask how many converts Maffit has made. Yes; that is the right question. They are Maffit's converts—he made them. The Lord, I sincerely believe has had very little to do with the whole affair. So this revivalist is justly entitled to the honor of having them called his converts. There is great reason to believe a large majority of them were converted to Maffit, rather than to God! If it is not so, why could not these ladies, old and young, be converted by Br. Crandall, and the other clergyman of the evangelical stamp, settled in this place?—Could not God convert souls through their labors as well as Maffit's? To deny this would be the height of absurdity. But these settled ministers could not accomplish the conversion of these women and girls, and Maffit could. How is this to be accounted for? Not that God's spirit had any thing to do in the matter—for surely that spirit would be as likely to work through a good, honest, sincere settled clergyman, as through a wandering revivalist of doubtful reputation—but that Maffit, by his person, voice, and manners, exerted a certain fascination over the ladies, that the other plain, every-day ministers, did not possess! This is the whole secret of his success!!

Never have I seen an instance, where the creature more entirely eclipsed the Creator than in this! It is not uncharitable to suppose that Maffit was the great attraction, in the minds of his converts, rather than the Lord Jesus—that his person, his hair, his voice, was much more the theme of their remarks, than the beauties of Christ, or the glories of God. If we may judge his numerous lady admirers, by their actions, they gave ten thoughts to their demi-god, where they bestowed one on their Creator. When beautiful, and dressy young ladies, who profess to have been converted to Christ, instead of retiring to their closets and weeping over their past follies and sins, or showing the genuineness of their conversion, by seeking out and relieving the poor, and needy, and sick, who are suffering around them—are seen flocking day after day, for weeks in succession, to the boarding house of 'dear Br. Maffit,'—greeting him with a warmth of the most feverish description, and passing hours in his company—what conclusions can the sober, thoughtful, unexcited portion of the community adopt, but those above recorded? Let not the reader imagine that I paint these transactions in too high colors. The only deficiency is, they do not come up to the reality! Could I describe all the foolish, nauseating things that have been said and done—all the ridiculous, disgusting scenes that have been enacted—all the improprieties that have been seen during this revival, especially in the great revivalist himself—his straying through the congregation, gazing into the faces of females, while some good, honest Methodist brother is vociferously praying at the altar—his whispering with the ladies, getting hold of their hands, and kneeling before them!—the picture as a whole, would be almost incredible!

As to the number of converts made, Maffit and his followers boast of large numbers—some two hundred or more. But it is curious to note the sex, age and standing of the converts! The most of them are females—young females—who were before members of the different partialist congregations in Auburn—and who, from their age, and inexperience, and ignorance, were totally incapable of judging of the nature of the doctrines to which they listened, or of the influences and measures to which they gave themselves up. Among those who profess to have been converted, are some men and lads. Their number, however, does not at all compare with the other sex. But they are from the more ignorant and fickle-minded ranks in society—men who have been and are still, in most lamentable ignorance of the Scriptures—and who are moved solely by their passions—whose fears have been wrought upon by uproar, shouting, terrific groans, and doleful stories of death bed scenes, winding-sheets, rattling skeletons, and hollow sounding coffins. And some of these stories have been as absurdly ridiculous, as they have been palpably false! But among the intelligent, thinking, calm, stable, sober minded portion of the community, who exercise some degree of judgment and common sense, in matters of religion, I can not hear of a single conversion, either male or female! Indeed, on this class—composed of people of all sects—Maffit exerted not the slightest influence. This is a significant fact, which speaks plainer of the true character of this revival operation, than any language I can use.

That some good may come from this long excitement, is most devoutly to be desired. That those who have been wrought upon, may be permanently reformed, and hereafter lead more sober and honest lives—of which God knows there was great need in many cases—I do most ardently wish. Though to believe this, in any considerable number of instances, is to violate the lessons of experience furnished by similar excitements in past years!—But before the entire influence of this revival campaign can be estimated, the other and darker side of the picture must be contemplated. The number of converts who will ere long relapse into a state more hardened and wicked than their former condition—the number of young people whose confidence in the Gospel ministry, has been shaken by the ridiculous antics and suspicious operations of a professed minister of the Gospel—the number who have become disgusted with the very name of religion, and sent into the cheerless and hopeless regions of skepticism, by disgusting scenes they have witnessed in the house of God—the seeds of profanity sowed in many young minds by listening, night after night, to imprecations, curses and anathemas, uttered from the sacred desk—by hearing the changes of 'damn,' 'be damned,' 'damnation,' 'hell,' 'go to hell,' 'the devil,' etc., rang again and again upon their ears, until the very urchins catch them up and reiterate them in the streets—the numbers of the most licentious and abandoned who have made the Methodist church their nightly resort, and all the iniquity and devilry, that has been transacted in and around the church, during the continued and late night meetings of this long revival—all, all, this must be taken into the account, in judging of the influence and results of Maffit's sojourn in Auburn!—And when the good and evil are thus faithfully and candidly compared, and the balance struck, I am satisfied the evil will vastly outweigh the good. I am not alone in this opinion. The most intelligent and Christian portion of this community, of all sects, will fully coincide in this opinion!!

As Maffit has departed and the Methodist revival is drawing to a close, lo! the Presbyterians and Baptists have opened their churches, rung their bells, and commenced protracted meetings each in their own line.—Their object is so self-evident that none can mistake it. The Methodists having labored and toiled, and wore themselves out, in gathering a crowd of nominal converts, to fill up their own weakened and waning ranks, their evangelical brother Presbyterians and Baptists, now 'put in,' for the lion's share of the 'spoils.' And they will succeed in obtaining it! By using certain well known influences—fashion, popularity, wealth, decrying the Methodists as poor, unpopular, made up of the lower classes (and new born saints, are not at all proof against these seductive means)—they will decoy into their more fashionable churches, all the converts who are worth having, and leave to the poor Methodists nought but the 'flood wood!' Thus, as a Methodist clergyman once complainingly said, 'the Methodists shake the bush, and their neighbor evangelicals, catch the birds!' And the bickerings which will grow out of these attempts to see who shall catch most of the birds, will soon be heard in our midst. Mark my words!

BEAUTIES OF ELDER D. HOLMES' 'HOUSE UPON THE SAND.'

In the 49th and 50th numbers of the last volume of this paper, Br. A. C. Barray noticed and pointed out some of the beauties and consistencies of this work; but he did not take time to point out the one half of them. They are so liberally scattered throughout the whole of his long discourse that the mere enumeration of them all would occupy considerable space. We do not propose this task, at present, but merely propose to mention a few of the most sublime, that our readers may enjoy the benefits of this great light in the modern religious world.

Elder H. charges Universalism with maintaining that men will be 'saved by punishment,' albeit the charge is false, as we only maintain that punishment will be administered according to human deserts, and may be employed as one of the means, under God, of bringing the sinner to repentance and reformation. But granting the charge to be true, for argument's sake, let us see how he treats it. He says, p. 20. 'This notion of being saved by punishment is opposed to reason,' and proves it thus: 'While he (the sinner) is being punished what his sins deserve, he is committing more sin, and deserving more punishment.' And as he can not cease to sin while his punishment continues, so he can not cease to be punished while he continues to sin; it follows therefore, if he is punished all his sins deserve, he can never be saved, but his sin and punishment must be perpetual.'

Corollary 1. The prodigal, while he was suffering the just punishment of his sins, in his poverty, starvation, rags, filth and remorse of conscience, could not cease to sin; and as he could not cease to be punished while he continued to sin, it follows therefore, that he never did cease to sin and suffer—that he never did arise and go to his father, and was never welcomed back to the paternal mansion, but is sinning and suffering still!

Corollary 2. The wicked brethren of Joseph, while they were suffering the just punishment of their crime, in long years of remorseful condemnation and sorrow; and deep confusion of face, when they came into his presence, could not cease from sinning while their punishment continued, and could not cease to be punished while they continued to sin; it follows therefore that they are still sinning and still suffering punishment, and must so continue to all eternity. And so with all other sinners: God can never punish them at all; or if he does, he must punish them to all eternity! Beautiful! Sublime logic!

On page 21, Elder H. says, 'The attributes of God can only act or be exercised upon a principle that will harmonise them. His goodness can never desire a thing which is not consistent with wisdom: nor can his wisdom devise a plan, or his power execute it, which does not harmonise with his goodness, holiness and justice * * * That God desires the holiness and happiness of all men I freely admit.'

This is a beauty indeed, and not in appearance merely; albeit Mr. H. did not see nor understand it himself. This is Universalism as completely and triumphantly as was ever expressed: and all that our author has ever said and written before and after, and all that he can say and write, can never overthrow it. Let us look at it in the form of a syllogism:

1. God's goodness can never desire a thing which is not consistent with his wisdom; nor can his wisdom devise a plan, or his power execute it, which does not harmonise with his goodness, holiness and justice.

2. God does desire the holiness and happiness of all men. Ergo

3. The holiness and happiness of all men is consistent with his wisdom, and harmonises with his goodness, holiness and justice.

Or put it in another form:

1. God desires the holiness and happiness of all men.

2. He can never desire a thing inconsistent with wisdom; nor can his wisdom devise a plan, or his power execute it, which does not harmonise with his goodness, holiness and justice. Therefore

3. The endless misery of a part of mankind being inconsistent with the holiness and happiness of all men, can not be an object of God's desire, nor consistent with his wisdom; neither can it harmonise with his goodness, holiness and justice; nor can his wisdom have devised it, or his power ever execute it. Glory to God! Elder Holmes, of the Oneida Conference, has proved Universalism, and disproved endless misery, by the clearest logic and the most incontrovertible argument! But alas, how soon does his gold become dim and his fine gold changed! How soon does he lose sight of what he has just proved so clearly! On page 23 he says:—

'Nothing is more plain from the Scriptures generally, than that the will of God is not always done. In the chapter from which the last passage is taken, (1 Tim. ii: 4.) the apostle says, 'I will that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands,' &c. Men do not pray everywhere, nor do they lift up holy hands 'without wrath and doubting.' God said to the Laodiceans, I would that ye were either cold or hot, but at the same time declares they are neither, but lukewarm. And Christ wept over Jerusalem, because it resisted his will in refusing to be 'gathered.' All these are instances in which the will of God was not done, and from the preceding considerations, it is sufficiently plain that God does not will the salvation of all men, in an absolute, and unconditional manner.'

Was there ever a weaker, or more fallacious, or unscriptural argument than the above? Now we aver that 'nothing is more plain from the Scriptures generally, than that God 'worketh all things after the counsel of his own will'—that 'he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?'—that his 'counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure.' Mr. Holmes' great blunder in the above paragraph was, that he represents Christ and the apostle to be God himself, and their wills to be none other than his will.—Now the apostle might will, or desire a thousand things, and not be able to accomplish one of them. And had our author forgotten that Christ expressly declares, 'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me'—'I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father that sent me'—that he prayed, 'not my will, but thine be done?' (Eph. i: 11. Dan. iv: 35. Isa. xlii: 10. John v: 30, vi: 38. Luke xxii: 42.) Is it honest for him to substitute the will of other beings besides God; and then call it the will of God? Again, should he even prove that God willed a certain event that has not taken place, it would be no evidence of the inefficacy of the divine will. For if God has willed it, the event will surely take place in God's own time and way. Though he willed the creation of this earth from all eternity, yet he did not execute that will till this earth was created. Suppose he had revealed that will ages before to the angels of heaven; and they had reasoned thus: 'now God has willed the creation of the earth, and it is not created; therefore God's will is not an absolute unconditional will, or it is inefficient, and will never be accomplished;' they would have reasoned quite as logically as Mr. H. does.

Mr. H. admits 1. That the salvation of all men can be effected. 2. That there is in existence a God of infinite goodness, wisdom and power. 3. That God wills the salvation of all men. 4. That He has purposed the salvation of all men. 5. That he has promised it. 6. That he has confirmed that promise by his oath. and 7. That He has provided the means necessary for accomplishing the salvation of all men. He then turns directly around, and virtually contradicts and attempts to overthrow the whole, and denies that this great, and glorious, and desirable end will ever be accomplished—denies that these attributes furnish any pledge for the end desired, maintaining that the will is inefficacious, the purpose futile and foolish, the promise of no effect, the path itself conditional and doubtful, and that the means will prove utterly abortive! Of all the weak things ever published, we deem this one of the weakest. Our author virtually undeifies the Creator and orphanizes the universe.

He says, p. 25, 'the declared purpose of God corresponds with his revealed will, and both are of a conditional nature.' Again he says, p. 27, 'the promises of God are contingent, and his confirming oath of the same nature.'

According to him, God most sincerely desires the salvation of all men, but can not effect it; of course he must be unhappy in proportion to the strength of this desire. He has purposed the salvation of all men, knowing from all eternity that it could never be accomplished! Of course, he must have been either foolish or deranged—pardon the expression, reader, for it is the legitimate result of his theory—no sane and rational being ever deliberately purposed to do what he knew he could not, or would not do. Suppose it were possible for me to desire to turn the current of the Hudson River up stream; yet knowing the utter impossibility of the thing, could I ever deliberately purpose to do it? Certainly not; nor any other sane being. If it be said that God purposed to save all men on certain conditions, that he eternally knew they would not comply with; we answer this is impossible. For purpose implies determination, a fixed resolve to do the thing purposed. And God could never purpose, determine, resolve, to do a thing that he knew could not be done. God never had a conditional purpose—He never purposed a thing with an IF in the middle of it.—For absolutely and infallibly knowing all things, there could not be any such thing as an if or contingency in his mind. He either purposed the salvation of all men, without exception, or he did not purpose it. If he did, all the universe can never prevent it. If he did not, all the universe can never effect it. But Mr. H. says, p. 24, 'We have no evidence that God has purposed the salvation of a single adult individual, irrespective of his moral agency.' Very well; who said he had? But as you allow he has purposed the salvation of all men, if he has not purposed it irrespective of their moral agency, then he has purposed it with respect to, or in connection with, their moral agency; and the latter as a means was as much embraced in the purpose and as certain in its results as the end was. If you say God has not purposed to save sinners without repentance, regeneration and holiness, we will not dispute you. But as you contend, nevertheless, that he has purposed to save all, and they can not be saved without these, we shall contend that these were the necessary means embraced in the purpose of God, and just as certain of proving ultimately efficacious as the end was of being attained; and this end was as certain as it is true that God is God. What may appear to men as conditions, and may be such with them in regard to time and circumstances, are not conditions with God in any such sense as to render contingent or doubtful his own purposes or their accomplishment. With him and his purposes there can not be any such thing as contingency.—For 'his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure.'

Suppose I wish to build me a house. I look around and see whether I have, or can procure, the means. Finding they are at my command, I then purpose or resolve to build, which I should not do if I had not the means. Does not my purpose embrace the means, such as stone, brick, mortar, timber, boards, shingles, nails, mechanics, &c., just as distinctly as it does the end to be accomplished? Certainly it does, unless I am like the foolish man in the parable who undertook to build a tower without counting the cost. And it seems to us the Arminian's God is very much such a being.

There are many other beauties and consistencies in Elder H.'s 'House upon the sand' similar to those we have pointed out, which we might notice had we time. We know not whether we shall find time to notice any more of them or not. The above must suffice for the present. In conclusion we would suggest an alteration in the title, should he not see fit to adopt that suggested by Br. Barry. We would suggest, seeing his 'House upon the sand' is fallen about his head, that he call it henceforth 'a rope of sand.'

THE RESOLUTION, CIRCULAR AND PROTEST.

Br. I. D. Williamson, of Mobile, has lately published in the (Wetumpka, Ala.) 'Gospel Messenger,' a long, earnest and spirited article, entitled, 'Reasons for refusing to sign a Protest against American Slavery.' It will be recollected that at the mass meeting held in Boston the day after the session of the U. S. General Convention of Universalists, a committee of five very respectable and worthy Universalist clergymen was appointed to prepare a Protest against American Slavery, and send it to every Universalist clergyman in the United States for his signature, and requesting of all who refused, their reasons for so refusing. Br. W.'s article is a response to that call, and contains his reasons for refusing his signature to the protest. The following are some of his principal reasons: viz.

That the measure is unnecessary, inexpedient, and positively pernicious in its tendency.—That the Universalist ministry was instituted to promulgate the Gospel of universal benevolence, and not to mingle in the party strifes and political contests of the day.—That a party meeting or committee might as well ask our opinions on Texas annexation or the Oregon question.—That American slavery is a matter of civil law and social organization, not of theological science or church discipline, and as such, properly belongs to the citizen and ballot box, and not to the ministry of the Universalist church.—That bulls of excommunication, decisions of ecclesiastical Councils, Synods and Presbyteries, are useless in this matter.—That many other social and moral evils exist, besides that of negro slavery, and yet we do not think of party and denominational protests in relation to them.—That no good can possibly result from such a protest as this, but much positive mischief and evil.—That it will tend to rend our denomination into fragments as it has done other denominations.—That slavery exists, a positive, political and social evil, and it is not to be treated in the abstract merely, nor cured by Resolutions and Protests.—That though it is a great evil compared to the freedom and elevation of enlightened and refined Christian nations, yet, in comparison to his former barbarism and degradation, it is an elevation, an improvement and a blessing to the African, being far in advance of his former condition. On these reasons Br. W. enlarges and expatiates at considerable length, and concludes by expressing his belief that at some distant period a remedy for slavery will be found and applied, but can not be forced on, till the time has come. 'The light will come when the sun rises and not before.' Without pretending to decide whether all his reasoning is correct or not, we give the abstract from his reasons for the information of the public.

With regard to our own views on the subject of the Protest, we remark that, with the general sentiment therein expressed we find no fault at all. Our views on the subject of slavery have never been concealed. We have freely expressed them, publicly and privately, at the North and the South, and repeatedly exhibited them in the columns of this paper. But as to the right or propriety of a mass meeting in Boston, or a committee appointed thereby, demanding my signature to such a protest, or my reasons for declining, should I not see fit to sign it, I do not concede it, however respectfully such demand or request may be preferred. The article from our co-editor, Br. S. R. Smith, published in No. 52 of the last volume of this paper, expresses, as nearly as may be, my own views and feelings on the subject.

The measure proposed by the resolution was evidently intended for political effect, and as a party measure, to enlist our entire denomination, or at least its entire ministry, on one side or the other of a question pertaining not to religious denominations, but to civil, legal and political decision and enactment. And for this reason we can not give it our sanction. The melancholy and deplorable effects of allowing such a measure to be pushed, as an entering wedge, into any denomination, are sufficiently manifest in the divisions, contentions and strifes it has occasioned in every denomination where it has been allowed. We have our opinion upon this as upon all other similar subjects that agitate the public mind at the present day; and we are not afraid to express that opinion. But we do not wish to make the Universalist denomination responsible for our individual opinion; nor do we wish to assume or share the responsibility of the political opinions of a majority of our denomination, or of its ministry. Our professional and appropriate duties are to preach the Gospel, and seek, by every laudable means, to promulgate, exemplify, and infuse into society as widely as possible, its holy and peace giving principles. And we should never encumber ourselves with Saul's armor, nor tie our hands or trammel our efforts, by political combinations or party measures relating to civil and legal enactments. 'Render to Cæsar the things that be Cæsar's and to God the things that be God's.'

On a certain occasion (see Luke xiii: 14,) our blessed Master had the following request preferred: 'Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me. And he said unto him, Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?' And we can not more appropriately close this article than by quoting the comments on the passage by one of the very brethren who sent out this Circular and Protest:

D. S.

'Who made me a judge, &c.' Our Lord declined acting as a civil magistrate, or interfering with the details of human transactions. He dealt only with general principles. He exhibited and illustrated the great fundamental principles of duty towards God and towards man.—But whenever he was requested to act as a judge in special cases, he declined, lest he should give offence to them who were in authority, afford his adversaries occasion for an accusation, or appear to be assuming an authority which did not belong to him as a religious teacher. Matt. xxii: 15-22. John viii: 3-11. Moreover had he indulged the requests of such applicants and undertaken to settle private controversies, he would have been materially hindered in the prosecution of his great work, a work vastly more important. But he freely taught those great general truths, which, when properly applied, would end all controversies among men, and all opposition to God. And in this particular case, while he declined officiating as a judge, he imparted a moral lesson which would naturally abate the violence of the controversy and lead to a peaceable adjustment.—Paige's Comment. in loco.

A SPECIMEN OF PARTIALIST BIGOTRY.

A writer in a late number of the Baptist Register, published in this city, over the euphonious and sanctimonious title of 'A member of the church of Christ, embodying every thing good,' in an article cautioning his brethren of the Baptist churches against uniting with the order of Odd Fellows, gives, among other reasons, the following as a principal one for not supporting a publication devoted to Odd-Fellowism.

'One of their publications—the Gavel—is edited by a Universalist,* who takes occasion to publish Universalism as well as the principles of the society. On looking over a recent number, in an article against capital punishment, I notice the phrase, 'All punishment is reformatory in its character,'—pure Universalism. And will members of our churches support a publication of this character?'

It would seem that the fact of the editor of the Gavel being a Universalist is a sufficient reason for this sapient religionist to discountenance and use his influence against that publication, and because the principles it advocates are the same in essence, and quite agreeing with those of Universalism. When we reflect however that this good Baptist brother is a believer in the doctrine that the universal Father created man without his knowledge or consent—thrust him into the world—made him a free, moral agent, knowing at the same time that millions on millions of such creation, would use this free agency to their endless ruin, or at least neglect to use it to their salvation, when we reflect we say, that this brother believes in, and worships such a God, it does not excite our wonder that he should be so diametrically opposed to the dissemination of the principles of benevolence and charity, nor that he should caution his brethren to beware of placing themselves in a situation to imbibe them. He is doubtless well aware that if such principles should become instilled into the independent minds of his church brethren, that moment will those minds discard the God-dishonoring dogma of endless misery—that moment will the foundations of his peculiar church be undermined, and its rotten fabric fall about his ears with an astounding crash.

This 'member of the church of Christ' (?) sneeringly calls the phrase 'all punishment is reformatory in its character,' pure Universalism. If reformation is not the object of punishment generally, we would inquire what it is instituted for. We do not contend that all punishments inflicted by man upon man, are always intended to reform the punished, or that it always produces that effect—for instance, in the infliction of the death penalty; we believe it cuts off the only means of reform from the subject of its infliction—yet it was instituted by the wise law makers, if not a means of reform, as a means of restraint to other wickedly disposed persons. Whether even this object is always attained is a matter of very serious doubt.

Again, man may inflict severe corporeal punishment upon his brother man from pure revenge, without the least object of reform, but would our Baptist friend inflict chastisement upon a child of his for a sinful act, with any other object than to reform the child? We think not, and if he, an imperfect human being, has a good, a reformatory object in view, what may not be implied from the language of the good book, that God 'does not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men,' and again in the language of Paul, 'he (God) punisheth us for our profit that we may be partakers of his holiness.' We hope this member of the church 'embodying every thing good,' will reflect upon these things and endeavor to let friendship, love and truth, benevolence and charity have a place in his heart, and discard the baneful and proscriptive sentiment of bigotry and intolerance. No. 48 of the ILLUMINATED BIBLE, is got up in the usual splendid style of the preceding numbers, and contains the sacred text from the vi chapter of Romans to the iv chapter of 2 Corinthians inclusive. 25 cents, at Beesley's.

* It is quite probable that our Baptist brother was well aware that this same Universalist was formerly a resident of this city—was preparing himself for a Baptist preacher, but having by a careful perusal of the Scriptures been led to embrace the light of truth and salvation, and thereby had the dark clouds of partialism dispelled from his mind—that he is now a shining star in the firmament and an able advocate of Universalism—it is quite probable we say, that these facts served to augment the proscriptive sentiments of this partialist brother against the Gavel.

THE COUSINS, a tale of early life, by the author of 'Conquest and Self-conquest,' 'Praise and Principle,' &c. This is a neat 12 mo. volume of 205 pages, handsomely bound in muslin. This book is, we judge from a hasty examination, calculated to interest the young reader, and exercise a healthful and beneficial influence upon the mind and morals. The motto upon its title page is an excellent one, and it seems to be written in a tone in accordance with, and calculated to instill into the mind the principles of that motto. It is this:—'Little children love one another.' 'Charity suffereth long and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up.' 1 Cor. xiii: 4, 5. At Tracy's.

No. 71 of the Library of Select Novels is the story of a ROYAL FAVORITE. By Mrs. Gore, author of 'The Banker's Wife,' 'The Birthright,' &c. It contains 138 double column octavo pages of closely printed matter, at the low price of 25 cents. At Beesley's.

No. 10 of the illustrated edition of the WANDERING JEW, is got up in the same beautiful style of the preceding numbers, and with the usual profusion of well executed engravings. 25 cents, at Beesley's.

Editorial Withdrawal.

Brs. A. A. Miner and E. G. Brooks have lately withdrawn from the editorial charge of the 'Star of Bethlehem,' published at Lowell, on account of the difficulties subsisting between them and Br. H. G. Smith, another of its editors, or rather because they believe and allege that he has repeatedly advanced and continues to advance in the columns of that paper, doctrines and opinions subversive of Christianity, and is allowed from week to week to assail their characters and motives in such a manner as greatly to detract from the usefulness of the paper and seriously to injure the cause which they love. The present aspect of affairs at Lowell is truly melancholy from this cause. If we are to judge of this step of Brs. M. and B. only by what has appeared in the 'Star' we can not blame them. We most sincerely hope our cause in the 'city of spindles and looms' will soon assume a better and brighter aspect than at present.

The COLUMBIAN, Lady and Gentleman's Magazine, for February has also been laid on our table by Mr. Beesley. SHARP REBUKES.—A correspondent of one of our Western Universalist papers, in a long and serious article lately published, rebukes most sharply some of our Editors and Publishers for having rebuked each other sharply for sins of which they were supposed to be guilty. He cites for his authority, Paul to Titus, i: 13. 'Wherefore, rebuke them sharply: that they may be sound in the faith;' but seems to forget that those whom he rebukes had the same authority for the rebukes they gave to others.

A LARGE BUSINESS.—Rev. S. Streeter, pastor of the First Universalist church in Boston, at the close of a sermon on the first Sunday of the present year, in giving an account of his pastoral labors, stated that he had, during the past year, attended 98 funerals and solemnized 158 marriages; and that during his ministry in Boston (a little over 20 years) he had married 2,228 couples. A pretty good business that, in the marrying line especially. At this rate, we should not expect Br. Streeter's church would be depopulated very soon, notwithstanding the orthodox have, for twenty years, been telling their hearers that 'Universalism is running down.'

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—In addition to the sermons before noticed, we have received one from Br. E. W. Reynolds, and a funeral sermon each from Brs. O. Roberts and M. B. Smith; also articles from Fides, Celia, J. M. Day, J. J. Austin, N. S., J. R. Johnson, L. D. Johnson, and others, all of whom will have a place soon.

TRUTH.

BY MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

Celestial Truth! thy votaries cheer!
In our fair clime thy temple rear,
Diffuse thy radiance far and wide,
And o'er the deathless mind preside,
Fair science will impart a name,
And lofty genius soar to fame,
But thou,—immortal, rich and free,
Alone can give felicity,
Thy peaceful pathways upward tend,
And in divine fruition end.
Let virtue pave thy walks oh, Truth,
And sway the pliant mind of youth,
And bright Improvements golden sun,
Unchecked by Error freely run,
Onward the march of mind should be
Till every intellect is free,
For all misguided ones I feel
A lively interest in their weal,
I would that each were set a gem
In Truth's unfading diadem,
That each in wisdom's path might shine,
And wear the olive wreath divine.
Truth is our aim, or ought to be,—
Embrace it and be ever free,
Above the mists of Error rise,
And win the bright immortal prize.

DR. DWIGHT AND ENDLESS PUNISHMENT.

BY REV. T. J. SAWYER.

Br. SKINNER—Without the time, and I might almost say the ability, to add any thing to your columns by contributions from my own pen, I propose by your permission to show at least a friendly disposition by forwarding for your use such extracts furnished by my reading, as I may deem interesting or useful. I shall begin with some remarks of Dr. Dwight, on the Eternity of Punishment.—Theol. Vol. IV. p 456-7.

'Before I begin the investigation of the subject, I shall make a few observations for the purpose of removing, or, if that can not be done, of lessening, a prejudice (the strongest, perhaps, cherished by the human mind) against the doctrine in question. The subject is immeasurably awful, and beyond all others affecting. Few persons can behold it in near vision with a steady eye. The very preacher, who teaches the doctrine to others, can not but know, unless certainly assured of his own salvation (a case undoubtedly very rare) that he may at the very time be alleging arguments which are to effect himself and to evince his own final destruction, as well as that of others. If his heart is not made of stone, he can not contemplate the subject as it relates to his fellow men, without overwhelming amazement. The destiny of one immortal mind is an object whose importance no finite thought can conceive, no numbers estimate. How vast must be this object, when the number of such minds becomes so great as to reach to the lowest limit, to which the most enlarged charity will be compelled to extend it! How entirely overwhelmed must he be who contemplates it, when he remembers and beholds a melancholy experience verify the declaration of our Saviour that 'wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction and many there be who go in thereat!'

At the same time the subject is unquestionably perplexing as well as distressing. There are, I know, persons who speak concerning it with an air of cool self-complacency, as being in their view easy of investigation and free from embarrassment. I am inclined, perhaps uncharitably, to give them little credit for candor, clearness of intellect or soundness of character; and greatly doubt whether the doctrine has been investigated by them to such an extent or with such a spirit, as might furnish them with just views of its nature. There are others who discourse of it, in the desk, in the phraseology, the style, and the utterance belonging to vehement eloquence, such as we often find attached to a strain of powerful invective, or vigorous controversy. Something may here be allowed for the strong impulses of ardent minds; something to the influence, unhappy as it may be deemed, of controversial feelings; and something to mistaken apprehensions of duty. In this manner we may in some measure excuse, but can not justify, this unfortunate conduct. Were such persons to remember, that they may, at this very time, be pronouncing the final doom of their own parents, brothers, sisters, wives, children, and even of themselves, I can not but believe that their mode of address would be essentially changed; would lose all its violence and exaggeration, and would become deeply humble, solemn and affectionate. Every preacher ought to remember that the latter of these modes of addressing a congregation on this subject, is, incomparably better fitted to produce the best effects on those who hear him; while the former will usually terminate on awakening mere horror concerning the subject, and mere disgust at the preacher!

It appears to me that there is a great deal of truth in this paragraph. That there is a strong prejudice against the horrible dogma of endless punishment, is, however, notoriously false. Among the ignorant, the superstitious and depraved, the prejudice on the contrary, is almost wholly in favor of that doctrine. But passing that grand misstatement, the remainder is well worthy of serious consideration. It contains a very severe but merited censure of ninety-nine in a hundred of all the preachers of endless punishment in the world. Let them heed it, and particularly let them remember, when they are pronouncing the doom of so many of their fellow men, they may very possibly be pronouncing that of their nearest relatives, and even of themselves. I seriously commend the passage to the attention of the public advocates of that terrible doctrine.

'FAITH WITHOUT WORKS IS DEAD.'

It is the duty of every professed Christian, and especially of every Universalist, to exhibit to the world the fruits of his faith. It is a truth very much to be lamented, that many who profess our holy religion, do not live up to its requirements.—I know well, that the pure and perfect Universalist can not be found upon earth. But all can approach nearer, and nearer, to the holy character of the Saviour; and it is the duty of all to do so. Our faith was given us to be our guide through life; and we are happy indeed if we follow its dictation. Hence I say, whenever a new course of action is open before us, we should pause, consult our guide, and then turn to the right, or the left, or go straight forward, according as its counsel shall be. As individuals, we should not act as though we think honesty the best policy for others, not for ourselves. But our lives should be one unbroken commentary on our faith, proving that we have a living faith, that we cherish it deeply, and that its worth is beyond all estimation.

Here I wish to say,—and it will be well for Universalists generally, especially Universalist writers, speakers, editors, publishers, &c., to weigh well the truth of this saying, and apply it to practical life,—that the votaries of error and sin will be much sooner persuaded than driven to the knowledge and practice of the true and the right. If our faith is worth any thing, it is worth every thing to live by. Its leading requirement, in the line of duty, is, that we 'render good for evil,' and 'overcome evil with good.' Now, why do not Universalists generally, and other professed Christians also, practice this principle in their every day social life? It can be practiced, or it would never have been given as the rule of practice. And if this be so, we are the ones who should practice it. We may rest assured of this truth, that Universalism can never be permanently prosperous until Universalists live their faith; and a compliance with this condition will render it permanently prosperous. Why do not our speakers treat religious error with a cautious regard to the feelings of its votaries, thus endeavoring to win the heart by love, while we labor to purify the mind and bring it to a knowledge of the truth? The conflict of opinions will not prevent the union of souls, if the affinities of love be strong and real; but truth spreads her wings and flies away, if the heart feels repelled by the heart of the speaker. I can not labor this truth further: let the writer ever keep it in mind; but he will not, if his heart be not right in the sight of Heaven. And above all, (being what I wish to come at now,) why, in the name of Heaven, why do our editors and publishers depart from the most obvious feature of our faith, the command of God, 'render good for evil,' by going backward to the age of chivalry and breaking a wordy lance with the gallant knight who dare enter the field!—or, perhaps I should rather ask, why do they shoot school boy squibs at each other, with the vain expectation that our brethren will look on and enjoy the game, and pay them for the privilege of doing so! Do they expect to create parties in the denomination? It is too shameful to think of a moment! Or, do they expect to be greeted in this unholy work, by the voice of the world and of other sects, 'see how these Christians love one another!' Oh, away with all this, henceforth and forever!—Let reform commence, the people say, among the leading reformers! Let us ever live, and speak, and write, as though we really believe what we profess! Yes, the requirement should be constantly ringing in our ears, and sounding through the world, UNIVERSALISTS, LIVE YOUR FAITH!

As a denomination, too, we should ever remember the language of St. Paul, 'Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth.' In the present position, and prospective increase of our denomination, we shall undoubtedly be called upon to reciprocate occasional deeds of kindness,—and perhaps in some instances, to 'render good for evil.' We already have it in our power to do so; and we should ever remember, that he that doeth good shall reap a double good in return. Then let us ever be tolerant and charitable and liberal toward all sects; and we shall first gain their gratitude, and afterward their hearts.—Some are apprehensive, I know, that we may be too liberal for our own good. But such should remember, that the liberal spirit of Christianity goes out after every child of the human family; that we can not come up to the liberality of Christ, to say nothing about transcending it; that we had better be too liberal than too selfish; and that, if we must err at all, it should always be on the side of charity and liberality. The selfishness of some men, will not allow them to see the beauty and usefulness of the Christian spirit. That spirit consists in rendering 'good for evil.' And if we would preserve the continued prosperity of our denomination, and prove to the world that we cherish in love the faith of Christ, we must exhibit to the world those benevolent deeds, without which our faith is dead. Happy indeed is that denomination, which condemns not itself by doing what it condemns in others.

THE RESOLUTION AND CIRCULAR AGAIN.

Br. SKINNER—I think I do not presume too much, in sending this for publication; for it is hoped there are none in our denomination who are opposed to a manly and Christian-like discussion of the matter that naturally comes under the above head.

Although I fully believe the time has come in which we as a denomination are morally bound to publish our protest against American slavery, yet, others differ; so we will 'agree to disagree.' And Br. Smith will not wish any to understand that it is his opinion there is not moral cement enough in the denomination of Universalists to hold it together, though we feel disposed to speak out upon the greatest sin of the age; let that be what it may. Yet one reason he gives for not making slavery sectarian, is given in referring to 'the mischiefs of ecclesiastical action on this delicate subject in other denominations.' The intention of this is, to give the reader to understand, that if we thus act, destruction awaits us. Such a concession with my limited means to understand the Gospel, (and believing we possess its spirit in a measure,) I am not prepared to make.

In speaking upon this subject, Br. Smith will not think there is on my part a disposition to have a controversy with him, or to catechize him upon a subject that is 'above and beyond our control.' 'However clear it may be to many religious minds that Slavery is repugnant to the spirit and intentions of Christianity, it is quite certain, that many other great and good men view the subject in a very different light.' If these 'other great and good men' are not in the right, why should we withhold from them our light? and if they are in the right, why not give us their arguments in favor of the right, and thus put the candle on the candlestick? There was a time, when at the East we were divided in relation to Sabbath Schools; but did the agitation of the subject destroy us? No, because there was the spirit of Christ manifested in the discussion; and it has leavened the whole lump. So it was with prayer and conference meetings: some even went so far in their opposition to them, that they gave their whole influence against them, would not attend, and with a sneer would say, if we sang a Methodist hymn, or tune, (no matter how devotional,) there! that is exactly like the Methodists! or, it is too much like the Orthodox! And have we not out-lived all this? yes; and the obvious reason is, that the Lord is with us. So it will be with us on the subject of slavery, if we have courage to do our duty as preachers.—But now, 'it is too much like the Abolitionists,' or it appears like 'meddling with politics.' Why do we not think of interfering with this subject when we speak, lecture, preach and pray, for the abolition of capital punishment? this is all right, and why? because it is humane; it is Christian.

Suppose the Methodists have sung hymns and tunes that are devotional; shall we be debarred the use of the same means of Christian growth? And so, if the Abolitionists have the start of us in a good cause, shall we say we will not go at all? not so much as give our disapprobation of slavery in this public manner? Again: if a political party have spoken a great and universal truth, may we not be permitted as Christians to speak upon the same subject? If not, suppose one of the great political parties of the present day should be pleased to attempt to pass a law, that no Universalist in the Union should be permitted to receive an education, and that should become a party move; and also, a third party should be built upon the great truth, that all are born free, and should be permitted to enjoy the same advantages? Would Br. Smith, or any other preacher say we have no right to speak in the capacity of a denomination, because we should then favor a political party?—In such a move, I think Br. Smith would violate his own rule; even if such a bill had been passed by a portion of the State legislatures. And still slavery prevents the education of more of God's children, than now believe in the Gospel truth of a world's redemption from sin and slavery. If the world will give us but little credit for our professions, it will make no difference which course we take in this matter, (so far as it relates to the world) so long as we are not seeking the applause of the world, but are endeavoring to do our duty in the sight of God and toward man. If others endeavor to 'construe our actions into a disposition to meddle with others, while we neglect our own duty,' will it not depend upon our own motives whether the charge be correct.

Shall we take it for granted that Br. Smith's opinion is, that we can not speak against one of the greatest sins of the day, without 'neglecting our duty in our appropriate calling?' This I can not believe, although his article (to me) would seem to imply such an opinion. This we are told is a party measure; so it is; and have we not our party measures on other matters? and is this of any less importance because a portion of the people have opened their eyes, and have concluded to speak what they see and feel? We have had our party measures upon temperance, passed resolutions in our ecclesiastical bodies; and now shall we back out since it has become a political measure, one party for, and the other against? And yet all the difference I can see in the two cases is, that in the latter we had courage enough to do our duty and lead the people on to victory, and in the former, the people have gone ahead; and like most of shepherds in modern times, we are obliged to go behind or not at all. This is humiliating I know, but we had better do our duty at the eleventh hour than not at all. I say duty, because the world is looking (and they have a right so to do) to us, for a better state of things than they can find in any other denomination. And it is curious if 'there are but few among us who are in favor of slavery,' and yet to protest against it would be our downfall. 'Our crude opinions'—Is it a fact, as Br. S. will have it, if we are called out on this subject, that our opinions will be likely to come in a crude state? What! 'crude opinions' upon this subject, come from a denomination who have given more time to investigation than any other people? and that too upon a subject that has caused so much discussion, and has cost other denominations nearly their lives?—Can it be possible that we have so far neglected our duty, to become acquainted with so important a subject as that of slavery? God forbid that such a charge at this late day, be true of us. I can not believe it is. The resolution before us, gives a better idea; that presumes that if there are any who do not wish to sign the Protest, that their reasons would be worth placing before the public. Worth respectfully asking for instead of endeavoring to coerce; yes, they wish the world to have their 'strong reasons.' As to getting the views of every minister; is not this tried in other matters? and why not get them, if there are but 'few, if any Universalist ministers, who are unwilling that the public should know their opinions on this subject?' If this is so, and there are few if any who are in favor of slavery, where I respectfully ask, is the hazard of peace spoken of, except in that spirit, of those who are afraid they shall 'gratify some who regard their own opinions more than the peace of the denomination.' Does any one know of such a class among us? and if so, will they inform us to what extent that body of preachers who met at Boston the day after the Convention, are guilty of exercising their self-esteem to such an unwarrantable extent, with so little regard for the 'peace of the denomination'? I would again ask, if our life depends upon our silence upon one of the greatest sins of the age, is not the hand of Joab to be seen in such a course of policy, instead of principle? What are we good for if we do not go before the people? Shall we wait for the people to go ahead, and then (as is too often the case with preachers) claim the honor of having brought about the reform?

But I have already written to an unpardonable extent, I fear, and will close by inquiring whether the apostles shunned to 'declare the whole counsel of God,' for fear of losing their influence, or of destroying their societies, or losing their salaries, or even of losing their own lives? Many other inquiries might be made, but enough, the reader may say, unless it is better; so I forbear saying more.

THE PROTEST AGAINST SLAVERY.

Mr. EDITOR—It was with great surprise and no less regret, that I discovered in the Magazine and Advocate of December 26th. a communication over the signature of S. R. S., (Stephen R. Smith) in which decided ground was taken against the 'protest against American Slavery,' issued by virtue of a resolution passed at the Universalist Convention at Boston, in September last. With surprise, because I supposed that no man, possessed of those benevolent feelings and filled with that universal love which the doctrine of Universalism should inculcate, could be so far forgetful of his position, as to take a stand which strikes at the very root of his creed, and undermines those foundations of expansive benevolence on which it rests. With regret, because in the person of S. R. S., is vested an influence which but few in the denomination possess, and is therefore able to a greater or less degree to shape its course and control its action. I therefore beg the indulgence of your columns while I proceed as briefly as possible to remove what, to my mind, is probably wrong in the positions of Mr. Smith. Be assured, sir, it is from no vain ambition that I appear in this capacity. It is certainly with reluctance that I do it. I had hoped, but vainly hoped, that some one more competent than myself would have stood forth in vindication of the protest. I had expected that it would be defended by leading clergymen of the denomination. But as my expectations have not been realized, I feel myself compelled to undertake the task; not as a minister of the Gospel, but as an humble individual, striving, it is true, with feeble, but earnest efforts to restore to man his God-given rights, and promote the liberty and happiness of my country.

All the positions of Mr. S. neither time nor space will permit me to review. I must therefore content myself with an examination of two or three of the objections most deserving of attention.

His first position which needs particular review, is this. He says, 'However clear it may be to many religious minds that slavery is repugnant to the spirit and intentions of Christianity; it is quite certain that many other great and good men view the subject in a very different light.' To such a sentiment I certainly can not subscribe. The eloquence of earth can not convince me that there lives 'a great and good man,' who believes slavery in consonance with the spirit of Christianity. That demagogues have asserted it to quiet the conscience of those who viewed it in all its enormity, will not be denied. But nothing more paradoxical can be conceived than that of an individual professing to live in accordance with the precepts of our Saviour, advocating the heavenly origin of an institution which abrogates the marriage contract; which sunders the dearest and closest ties of earthly kindred, and strips man of those rights and privileges with which the God of nature invested him.—Can it be possible that a great and good man can believe this a heaven-derived, a heaven-sanctioned institution? If so, the vilest reprobate may indulge the belief that his acts are sanctioned by heaven and merit the approbation of God.

But again, 'the question has become most decidedly one of politics.' Is this, I ask, a reason why clergymen should withhold their testimony against it? Because a few philanthropists, many of them clergymen themselves, in their zeal to emancipate the slave, and rescue their country from the awful brink on which she is tottering, have adopted among other means, that which Washington himself advised, and have resorted to the silent but effective ballot to accomplish their object? Is this I say, a reason why locks should be placed upon the lips of the clergy? I humbly conceive otherwise. If men have become convinced that slavery is a great political cancer, eating out the very vitals of the nation, it is not only their right but their duty, their absolute duty to resort to the ballot box for its peaceful overthrow; and it is equally the duty of ministers to urge upon their hearers the enormous magnitude of the evil in a moral aspect, and to exert their power by protest, and every other way not derogatory to their positions as servants of Jesus to extirpate an evil which the whole civilized and Christian world unite in condemning. Were it a mere political question, the objection of Mr. S. might be tenable; but existing as it does, both in church and state, spreading its demoralizing and blasting influence both through the religious and political community, it becomes every well wisher of humanity, as well as every lover of his country, to apply his efforts in every direction where they can possibly be effective.

But again, it is urged that the denomination is to be injured by it. 'There is probably not a society in the northern or free States which would not be seriously injured in its religious tone—nor a minister who would not lose half his influence, and destroy a large share of his usefulness by the agitation of this vexed question.' This unquestionably was penned by Mr. S. inconsiderately. A moment's reflection would have convinced him, that by such reasoning he placed himself upon a level with the most fawning temporizers and time-servers of the world—an advocate of popular applause and approbation. To move in such a sphere, it certainly strikes me he could have no aspirations. But do I do him injustice when I say, that his argument thus presents him? He himself through the whole tenor of his article carries the impression that he considers slavery a sinful institution; and yet we must preserve the silence of the grave upon it. And why? Simply because by agitating it we lose our influence!! Is it, I would ask, the duty of a Christian minister, bound to declare 'the whole counsel of God,' to withhold condemnation of a wrong because by so doing, he loses the influence of those guilty of that wrong? Beyond a question he who denounced intemperance would lose the support, yea receive the frown, and perhaps condemnation of the drunkard. So the gambler would withhold his support from that faithful minister who denounced this vice. So of kindred vices. But is a man therefore, professing to inculcate the truths and promulgate the doctrines of Jesus, virtually to approve these sins by his silence upon those subjects? If so, farewell to the clergy. If sin, because it exists in high places, is suffered to remain unmolested and uncondemned, farewell to all efforts to Christianize the world. This was not the custom and practice of our Saviour. Like a true and faithful minister of the Gospel as he was, he hesitated not to condemn the monster crimes of his age. He stopped not first to ascertain whether the promulgation of his sentiments was to be greeted with the applause and approbation of the populace. He was actuated by higher and holier motives.—So in my opinion should the ministers of our age be. They should be faithful sentinels upon the watch-tower of Zion, condemning sin wherever it abounds, regardless of the effect—guided by the ennobling sentiment, 'do what is right and leave the consequences to God.' Such clergy are the true reformers of the land; who win, it is true, not the approbation of the multitude, but the lasting gratitude of the wise and virtuous who come after them.

I then again repeat, that I can not believe that Mr. S. was conscious of the attitude that he was assuming. And I sincerely hope and trust that upon a review of his positions, he will find that he has taken a stand upon which he who commissioned him can not look with approbation—a stand which virtually approves and sustains the God-defying institution of slavery in all its hideous and unmasked deformity. Cherishing this anticipation, I dismiss this brief review, with the ardent hope that it may tend in some slight degree to refute error and remove an evil from our land, which dishonors God, and stamps our national character with infamy.

BIGOTRY REBUKED.

Morrisville, January 23d, 1846.

TO JOSEPH HARTWELL, METHODIST E. MINISTER, STOCKBRIDGE, N. Y.

SIR—I make no other apology for addressing you through the medium of the press than that a less public expose of your conduct might fail to correct the errors of a man as selfish and ungentlemanly as yourself. For I confess that, during a ministry of six years, I have not met with that professed minister of Christ, who has exhibited to the world a more perfect specimen of human depravity and worldly wisdom (which the apostle defines as earthly, sensual, devilish) than I saw manifested by you in this village, at the funeral of my friend Lewis. That the public may judge correctly respecting a man of whom I have thus spoken, I make the following statement of facts, hoping that you are not so far gone in wickedness, but that, after a careful review of your conduct on that occasion, you may be led to repent of your sins, and become a more charitable, if it is not possible for you to become an intelligent man.

The deceased was a young man with whom I have associated, more or less, for nearly seven years. His parents and relatives, numbering more than one hundred, (the most of whom were present at his funeral,) are believers in Universalism, excepting some ten or twelve. With nearly all of those persons I am acquainted, and for years we have lived upon terms of intimacy, feeling for each other as none can feel except those who have received the Gospel in its fullness, believing it to be the power of God unto the salvation of the world. The wife of my deceased friend, is a member of your church, and previous to the death of her husband, had expressed to him her desire that you should preach his funeral sermon; to which he very readily assented. Accordingly, you were invited to preach said discourse. The day of the funeral came, and having been invited by the parents, brothers and sisters of the deceased, to aid you in the religious services of the occasion, I repaired to the house of my friend, and there learned that his wife had made a similar request. On being asked if Mr. Hartwell would refuse to grant so reasonable a request, she said, Mr. H. was too good a man to refuse. What confidence in her minister! Little did she think that one claiming to be a disciple of the benevolent Jesus, would in so short a time, and upon an occasion which naturally calls out the sympathies and benevolence of the human heart, manifest his entire disregard of the feelings and earnest appeals of bereaved friends.

Soon after, you, in company with two Methodist clergymen, entered the house. Mr. Lewis (the father of the deceased) informed you what arrangements had been made for the funeral, stating at the same time, that it was his desire—as a majority of the relatives were Universalists—to have Mr. Morey perform a part of the services at the church. Was not this a reasonable request? And would any individual, believing you to be a Christian, suppose you could have refused? Yet such was the case. And what, the public will ask, was the reason you gave for your refusal?

Your first reason was, That you had made arrangements with other clergymen, and could not consistently change the course you had already marked out. Suppose this to have been the case; Are we to infer, that those clergymen are so much like yourself, that, on receiving information that their services were not required, they would pursue a course in opposition to the desires of a large circle of mourners? But, Sir, I have every reason to believe that no such arrangements had been made. The clergyman who made the introductory prayer, you had not seen before entering the church, and I have been credibly informed that nothing had been said to him respecting the services before that hour.

Your second excuse was, That you had 'never united with a Universalist minister in the services of the sanctuary, and if Morey prayed like other Universalists, it would injure your feelings and place you under many embarrassments.' That you have never united with a Universalist minister in worshipping God, is probably true; at least I have no evidence to the contrary; and the probability is, that you never will, until you become a wiser and better man. But how a prayer, made by a sincere Universalist, could have the tendency to injure the feelings of any man, I can not devise. Universalism teaches me to pray for all men, for 'kings, and for such as are in authority, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty.' It teaches me to pray, that the will of God may be done on earth as it is in heaven. God 'wills that all men should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth'—that his kingdom may come; 'whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom and all dominions shall serve and obey him.' The Universalist prays that God may forgive his enemies, that sin may be finished,—truth triumph over error,—that death may be swallowed up in victory, and that every unreconciled being in the universe of God, may be made holy and happy; by embracing the Gospel, and 'confessing that Jesus is Lord to the glory of God the Father.' In short, there is no good in time or eternity, but what the sincere Universalist will ask his Heavenly Father to bestow upon his worst enemies; and more than this, he prays in full confidence, believing that God will answer his prayer. If a prayer like this would injure your feelings, permit me to inquire, what must be the feelings of that man who can not pray for the triumph of good over evil, and for the salvation of the world? Doubtless our Saviour had reference to an individual of this character, in his parable of the pharisee and publican. 'The pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself: God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I fast twice a week, and give tithes of all I possess.' In all probability, Sir, you felt thus, and could not listen to the prayer of a poor publican, who relies upon the goodness of God, for the salvation of the world. And why did you not give utterance to the feelings of your heart, by saying that you had no fellowship with Universalists, and inasmuch as you believe them to be 'extortioners, unjust, adulterers,' &c., you could not regard them as pharisees; instead of making the hypocritical excuse, that 'if Mr. Morey prayed like other Universalists he would injure your feelings'? Honesty, Sir, is a jewel, and I can assure you that the wearing of it is worth the cost. I do not blame you so much for not wishing to hear a Universalist minister pray, for you believe in a creed which consigns every individual possessing any claims to benevolence, to an endless hell; and it would be strange indeed if one believing in such a sentiment should listen with pleasure to a petition coming from a heart possessing some little share of the feeling Christ exhibited upon the cross, when his benevolent soul poured out love for sinners, by petitioning his Father, 'to forgive them, for they know not what they do.' But you can not be excused for laying aside every thing belonging to the gentleman, by refusing to comply with the request of at least seventy-five relations, that an individual (though you regard him as a sinner) should be allowed to make one prayer at the funeral of his friend.

Any gentleman (I need not say Christian) would have suffered his own feelings to have been injured, if by so doing, he would have gratified the feelings of one bleeding mourning heart. Neither can you excuse yourself by saying, that you are unacquainted with the customs of society, or that you are ignorant of what constitutes a gentleman. For you have lived long enough in the community where you now reside, to have learned that Universalists belong to the human family; that they look, if they do not act, like Methodists, and can appreciate kindnesses. Therefore, I believe that I am justified in saying, that your conduct was purely the result of selfishness, alike unworthy the character of the gentleman and Christian.

Your sermon was in perfect keeping with the doctrines of the M. E. Church; and had you been equal to what you supposed were the necessities of the case, we should in all probability have listened to a very powerful and effective discourse. But, as you had neither the moral courage, or the ability, to present to your audience the most revolting features in your creed, or to expose the licentious tendencies of Universalism, it proved to be what nearly all of those who listened to you anticipated, a very indifferent affair. It is true that you labored hard to prove the doctrine of total depravity, and came to the very sage conclusion; 'that the love parents have for their offspring, is neither stronger or purer than that exercised by beasts.' Hence, as all of the affections which exist between beasts are annihilated at death, so when we die, our love one for another, as it is neither stronger or purer than the love of beasts, must also be annihilated! How consoing this must be to the mourner! and especially so, to the young widow you endeavored to reconcile to the providences of God on that occasion!!

What do you suppose, my dear Sir, constitutes our humanity? Take from us our affection, and every quality which has a tendency to make us social, affectionate, and kind, and how much of the human being remains? If I understand this subject correctly, love is not a 'mere animal feeling,' but is a principle God created within us, constituting the child an image of the Creator. Annihilate this principle, and you destroy the very image of God in man, or that which constitutes our humanity. It may be well for those who believe in endless misery to consider love a mere 'animal feeling,' as they could not be reconciled to the ultimate consequences of their theory upon any other ground. And those who preach such a sentiment, manifest their benevolence by incorporating enough of atheism with their creed, to annihilate the noblest qualities of our natures, rather than permit us to live in the future world, possessing those affections which would cause us to mourn over the sufferings of the damned. For Heaven, we may suppose, would have but few attractions for a Methodist, were it not destitute of all love. The Atheist believes in the annihilation of the whole man, while the advocates of endless misery believe in the annihilation of the affections only. Which I should prefer I am not able to say. This much, however, is certain; Atheism, if true, puts an end to our existence as human beings, while Methodism continues our existence, after annihilating the very elements of human happiness, and raises from the dead a mere form without a soul.

In regard to my friend, you made some very happy illusions. You spoke of him as being an amiable and worthy man. Your conversations with him, previous to his death, satisfied you that he had embraced the Gospel, and in all probability is now sitting at the right hand of God. For these charitable allusions as his friend I thank you; for I can assure you that you manifested a degree of charity I did not anticipate. It is seldom that a Methodist minister will acknowledge that an individual dying in the belief of Universalism will be happy hereafter. Whenever we see so liberal a feeling manifested, we feel to thank our heavenly Father, that he has not left our opposers destitute of all charity and benevolence. Yet, you might have spoken thus charitably, being under the impression that Mr. Lewis was a believer of endless misery. Indeed, a friend informs me that you stated last Sabbath, that he had renounced his errors, (meaning Universalism) before his death. If you have made statements of this nature, and if you labored under such impressions at the time of his funeral, you must be entirely ignorant of the effects of Universalism upon individuals in the dying hour. You stated that 'he was reconciled—that he was willing to die—that he was at peace with God and man.' It was truly a happy death scene. But I ask, are these the effects of a belief in the doctrine of endless damnation? Have you the least idea, Sir, that he could have died happy, while believing that his parents, brothers, sisters, and a numerous circle of relatives, were all going down to hell in consequence of their belief in Universalism? No, Sir, such are not the influences of Methodism in the dying hour. I have seen Methodists die, and though they might have had no concern about themselves, they could not leave the world reconciled to what they believed was to be the condition of those they loved, in the future. That stern creed can not make its advocates so destitute of affection (notwithstanding their depravity) as not to cause sorrow, unreconciliation, and even murmurings, in view of the destiny which awaits the impenitent.

Yet my friend was happy; he was calm; his countenance was lit up with smiles. Why should he feel otherwise? He had unbounded confidence in the goodness of God, and as he expressed himself frequently, he believed that he should meet the human family in heaven. The fact that he was 'happy' and 'reconciled,' is enough to convince any individual, in the least acquainted with the influences of Christianity upon the heart, that he could not have been a believer in the horrid dogma of endless damnation. Selfishness is not happiness, and he only can die exhibiting the stoicism which that doctrine produces, who has lived a life of selfishness, and utter indifference toward others. My friend was not selfish; his religion was not the extreme of cruelty. Faith in Christ as the Son of God, and Saviour of the world, produces reconciliation; it takes away the sting of death, and all fear of future and unending miseries. This faith sustained the deceased during his sickness, and cheered him in his dying moments.

But Sir, this dying in the belief of Universalism, Methodism, Mahomedanism, or Mormonism, proves neither of these isms true. I thank God that truth is based upon something more durable and of more value than the faith of individuals in a creed. The Mussulman's faith does not prove Mahomet to have been a true prophet, or build a hell for the Christian world. Faith in the doctrines of Joe Smith does not prove Mormonism to be the faith 'once delivered to the saints'; neither does a belief in the creed of John Wesley prove the doctrines of total depravity and endless damnation true. Universalism stands or falls with the word of God, which promises to all men a deliverance from sin and its consequences. The purposes of God, as revealed to the first sinning pair in the day of transgression—his promise made to the fathers Abraham, Isaac and Jacob—the predictions of every prophet who has spoken of the salvation of God—the life, sufferings, death and resurrection of Christ—these are of more importance to me, than the belief of any dying man in the doctrines of his church. If these fail, then Universalism fails, for want of moral power to support it, and with it go the hopes and best interests of the world. For around this sentiment of universal holiness, and the consequent happiness of our race, gather the best affections of the human heart; and from it comes everything that is noble in theory, or good in practice; and to it, my dear Sir, I entreat you to come. It will give you a new spirit, and teach you what you most need to know—that 'we are brethren.'

When you shall have been converted to Christianity, you will be enabled to look upon yourself in the light, and in the spirit of the following words of Paul: 'When I was a child, I spake as a child. I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things,... And now abideth faith, hope, charity; these three; but the greatest of these is charity.' May God help you, is the prayer of yours in faithfulness, ANECDOTE EXTRA.

In the village of P., New York, there lived in days of yore, an old lady of unusual piety. One evening she arose in meeting to deliver a bit of a talk. And certain I am, that very many of earth's children have listened to speakers, who uttered less sense—without half the fun. Here it is. Brethren and sisters—I have been trying for twenty years, to get a contented mind. But finally, I have determined to be contented without it.

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.

From a report made to the Presbyterian Synod of New York and New Jersey, which we find in the Evangelical Observer, the American Tract Society is charged, in some twenty volumes of the more important of its publications which the committee examined, (1.) with making 'changes which effect the style of the author;' 2, 'many instances of change which effect the meaning and design of the author;' 3, 'in many cases these alterations concern THE FACTS OF HISTORY, 'Historical statements are often suppressed, and others of a different tenor put in their place.' 4, The changes 'affect the doctrines found in these books.' 'In the altered books, the doctrines of God's absolute sovereignty in saving men,—of predestination, election, perseverance,—of the nature and extent of the atonement, of man's ability, and of infant baptism, are, in many instances materially modified, and in others wholly excluded.' Now, I ask, how much confidence should the public place in the publications of a Society who have been proved to be repeatedly guilty of counterfeiting, of fraud, and falsehood?—who have changed the style, the meaning and design, the doctrines, and historical facts, of the works which it has professed to republish? What shall we think of a society who will publish to the world, as the genuine production of an author, with his name attached, language, doctrines and facts, which he never uttered nor held; but which are false, and were forged by the society for sectarian ends? Reader, place no confidence in any work on which you see the imprint of the American Tract Society. They have even altered the Bible itself.

Perhaps it would be well to ask what are the fruits, as to moral honesty and truth, of those evangelical doctrines which they profess to hold; 'Can a good tree bring forth corrupt fruit?' H. T.

WIFE VERSUS LADY.

BY REV. GEORGE ROGERS.

'A bishop must be blameless, the husband of one lady.'
'Husbands love your ladies, as Christ also loved the church.'
'Wherefore shall a man leave father and mother, and cleave unto his lady.'

In ancient times, it would seem, there existed on the part of women toward men a relation called wife. This relation appears to have been one of a close and intimate nature,—so much so, indeed, that it constituted an indissoluble oneness of heart, interest, and fortune between the parties, inasmuch as that 'the twain became one flesh.'

From a diligent comparison of the two things, the writer hereof has been led to think, that, possibly, the wife of that day had a sort of correspondence to the lady of this, and he hence has ventured to substitute the latter for the former, in the texts which head this article. For example, in ancient times the woman to whom a man was united by the ceremonial of matrimony, became from that union his wife; she now, by the same ceremonial, becomes his lady. A man's wife, moreover, was then the mother of his children, as his lady now is. The wife's relations became the husband's by virtue of the nuptial union, and his became her's, as is now the case with regard to the lady. From these and other points of agreement, the writer feels warranted in assuming that lady is but a modern and less vulgar title for what in former times was understood by the term wife. He is confirmed in this persuasion by the fact, that no married man now-a-days has a wife, from the king down to the cobbler, but each and every one hath a lady. Seemeth it not clear, then, that lady is but the superfluous of wife?

Whether the ancient wife was as pretty as the modern lady,—whether her waist was squeezable into the same pipe-stem dimensions,—whether her silks and plumes constituted as essential a part of her value,—or whether she was, to the same extent, a subject of ailments and doctor's bills,—these are points which the writer's researches have not enabled him very satisfactorily to solve. It is said,—though to modern refinement it would seem scarcely credible,—that the wife used to descend to the vulgarity of knitting and darning stockings, and that she knew how to roast a joint and make apple-dumplings. If this was really so, it would seem that the wife of past days could hardly have been what the lady of modern times is, though she may have been a sort of vulgarized type of her. Certes, however, the wife was a most valuable acquisition to a man, inasmuch that the wise monarch of Israel, who would seem to have had a plentiful experience among ladies, testifieth that, 'whoso findeth a wife, findeth a good thing.' Aha! a wife, indeed; I doubt me whether he would not willingly have exchanged his thousand and more fine ladies for one such good thing, after he had duly tested their comparative value.

Well-a-day! This question of the identity of wife and lady beginneth to prove perplexing as we push it into particular's; and that the interpretation of the one for the other, moreover, may sometimes infract on a rule which is thought to be authoritative in such cases, namely, that a correct interpretation of a word or phrase will bear to be substituted for it in all its applications. This will hardly hold in respect to wife and lady. For example, it will do to say of a woman that such a man made a wife of her; but to say he made a lady of her would convey a somewhat doubtful significance. So, too, in the marriage ceremony, 'I pronounce you husband and lady,' would not, perhaps, quite fulfil the intention of the statute. In the parable of the wedding-supper, also, the plea, 'I have married a lady, and therefore can not come,' would sound oddly enough; one, in such a case, would be inclined to conclude with the wight and say, 'Poor fellow, the spell of his lady-mate operated as a sad abridgement of his freedom, and the same should serve as a warning to all unincumbered members of the sex-masculine, to take heed how they peril their liberty by marrying themselves to ladies.'

And what, furthermore, are spinters to do in this case?

If lady means wife, then, as they are not wives, so neither can they be ladies. Shall we, then, term them young ladies, for distinction's sake? But how if they are not young? They, doubtless,—passive, good natured souls,—would not demur to their being thus termed so long as their memories remained oblivious as to their age; but far down in life, it is said, their recollection marvelously reviveth as to that particular, and after that period their modesty would take alarm at their being termed young. Good faith, the writer begins to doubt if he does not err in supposing a lady a synonyme for wife. When he sees 'Ladies apartment' over a cabin or parlor-door, he understands thereby not, exclusively, wives' apartment, but an apartment for women in general. But then, when he sees it announced that such and such distinguished men, with their ladies, have arrived at such and such a place, he understands not their women in general to be meant, but certain specific ones, to whom they have been married. This, of course, because distinguished men can have no such intimate connexion with women in general,—of course not.

On the whole, the writer confesseth himself puzzled on this knotty point; he may err, or he may not, in supposing that a man's lady means his wife,—or what in old times used so to be called. If he does not err, then his substitution of the one for the other in the above quoted texts is correct. If he does err, then, good faith, he has only to express his regret that wives have gone out of fashion, and ladies come in to fill their places. So endeth his chapter on the subject.—[Miscellany.]

SCRAPS FROM MY SKETCH BOOK.

BY REV. PETER BENSON.

Wednesday, Sept. 19, 18—. I returned this afternoon from a visit to Boston, where I preached on Sunday last, on exchange with Br. —. He has a large congregation, as large, if not the largest of the three Universalist societies in the city. In spite of the power of error and the pride of fashion, he exerts a great influence, and is accomplishing a mighty work for God's blessed truth.—He has his trials, however, and what minister has not? Though error does not exert the sway in the city which it does in the country, and though the party walls which divide sects are not so high and strong as they are here, Madam Fashion has more sway there than with us. I may have been unfortunate in the exhibition of her power which I saw; but if not, she is a goddess which reigns supreme in some circles.

While sitting in my sister's parlor yesterday afternoon, she received a call from Mrs. Lovetruth, a sensible and intelligent lady, who has recently been converted to our faith, and has left one of the most fashionable congregations in the city, and become an attendant at Br. —'s meeting. As my sister has long been a member of his church, and is a zealous friend of the truth, she was rejoiced to see the new convert, and to find her strong in faith and happy. She had been sitting with us but a short time, before Mrs. Fashionable and her two daughters called, looking as gay as butterflies. It required but little discernment to see that she was a woman of great pride and little good sense, and though without any grace of manners, she had an ardent desire to be an exquisitely fine lady, and to make her daughters also, one of whom was nineteen and the other seventeen, exquisitely fine ladies. The society to which she had attached herself was the very one which Mrs. L. had just left. As Mrs. Fashionable was unacquainted with the change that had taken place in her religious opinions, and supposed her still an attendant at her meeting, she began, regardless of my sister's feelings, to speak of the graceful manners of her new minister, and of the many fashionable people who attended his church! 'Why,' said she, 'he is a charming man, and he looks sweetly in his surplice! And then, his congregation is chiefly composed of the rich! Does n't our congregation make a splendid appearance? What an assemblage of rich shawls and fine bonnets! Mrs. M., who sits directly in front of us, wears a shawl that costs $75,00! Such things improve the taste, and add to one's refinement! O, I feel perfectly happy now; and my daughters, I have no doubt, will make more fine acquaintances than they would if we had remained at the meeting we used to attend!'

'You surprise me,' said Mrs. Lovetruth. 'Have you no higher motive than merely to gratify your love of show and your desire for display, in attending church? You have described the attractions of your minister and meeting; but you have not made the slightest reference to religion or religious feeling. For my part, I attend church to hear the truth and to have my devotional feelings awakened, that I may know and perform my duty, and be sustained by faith and hope in the hour of trial.'

'Hear the truth,' said Mrs. Fashionable, sneeringly, 'hear the truth! I don't care what a man preaches, if he speaks prettily; that is all I ask. I got fairly tired of hearing Parson — illustrate the truth. I say with our minister, if we live right, that's enough. Why, I should think you had better join the Universalists; they think we should all cling to what we believe, but I don't. My faith is not changed in the least; I still believe in the salvation of all, and I can enjoy my faith now as well as I ever did; it is over two months that I have heard Mr. R., and he has never said a word against it. Besides, he has told my husband, who you know, hated to leave his meeting, that he need not give up his faith.'

'I perceive, Mrs. Fashionable,' said Mrs. Lovetruth, 'that you are not aware that I now attend the meeting you left, and that I have indeed become a Universalist. But such is the fact; and I perceive that the very considerations which were held out to induce me to remain where I was, have been effectual in drawing you away from the truth.'

'You astonish me, Mrs. Lovetruth. 'Tis not possible that you have left our fashionable meeting for Parson —'s.'

'Indeed I have, and I bless God for the change I have made. I now hear the Gospel, and in its fulness. My mind is satisfied, and my heart filled with peace.'

'Yes, but your daughters, Mrs. Lovetruth, your daughters! Poor creatures! how I shall pity them when they are excluded from the circles in which they have moved!'

'Madam,' said Mrs. Lovetruth, 'I was once sincerely attached to the religion preached in the church you now attend. My husband was inclined to more enlarged views; and though he generally went with me, he occasionally attended your old meeting, and, once in a great while, I reluctantly consented to accompany him. Every sermon I heard there awakened my religious feelings; and I soon became more fond of the meeting than my husband. I mentioned to my minister, one day, the pleasure with which I heard the doctrine of Universalism. His reply was, 'It is no doubt, substantially true, but then it is an unpopular doctrine; and there are not many fashionable people connected with Universalist societies.' I was astonished; I could hardly believe what I had heard; I felt insulted that any one should suppose me capable of being influenced by so low a motive; and I was grieved that my minister should appeal to such a motive to retain me in his parish. From that moment I ceased to respect him, and have never heard him preach since. With me, it matters not whether truth is fashionable or unfashionable; I shall go where I believe it is preached, if I sit with beggars and worship in an upper chamber, and I am ashamed of the pretended Christian who will sacrifice truth at the shrine of fashion.'

This last remark was uttered with great warmth, and made the eyes of Mrs. Fashionable's daughters drop with mortification; for though they had a large share of vanity and pride, they inherited some of their father's good sense. At least, so thought my sister. But Mrs. F. was wholly incapable of comprehending the motives by which Mrs. L. was governed, and could see no harm in attaching herself to a church from a love of its fashion and show. She was, however, not a little vexed to find one in whom she expected sympathy, repelling her worldly notions with so much decision; and therefore she immediately left.

I found after the vain woman had gone, that she never made any secret of the motives by which she was actuated, and often made her high expectations of joining a fashionable society the subject of conversation. She thought that she should be introduced into the highest circles, and thus that the way would be open for her daughters to marry genteely. What a fine thing to be a fashionable religionist!

August 22, 18— I have just returned from the city. While there I inquired after Mrs. Fashionable, whom I saw nearly two years ago. Poor woman! Her oldest daughter had married a gay spendthrift without money! She has not yet gained those circles which she then saw opening to receive her, and in which she was to be one of the admired and honored, to which the vulgar multitude would look up with admiration. She is one of a clique, who, like her, hope to become great ladies by court- ing the rich. While the rich of the society will not own her as an acquaintance, Mrs. Lovetruth is still the same honored and admired lady among them that she was before she became a Universalist. None whose friendship was worth having loved her the less for being sincere and honest. She has found too, that there are as respectable persons among Universalists as among any other religious sect.—[Universalist Miscellany.

THE CIRCULAR AND PROTEST.

We this day publish two articles, one from Br. Parker, and the other from Br. J. B. Elwood, containing strictures on Br. S. R. Smith's article, published in the last number of the last volume of this paper, on the subject of the Circular and Protest. We give them place, 1. Because our refusal to do so might be construed to indicate a fear of discussion and a disposition to enforce gag-laws against one side, and give freedom to the other side, of those who wish to write on the subject. And 2, (and principally,) because we wish the public to see and know the different views entertained, and the natural tendency in our denomination, and on our own feelings, of unrestrained discussion and controversy, in our religious papers, on so exciting a subject, and on a question in deciding which we have no authority or control.

The attentive reader can not but perceive that much warmth of feeling, and some degree of acrimony, as well as misapprehension and misrepresentation, are already engendered in the very outset of the discussion; and these in most cases, if continued, generally increase and become still more acrimonious the longer the controversy is continued on so exciting a subject.

The two writers in to-day's paper, it seems to us, have both either misstated, misapprehended, or left out of the account some important facts in the case. For instance, when Br. Parker speaks of the freedom with which we talk and act with a view of abolishing Capital Punishment, or checking the progress of Intemperance, and of the unreserve we should manifest in opposing any partial law by which Universalists should be deprived of the privileges of education accorded to others; and when Br. Elwood adverts to the freedom with which we do and ought to condemn intemperance, gambling, and other vices; they seem to forget that these are all evils existing, or supposed to exist, among us, over which we can exercise some control, have some influence, and to regulate and restrain which we have some voice and influence in framing the laws: but in regard to slavery, it does not exist among us—we have long since abolished it, thereby showing to the world that we disapprove it—and we have no voice, no vote in, no controlling power over, other States where the evil does exist; and as they did not interfere with us when we abolished it, they demand that they shall be allowed their own time for its abolition, without our interference. The cases therefore are widely different.—In one case the evil is at home; in the other, abroad. In the one case we are entitled to a legal voice; in the other, not. Suppose we, as a denomination, should issue, and as one man, sign a solemn protest against the Autocrat of the Russias for sending the poor Poles to labor for life in the mines of Siberia; of what use or effect would it be? The Emperor, if he heard of it, might curl his lip with scorn and contempt; but the poor Pole would never be benefitted thereby. Let us, however much we may deplore the evils existing in other States, first seek to cure the evils existing at home, before we seek to interfere with legal enactments abroad.

In his very first sentence Br. Elwood has made two great mistakes: first, in saying Br. Smith had 'taken decided ground against the Protest.' For this is not true. He did not object to the Protest, or the principles or doctrines it contained, nor to any one signing it who might choose to do so; but to the manner and circumstances of its origin, and the attempt to make it authoritative as a denominational document. His second mistake is in stating that the protest was 'issued by virtue of a resolution passed at the Universalist Convention at Boston.'—This was not so: it was issued by virtue of a meeting of individuals of the denomination held the day after the Convention had adjourned.

We should not wonder if Br. E. was also mistaken where he says of one part of Br. S.'s article, 'This unquestionably was penned by Mr. S. inconsiderately.' Br. S. is now far advanced in years, is a man of close observation and deep reflection, and is not apt to pen and publish opinions 'inconsiderately,' and without a 'moment's reflection,' as Br. E. supposed he had done in this case. 'Old men for counsel, and young men for war,' is an old and good maxim; and we think is characteristically illustrated in the instance before us.

But we did not design to answer either of the articles which appear in this paper to-day. Nor shall we do so hereafter. Whether Br. Smith will think proper to do so or not, we can not say. If he does, he will be entitled to be heard. We will only say for him, that his whole life is a triumphant refutation of the charge of cowardice, or of being actuated by a time-serving and worldly policy.

In conclusion we remark that, while we retain our present views and the editorial charge of this paper, we shall not allow the discussion of slavery or Abolitionism to occupy a very large or prominent space in our columns.—We may occasionally, though we hope not very often, admit articles on the subject, if well written and in the right spirit. We have given already more room to those differing from us in opinion than we and those agreeing with us have occupied. But no matter. Our views are known; so are those of others. And let us well heed the admonition which Joseph gave to his brethren, 'See that ye fall not out by the way.'

LOVE.

Love is the great and main principle upon which are based the doctrines of Christianity. There is no precept taught in that system of religious faith, which does not rest for support upon the principle of love; not a solitary commandment but what brings forth and exhibits the beauties of this heavenly virtue. We look back upon the course which our Saviour pursued while he was upon the earth, and we find this sentiment appearing in every word falling from his lips, and in every deed executed by his hand. It shone out in all of his public ministry, and appeared in his language when about to yield up his spirit into the hands of Him who gave it. We behold him weeping over the woes and miseries of man; his heart deeply sensible to their sorrows and afflictions; deploring their calamities and mourning over the evils which every where surrounded them. Nor did he deplore the miseries and misfortunes of friends alone. No! Selfishness found no home in the Saviour's heart. His love was as extensive as the universe of intelligent beings, comprehending all upon whom had been impressed the name, the likeness, and the image of man. The truth of this fully appears by viewing his course towards the city of Jerusalem.

The inhabitants of that city were those who looked upon him as a vile impostor; declaring his profession to be nothing but the offspring of a blasphemous hypocrisy. They rejected him and the doctrine which he came to proclaim, and treated him in the most contemptible and vicious manner possible, and yet all made no difference in his love. His compassionate spirit was sensible of the afflictions which they were bringing upon themselves by the iniquity and injustice of their career. And though they were to nail him to the ignominious cross; though they were to stand afar off and lift up the mocking voice as he hung there in his agonizing distress; though they were to come near and thrust the glittering steel into his side, and deprive him of that which none but God should take away, yet he wept in view of the doom which awaited them; mourning because of their misfortunes, in the spirit of that heavenly compassion which found a dwelling place in his mind. In a word, such perfect love as that which was in the heart of the Saviour, the world never saw before. It was clothed in the habiliment of perfection. It came down from the realms of everlasting glory, and shall reign in all of its power until all things are subdued unto itself, and throw its charms around the spirit of man as that spirit wings its flight from earth to the bosom of God!

Love being the foundation principle of the Christian religion; every doctrine and precept of that religion partaking of the nature of that love, it follows as a matter of course, that this virtue must influence the heart of the religionist, or else his profession is nought but an empty name. It must not be a love for a few only whose faith is like its own and hatred toward all others! No; such a spirit of selfishness can never find a resting place in the heart of man while the religion of the Saviour is there.—All sectarian feelings must be banished afar, and never be permitted to enter the heart of man and render it estranged to his fellow man. True; others may profess principles of faith which we can not sanction; principles which we may consider to be erroneous in the very extreme, giving an unjust representation of the character of our Father in heaven, and preventing man giving him that glory due to his name. But what then? Shall our love be withheld from those thus professing? Shall we look upon them with the feelings of deep-seated and lasting hatred? Shall we turn from them as strangers to God and to man and to whom we are under no obligations? No! Like ourselves they bear upon their minds the impress of the hand of the Almighty. They are his workmanship, and recipients of his favors and blessings; and though their faith may be unlike our faith; though their walk may be unlike our walk; yet this is no reason why we should withhold from them, the tokens and manifestations of our love. Yet alas! how frequently is this done, and that too by those who arrogate to themselves the name of Christians; who have declared themselves followers of him who eighteen centuries past bequeathed his love to a lost and sinful world. How many there are who can see no good principles; no virtuous sentiments; no qualities to admire, in the minds, words, and actions of those whose faith differs from their own. No love for any beyond the boundary of their own creeds. No affection for him who bows himself in any other temple of worship. No esteem for the man who dare call in question the virtues of sectarian professions.

But one truth may be relied upon, and that is, that it matters not to what denomination such people may belong, yet they are far from being Christians; for love, the sum and substance of religion is not within their hearts as it was within the heart of the Saviour and hence their professions are nought but vanity. Yea; love is the fulfilling of the law; the moving spring of Christianity, whose origin was in heaven above, but which has descended upon the world for the well being of the children of men. And it must rest in our bosoms or we shall be far from being true followers of him who spoke as never man did before. It must not be restricted and restrained by any sectarian consideration whatever, but strictly impartial in its nature; a love for all as offspring of the same great Parent and recipients of the same rights and privileges. Then shall we have the peace and joy of religion. Then we can rest under all circumstances in which we may be placed, while we have the satisfaction of faithfully discharging the obligations which we are under toward our fellow creatures, of having loved our neighbors as ourselves.

BR. AUSTIN'S VISIT TO VERNON—THE UNITARIANS.

Some two weeks since Br. Austin exchanged desks with Rev. Mr. Emmons, Unitarian clergyman at Vernon, and gave a very flattering account of his reception. We are glad to learn that there is so great a reciprocity of good feeling between the two denominations, and that a Universalist clergyman is so well received at Vernon. But when we are told (as we have been) by a ministering brother, who ought to know, having lived and preached in that vicinity for some time past, that Mr. Emmon's supporters are at least three fourths Universalists, we do not wonder so much that a Universalist preacher meets with a cordial reception.

From articles that have appeared in this paper at various times from the pens of our good brethren S. R. Smith and Austin, it would seem that they differ materially in opinion with regard to the feeling entertained by Unitarians towards Universalists, so much so that when either writes an article and states circumstances confirmatory of his opinion, he begs the other's pardon. Whatever may have been the motives of the Unitarians of Vernon, N. Y., or Danvers, Mass., in manifesting such kind feeling towards Br. Austin we shall not pretend to judge, but a few facts may go to show how Unitarians have heretofore, and do now, manifest their very liberal sentiments towards us in this immediate vicinity. To begin then—some years since Dr. Channing came to this city, and his Unitarian friends desiring to hear him preach, engaged the Mechanics' Hall for the purpose. The Doctor declined preaching unless he could do so in a church. Application was made for the First Presbyterian house, the largest in the city, but it was refused them. Application was then made for several other Orthodox churches, and they were refused. The Universalists voluntarily offered them their church, but they would not accept the offer—Universalism was not popular.

Again—Rev. Mr. Storer, (Unitarian) from Syracuse once preached in the Mechanics' Hall, and during intermission, while at the house of an old gentleman, (a Unitarian) whose wife was a Universalist, in conversation, remarked that his congregation in the forenoon was very respectable looking,—expressed himself 'very sorry to hear it' when the old lady informed him that his hearers were mostly Universalists.

Again—while Br. A. B. Grosh resided (and preached to the Universalist society) in this city, some friends in the town of Trenton, some 15 miles north of this, desired him to exchange with Mr. Buckingham, pastor of the Unitarian society in that town. Br. G. expressed his willingness to do so, but when the proposal was made to Mr. B. he utterly declined.

Again—some four months since (and we had this from the lips of the chief actor in the matter) an aged and respectable friend, living in the same town of Trenton, being anxious to have Br. Skinner preach in his neighborhood, went about among the friends to make arrangements for the purpose of attaining that object. He called on one of the best able, and as he thought most liberal Unitarians, to do something, in aid of the object, but what was his surprise to hear the man express himself with this remark, 'that it would be the greatest curse that could happen to the Unitarian society to have Mr. Skinner preach to them,' and refused to give anything. His son however standing by put down his name and a liberal subscription.

Still again—a friend from this same town of Trenton, informed us but a few days since that Mr. Buckingham above alluded to, in a lecture a few evenings previous, had showed his orthodoxy by remarking in effect, that 'he could not see what ground Universalists had to build their doctrine or belief upon.' Other specimens of the liberal and good feeling entertained towards Universalists by Unitarians, in this quarter, might be given. But these must suffice for the present.

Whether these manifestations would be made in just such a way if Universalists were as numerous, rich and powerful, as they are in the Bay State, is a matter of some doubt to us. We are happy to learn however, that in striking contrast with the spirit which Mr. Buckingham has manifested, his predecessor, Mr. Pierce, several times by his own request and that of his society, exchanged with Br. Skinner in former years, and was a regular subscriber to the Magazine and Advocate.

With regard to Mr. Emmons of Vernon, we are not personally acquainted with him, but are happy to say that all with whom we have conversed, who are, speak very highly of him as a gentleman and a liberal minded man. One thing we are certain of, which inclines us quite favorably towards him, which is, that he has taken and paid for the Magazine for the last two years, which is more than any other Unitarian clergyman has ever done since we published it.

Another conversion in the Ministry.

A Baptist clergyman, of Middletown, Conn., by the name of J. Goodwin, after having preached the Baptist doctrine for forty years as faithfully as he knew how, has lately discovered 'more light,' on the great subject of human salvation. By a renewed and prayerful reading of God's word he has discovered that the Book of books does not teach the endless misery of a single soul of Adam's race, but on the contrary clearly teaches the final holiness and happiness of all. He has written a letter to the editor of the 'Trumpet,' expressing the great joy which his new faith affords him. His Baptist brethren have cut him off from all church privileges with them on account of the enlargement of his faith. But he rejoices that they can neither alter his faith nor his final happy destiny. It is indeed matter of joy to us all that Partialists have not the decision of our final destiny in their hands. It is in the hands of him who said, 'The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands,' and that 'of all that were given him he would lose nothing, but raise it up at the last day.'

GOVERNOR BRIGGS ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—George Briggs of Massachusetts in his late Message to the Legislature, has given the influence of his name and official character against the present laws on Capital Punishment. There are now four crimes for which the laws of Massachusetts inflict the punishment of death. He recommends that for three of them (treason, rape and arson) imprisonment for life be substituted for the Gallows, and 'also for murder in the second and third degrees.' But he thinks that, for murder in the first degree, with deep malice aforethought, and without any palliating circumstances, capital punishment should still be inflicted; but for no other crime. It is gratifying to the friends of humanity to see the constant progress of liberal and merciful doctrines, and the constant increase of influential men and names on the side of mercy.

ORDINATION.—Br. J. J. Twiss was ordained to the work of the ministry of reconciliation, at Danvers (South Parish) Mass., on Sunday evening 25th ult. Sermon by Br. H. B. Soule, of Gloucester.

NEW MEETING-HOUSES.—The Universalist society in Plattsburgh, N. Y., are making preparations to erect a meetinghouse the ensuing season. At the time the St. Lawrence Association met there in June last, though there were half a dozen partialist churches in the place unoccupied, not one of them could be had for the Association. Our brethren do right in building for themselves; and though they have doubtless helped to build all the other churches, it is questionable whether they will receive any aid from Partialists in building a Universalist house.

A new Universalist meetinghouse is about being built in Bourbon county, Ky., in size 48 by 36 feet.

Another new Universalist meetinghouse is to be built the coming season in Jericho, Vt.

A NEW SOCIETY of Universalists was recently formed in Huntington, Ohio.

Grosh, 'Punishment and forgiveness,' by Br. Sylvanus Cobb, now of Boston, Mass., 'Kingdom of Heaven,' by T. Fisk, 'Confidence in God,' by Br. Lucius R. Page, 'Brief scriptural explanations,' by Br. THE BETTER COVENANT.—This spirited and excellent advocate of the new and better covenant, established upon better promises than the old or legal covenant, has just entered upon a new (its 5th) volume. It is published at Chicago, Ill., weekly, and is about the size of the Magazine and Advocate. Terms $2 per annum in advance, $2.50 in six months, or $3 at the end of the year. It is published by Cyrus B. Ingham. Brs. W. E. Manley, D. P. Bailey, F. J. Briggs, G. W. Lawrence, W. W. Dean, and S. P. Skinner, contributing Editors. It is ably conducted, and we doubt not is doing much good in the great Western world. We heartily wish it abundant success and many good and promptly paying subscribers.

PRISONER'S FRIEND, vice THE HANGMAN.—Br. C. and J. M. Spear, have, at the commencement of a new volume, very wisely changed the title of their paper from 'The Hangman,' always a most objectionable title, to the 'Prisoner's Friend.' A new volume commenced with the year. It is published weekly, on a half sheet imperial, at $1 per annum in advance; and devoted to the abolition of Capital Punishment and the improvement of Prison Discipline. The objects of the paper are truly benevolent, and good, and we hope it will receive an extensive patronage, and be eminently useful and efficient in the final overthrow of the Gallows, that relic of barbarism and the dark ages, and infusing into all our laws and discipline the mildness, benignity and mercy which the Gospel of Christ inculcates.

REMOVALS.—Br. W. Sias from Mexico to Henderson, N. Y. Br. J. J. Twiss to North Granby, Ct. Br. J. Harriman to Manchester, N. H. Br. E. C. Rogers has accepted in invitation to remove to Taunton, Mass., and wishes to be addressed at that place. Br. J. B. Sax should be addressed at Cuba, N. Y., instead of Hume. Br. L. J. Fletcher to Cambridge, Mass. Br. J. Gilman to Sacarappa, Me. Br. G. Collins from Yarmouth to New-ton Upper Falls, Mass.

Br. Benjamin F. Gibbs, late of Madison, has been invited to take the pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Perrinton, Monroe county, and has already entered upon the duties of his office. He preaches every Sabbath, and we are happy to hear that the society in Perrinton is in a prosperous condition. May they long continue prosperous, and the richest of Heaven's blessings rest on both pastor and people.

Information Wanted

Will some kind friend be good enough to inform me where Benjamin Collis resides. He probably is in some Wollen Manufacturing Establishment, he being a spinner of wool. Information wanted for the gratification of his friends. Address Zalman Roberts, South Rutland, Jefferson county, N. Y.

SETTLEMENT AT THE ORCHARD STREET CHURCH.—We take pleasure in announcing the fact, that the Orchard-st. Universalist society, have extended an unanimous invitation to Br. O. A. Skinner, of Boston, to become their Pastor, and that he has accepted the invitation. Br. Skinner will enter upon his duties here by the first of April, or the first of May, at farthest.

There was great unanimity of feeling in the call, and Br. S. will commence his labors here under the most flattering circumstances.—[Messenger.]

The GOSPEL TEACHER commenced a new volume on the first of January. This is an excellent semi-monthly published in Boston and New York, by Br. J. M. Usher and should be placed in the hands of every Sunday School scholar. It is doing a good work. We should have noticed it before but it unfortunately escaped our notice.—Better late than never. One dollar per annum in advance. Address J. M. Usher, 27 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

The February (8th) No. of the FARMERS LIBRARY and Monthly 'Journal of Agriculture' is published. Its contents are a continuance of Mr. Thae's principles of Agriculture, in which the tillage of the soil, or its mechanical amelioration is considered—agricultural implements, harrows, the roll, and plowing. The Monthly Journal is made up of treatises on cows, the potato disease, horses, national sciences, &c., with illustrations. An excellent work, $5.00 per year. G. N. Beesley, No. 1 Exchange Buildings, Utica.

NEW WORK.

We have received several sheets, as they come from the press, of a new work about being published in Boston. The Trumpet contains the following notice of it.

THE BIBLE A UNIVERSALIST BOOK.

'We have now in press, and shall publish with the least possible delay, a work entitled 'REA-SONS FOR OUR HOPE, OR THE BIBLE A UNIVERSALIST BOOK,' by J. Victor Wilson. It is the most elaborate work, by far, on this subject that ever appeared. The author has been but little known to our denomination, but he is a gentleman who has made the Bible a subject of long and serious study. Although we may not agree with him in some small particulars, yet, the faithfulness with which the great object of the work has been executed, we do most fully sanction and attest to. As a scriptural argument in favor of Universal Holiness and Happiness, it is, as a whole, absolutely overwhelming; presenting either as 'direct, illustrative or collateral evidences,' over two thousand passages of scripture; and as well acquainted as we thought ourself with the scriptural argument in favor of Universalism, we confess that we have been taken by surprise at the great variety and strength of the facts here brought out,—the new arrangements, and happy classification of passages, that give great weight to the Bible argument. The work will be comprised in a duodecimo of nearly 300 pages, and will be sold at a price not exceeding seventy-five cents.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach at Mechanics' Hall in this city, next Sunday, morning and afternoon, and lecture on Capital Punishment in the evening.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—There will be preaching in the 'Lease Town' School house (Onondaga,) the third Sunday in February; let there be a general attendance. A three months sleep is thought to be sufficiently long for the moral health of the society.

CONFERENCE MEETING.—A Conference or Two Day's Meeting will be held at Tylersville, South Rutland, the second Wednesday and Thursday, the 11th and 12th of February. Our ministering brethren, and friends from abroad, are earnestly solicited to attend. Come one and all, who can make it convenient; and we shall doubtless have an interesting and profitable meeting.

P. S.—It may be proper to observe that the report so generally circulated abroad, that the small pox is in Tylersville, is entirely false. There is not a solitary case of it in that place, nor has there been. J. MENDELL.

CONFERENCE.—The Second Conference of the Otsego Association will be held in the new Universalist church at Pete Hook, town of Edmeston, Otsego county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (11th and 12th) of February. Ministering brethren and friends are respectfully invited to attend, as the subject of organizing a Missionary Society will be agitated it is very desirable that we have a full meeting. O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

NOTICE.—The new Universalist church in Sandusky, Cattaraugus county, N. Y., will be dedicated to the worship of the one only living and true God, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (11th and 12th) of February next. Our friends are respectfully invited to attend, and especially our ministering brethren. Come, brethren, one and all. We anticipate a glorious meeting.

This is the first and only Universalist church in Cattaraugus county. T. L. CLARK.

DEDICATION.—The new Universalist church at Glen's Falls, will be dedicated to the worship of Almighty God, on Wednesday the 18th of February. Sermon by Br. W. S. Balch, of N. Y. City. Ministers and brethren from abroad are invited to attend. They will call at the Vestry, where a Committee will be in attendance to direct them to places of entertainment.

CONFERENCE.—The Quarterly Conference meeting of the Hudson River Association of Universalists, will be held at Glen's Falls, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 18th and 19th of February, at which time the new church at that place will be dedicated to divine worship. J. A. ASPINWALL, Standing Clerk.

DEATHS.

In Jacksonburg, Jan. 6th, MARIA FRALECH, wife of Levi Fralech and daughter of Charles Delong, of the same place, aged 25 years, 4 months and 19 days. Consumption was the cause of her premature death. She had been apparently declining for more than a year past; during which time she appeared to feel sensible that the time of her dissolution was fast approaching, and that she was past recovery. She had joined the Lutheran church about three years before her death; yet, for a long time previous to her decease she came to the conclusion that Jesus Christ is the Saviour of the world; and thus died in the full belief of a world's salvation.

In her death we have the very striking proof of the falsity of that assertion so often repeated, that 'Universalism will not do to die by.' She came to this conclusion (that supported her in the last and most trying year of her life,) in her most serious hours of contemplation. This glorious view of a world redeemed, she had through faith; and it made her last hours peaceful and happy; resigned to the will of God and ready to depart when the time of her great change should come. As she was esteemed and beloved by all who knew her, not only a husband and child, parents and brothers are left to mourn her early departure, but a circle of friends and neighbors, who deeply feel her loss, are really sympathizing with the mourning friends. May the Gospel of the blessed God, be to one and all, a lamp and guide; may it in its influences turn their mourning into joy, and cause them to rejoice from all their sorrow.

A discourse was preached by the writer to a large audience, from the words recorded in Matt. v. 7; 8, which subject was chosen for that occasion by the deceased some time previous to her death. W. P.

In Lebanon, on the morning of Jan. 7th, Mrs. DELANA BAKER, in the 73d year of her age.

In the death of this aged lady, a mother in Israel has fallen;—one, of whom it may be truly said, her life was a practical commentary upon the faith she professed,—the faith 'once delivered to the saints,'—the faith which 'works by love and purifies the heart,' and which 'without works is dead,'—the faith which views God as the Father of all, Christ as the Teacher and Saviour of all, man as, every where and under all circumstances, the brother of man, and heaven as the final home of all the souls which God has made,—the faith which prompts to the willing discharge of every duty, and which cherishes with gratitude and joy the religion of Love, which is 'pure and undefiled' before God, the Father. This faith had been her constant companion for many years, had cheered her here under the various vicissitudes of life, had kept her unspotted of the vices of the world, had prompted her to alleviate the sufferings of the distressed around;—and now, we trust, she has gone to enjoy its full fruition in the blissful paradise of God. May Heaven richly bless the surviving relatives and friends, and especially the aged partner of the deceased. May he feel, in his loneliness, that the grace of God is sufficient for him, and rely with unshaken confidence upon His arm of mercy.

The funeral service was performed at the Universalist church in Lebanon, on the 8th ult., in presence of a large concourse of relatives and friends, and with the aid of the service of Eld. Jerauld, by the writer. J. J. A.

In Stockbridge, Madison county, Nov. 16th, 1845, in the 37th year of her age, Mrs. L. STRINGER, wife of William Stringer, Esq. She died as she had lived, an unwavering believer in God's universal grace; and through a painful illness exhibited an extraordinary confidence in God and resignation to his will. May God enable the husband in this hour of sorrow, to say,

'I know thou art gone to the home of thy rest,
Then why should my soul be so sad?
I know thou art gone where the weary are blest,
And the mourner looks up and is glad;
Where Love has put off, in the land of its birth,
The stain it hath gathered in this,
And HOPE, the sweet singer that gladden'd the earth,
Lies asleep on the bosom of Bliss.

'I know thou art gone where thy forehead is star'd
With the beauty that dwelt in thy soul,
Where the light of thy loveliness can not be marr'd,
Nor the heart be flung back from its goal;
I know thou hast drunk of the Lethe that flows
Through a land where they do not forget,
That sheds over memory only repose,
And takes from it only regret.

'In thy far away dwelling, wherever it be,
I believe thou hast visions of mine;
And the love that made all things a music to me,
I have not yet learned to resign;
In the hush of the night, on the waste of the sea,
Or alone with the breeze on the hill,
I have ever a presence that whispers of thee,
And my spirit lies down and is still.' R. Q.

In Guilford, on the 30th ult., Mrs. CATHARINE H. COLBURN, wife of Mr. Amasa Colburn, aged 31 years.

The deceased was a confiding friend, an affectionate sister, a dutiful daughter, a kind parent, and a faithful companion. Industrious in her pursuits, unassuming in her manners, social in her habits, exemplary in her deportment, liberal in her views, charitable in her feelings, and amiable in her disposition; she secured the love of a numerous circle of relatives and acquaintances. In her, the most fastidious could find little to censure, and much to approve. Surrounded by those to whom she was strongly attached, she manifested a commendable desire to live. She bore a protracted illness with remarkable patience, cheerfulness, and Christian reconciliation; and was sustained until death by that fortitude which a consciousness of rectitude naturally inspires. An ornament of society, cut off in the bloom of life, and the midst of her usefulness, the loss occasioned by her exit will long be deplored. Her memory is enshrined in the hearts of those who know her best; her spirit rests in that bright world where pain, disease and death shall never be known.

May the mourners be consoled by the expectation that they shall meet her again, where 'There shall friends no more part,

Nor shall farewells be spoken;
There'll be balm for the heart
That with anguish was broken.
From affliction set free,
And from God ne'er to sever;
They his glory shall see,
And enjoy him forever.'—[Oxford Republican of November 13th, 1845.

AN ALBUM TRIBUTE.—To E. M. G.

'And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.'—ST. PAUL.

Three sister Angels from their Spirit-Home,
With each a mission from their God, came down
To bless mankind, and o'er the earth to roam,
Removing doubt, and fear, and hatred's frown;
And thus their message over land and sea,
Dispensing blessings, setting captives free.

Faith from the store of Truth her tokens brought,
Proving a God, the Father of our race;
The Pagan worshippers their idols sought,
To raise them up, and bring their foes disgrace;
Faith triumphed over Doubt, and in her train
The free-born soul is raised to life again.

Hope radiant with smiles of promise came,
While Fear stepped backward stricken with despair;
Hope for life's present ills—a legion's name—
Spoke of unnumbered blessings thronging there;
Fear with her train of bitter, present sorrows,
Fled, while Hope speaks of blissful, bright to morrow's.

And last of all came Charity, God's soul,
But Hate's dread volley soon with vengeance flew;
Love armed with God's omnipotent control,
Drove Hatred downward with his horrid crew;
Love now stands foremost of the spotless Three,
Incarnate Love is earth-born Charity.

Lady, may each a dwelling find with thee,
And each in turn her holy office fill;
May Faith, and Hope, and Charity, all be Evermore garnered in thy soul, until,
Divested of its mortal, it shall stand
Immortal with the Three at God's right hand.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM BR. J. M. DAY.

Fort Wayne, Jan. 3, 1846.

BRs. SKINNER & WALKER—I have filled out a sheet for the Advocate, and now I will address you a few lines personally. I am happy to say that the visits of the Advocate have been pleasant and regular during the past year, and I hope to enjoy its blessings for another. Nor would I stop here, but would express my hope, that it may be continued yet many years, and yet be a source of profit to you. I am not able to offer you any other remuneration than such as I can give with my pen. I wish it were otherwise; but such as I can give shall be given cheerfully. I designed to have written you, and sent you some communications for publication long ago, but business has been so pressing that it has not been very convenient; and now I am teaching school, and snatch an hour occasionally to pen a few thoughts for your paper.

I have no personal acquaintance with either of you, but from your kindness to me in the past, I feel that I possess your confidence, as you most certainly do mine. I am not now engaged in preaching, as you are doubtless aware; but I feel no less interest in the advancement of the cause of Universalism, than ever. Whether I shall ever preach again, I am at present unable to say. My health has so much improved, that my friends are urging me to resume the ministry; but I speak the honest sentiments of my heart, when I say, that I do not regard myself worthy of the calling. I dread to assume so great a responsibility as the ministry imposes; for I feel myself unable to discharge it properly and successfully. While I was settled in Western New York as a preacher, I enjoyed a good degree of confidence and popularity; but I could not see those results of my labors, that I was anxious to see, and that others told of realizing. I have not inferred from this, that the Gospel as we understand it, has not the power of producing reformation, and all those good results which the Christian heart rejoices in; but the conclusion to which I have come, is that the fault is in me—that I am not gifted with the requisite abilities for presenting truth in such a manner, as to cause it to produce the desired results.

Besides, I feel that I am not well enough educated to be a teacher of religion. I am disposed to place high the standard of ministerial qualifications at the present time. I fall far short of that standard myself, and to be consistent therefore, I ought not to be a minister. I dislike to see so many rushing into the ministry, so utterly unprepared, as I know some of them to be. But every one must follow his own convictions of right and duty. If, however, I thought that none entered the ministry but such as were actuated by no lower motive than earnest convictions of duty, I should have far more charity than I now have. Many young men look forward to a profession, with the expectation that it will honor them above others. But no man's calling, whatever it be, honors him. He however, may honor his calling. The profession of law, confers of itself, no real honor, upon any of its members; but many lawyers honor the profession: while many more are a disgrace to it. So with the ministry. Many clergymen are an ornament and honor to the profession. But I consider that the profession confers no honor upon them.

I did not think of entering into so lengthy a dissertation on this subject, when I began. My thoughts crowded for utterance, and I have given utterance to them. I would prefer to have the title Rev. left off my name. The simple name of J. M. Day, is all that is necessary and is sufficiently expressive, as well as more agreeable to my feelings. Yours sincerely and fraternally,

J. M. DAY.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We were not aware, or if we had heard, we had forgotten, that Br. Day was not now engaged in the ministry. We regret that he is not, that is, if his health is sufficient for the labor. For many such men as he is are needed in the great work before us. We hope soon to hear of his re-engagement in the responsible duties of the Gospel ministry, and that his misgivings and scruples with regard to his qualifications will yield to maturer reflection, and the conviction that duty calls him to 'preach the word' and do what he can to enlighten his fellow man.

Aside from his scruples and misgivings concerning his own qualifications, we are pleased with the tone and spirit of his remarks concerning the dignity and high responsibility of the ministerial profession. We wish we could see some others whom we might name, entertaining and expressing the same exalted views—the same veneration—for the calling that he does. But instead of this, we see them proud, imperious, egotistical, supremely in love and admiration of themselves, vainly imagining that because they have assumed the ministerial profession they are therefore entitled to all honors and favors, while by their bearing, conduct and language, they dishonor and degrade the holy calling of the ministry. Iustance a Geo. W. Brooks, who by stratagem and fraud had managed to get a letter of fellowship some years ago, and whose proud, dictatorial and supercilious bearing, combined with deep depravity, ignorance of all he should know and knowledge of all he should not know, rendered him disgusting and contemptible in the eyes of all modest and good men, and who for his iniquities suffered excision from the order.—Also a Matthew H. Smith, and a Whitaker, who primed themselves so much on their personal charms and attractions, whose disgusting dandyism and fopperies, egotism and self-esteem, and, above all, whose hollow hearted hypocrisy and utter want of conscientiousness soon drove them from our denomination into those more congenial with their disposition and temperament, and thus happily rid us of their longer presence among us. And we hope we have few, if any, now remaining with us of similar character. Still we fear there are too many who come far short of what they should be, to confer true and lasting honor on the profession.

But in Br. Day's case, the very fears and apprehensions he feels, lest he should dishonor the profession, are an ample safeguard against it. We have no fears for him in this respect. We wish all entertained similar views, a similar respect and veneration for the calling: we should have no fears of its being dishonored by those who engage in it. Such are the very men we want in it.

But Br. D. says he 'could not see those results of' his 'labors that he was anxious to see, and that others told of realizing.' This is very possible, and yet the fault may not be in him. Many other good men—even great and good men—have felt and said the same. We have no doubt the apostles themselves often failed of seeing and realizing all the good results they desired and anticipated. Sometimes the seed fell on stony places, or among thorns, or by the way side, and yielded no fruit, however pure it was or however faithfully sown. 'Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days.' 'He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.'

Go forth then, Br. D., if health permits, scatter the good seed of the kingdom, and leave the event, the fruits, to God. Let your standard be high, we care not how high, and approach as near to it as possible. D. S.

BY REV. M. B. SMITH.

'Wherefore comfort one another with these words.'

1 Thess. iv: 18.

I know not that it needs to be said that man in his mortal state is an imperfect being, subject to vanity, exposed to disappointment, liable, every moment of his existence, to sorrow, pain and death; that he is, indeed, 'of few days and full of trouble;' but it needs to be said, that the Ordainer of his lot has never left him comfortless. This needs to be said, not because it is not equally evident, but because it is not equally acknowledged; for man, even in his present state of frailty, is endowed with a capacity for enjoyment commensurate with his irrepressible desire of happiness; and the means of enjoyment, the sources of comfort, the fountains of joy, are multiplied around him; they are indeed innumerable. Such is man's condition. And tho' it be indeed subjected to imperfection and vanity, to much that seems like evil, that looks like mystery and mischance; much which to the reflecting mind is trying to the mental powers, and touching to the sensibilities of the heart; yet were we to take this world as all, its enjoyments are worth living for. And though the tenure, by which this present existence is held, be as precarious and uncertain as the ever varying wind that 'bloweth where it listeth;' yet to be born, to have an existence even here is a blessing. But we do not take this world as all. It is not all. To live, to suffer, to enjoy, to sorrow and to be comforted, to struggle for existence, three score years and ten, or for an uncertain portion of that brief period, and then to die; is not all that God has ordained for us. And the words, the holy words of divine truth, which assure us that there is in the counsels of Heaven something more and better for us, are the words with which the apostle would have his brethren comfort one another. To arm them with fortitude, to reconcile them to the evils of this life, and to death itself, he would have them anticipate a life to come, free from every evil; he would have them look upon death as the commencement of a change the consummation of which should usher them into the glorious presence of the Lord, 'where are joys forevermore.'

Death is indeed a dark hour, if no hour shall succeed! If it be, and forever the termination of all conscious existence, it would be, methinks, as impossible as it would be unnatural to derive comfort from its contemplation. But it is not so. It can not be, that the ever-existing desire of the human bosom, the longings and aspirations of the human heart for life, for immortality, are thus never to be realized. The future—all beyond the grave, is often, indeed, to mere worldly calculations—to mere earthly views—'a land of darkness, as darkness itself.' And therefore it is that there was, and is, a need, a pressing need, for light to shine above and beyond all the illuminations of science and philosophy. And therefore it is that Revelation is neither strange, unnecessary, nor unnatural. Supernatural it may be, for it supercedes and exceeds all that nature ever taught, or philosophy ever conjectured. All that there is strange or mysterious about revelation is, that there is no more of it. And I confess that when I consider man's necessity and weakness, his blindness, ignorance and incredulity, his native fear and dread of death, I sometimes wonder that revelations from, and about the invisible world are not more abundant, more frequent, more irresistible. No, I do not marvel, that God saw fit to elevate by inspiration the minds of his chosen servants to the conception of truths far too mighty, too sublime and glorious, for the attainment of human reason. That he saw fit to reveal himself as the universal Father, 'the living God, who is the Saviour of all men.' That moved by a compassion infinite, and boundless, he sent from his paternal bosom his well beloved Son, to bring life and immortality to light, by his death and resurrection; to inspire a love and a hope of heaven by his teachings and example. I only marvel, that the so much needed revealings by inspiration were so soon withheld, that Jesus, 'the desire of all nations,' the light and life of the world, so soon retired.

But though the clearer and more frequent revelations from the spirit-land, which the misgivings of the heart sometimes demands are withheld, yet, I confess, we have enough to exult in the possession of, and to praise God for its bestowment. Enough no doubt for every useful purpose of our present discipline—enough for present comfort and consolation, to know, that God is good, and good to all.—And the regret sometimes felt, that the Saviour of world so soon retired, is lessened by the consideration that he ascended as our forerunner in majesty and love to the glory and bliss of heaven; the regret that he no longer holds in person communion with his disciples on earth, is lessened by the consideration that he left not the world comfortless—that he promised to send the Comforter, saying, 'I will pray the Father and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you forever, even the spirit of truth.' And truly was this blessed assurance of Jesus verified, when on the day of Pentecost, the apostles were filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with tongues as the spirit gave them utterance.

And it was the province of Jesus—the chief object of his mission—'to bind up the broken-hearted, and comfort all that mourn,' so when the spirit of truth, in his name, descended upon the apostles, they were thereby fully qualified and commissioned to the same benevolent work. Words of truth were committed to them for the reconciliation of the world to God—words of truth which had been from past ages, but now made manifest—words of truth full of comfort and consolation for suffering humanity, all powerful to reconcile men not only to all the seeming evils of this present life, but also to death itself, the most dreaded of all. Hence their ministry was a ministry of life, of joy, of hope. They had received the comforter, the word of reconciliation, and they freely imparted the same to their fellow men. They knew that there was that in death which touched the tenderest sensibilities of our common nature. They knew that if ever men needed a word of comfort and hope, it was when bereft of friends by the hand of death, or when about to encounter its terrors themselves; and they were ready, whenever occasion required, to administer to mourners words fraught with consolation.

The solicitude of the apostle to console the bereaved is manifest in the context. 'I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not as others which have no hope,' clearly implying that there is nothing, in the condition of the dead, to excite sorrow on their account—clearly implying that the dead were not sleeping an endless sleep, nor suffering endless pain. Again he says, 'To die is gain,' clearly implying that the life to come is better and more to be desired than this. And when this great apostle enters more fully upon the subject of death and the resurrection, in his letter to the Corinthians, he represents death as the preparatory portion of a change which transforms all who die in Adam into the heavenly image of Christ,—a change which transforms from corruption to incorruption, from weakness to power, from dishonor to glory. Thus, in accordance with what the Master had taught when he said, 'In the resurrection all live unto God,' 'are like the angels of God in heaven,' 'are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection,' this devout disciple ever entertained and maintained 'the hope of the resurrection,' ever set forth man's prospects beyond the grave as glorious and joyful. And he seems ever solicitous to impart to the disconsolate, joy and hope—ever anxious that men should comfort one another with these words of truth.

But alas! how little of this solicitude to console the bereaved do we witness at the present day! how seldom do mourners retire from the funeral solemnities reconciled, consoled, and comforted by the words of the speaker! It would seem that by far the greater part of our most able and popular preachers deem it no part of their sacred duty, to impart consolation to the circles of mourners which, from time to time, gather around their altars, and who, with eyes flooded with tears, imploringly look to them to be comforted. Instead of wiping the tear from sorrow's eye, and reducing to quietude and composure the troubled element of disconsolate spirits—instead of pouring the oil and the wine of consolation into the wounded soul, by the soothing words of the Gospel of life, of hope and peace; the funeral occasion is seized upon as a favorable opportunity to harrow up the tender feelings of our nature, to wound still deeper the lacerated bosom—to excite dismal apprehensions of the future—to instil doubt and fear as to the condition of the departed—to clothe death in all the habiliments of terror, and represent it as the soul's exit from a world of sorrow to a world of unutterable and ceaseless torment.

Thus to soul's smitten and afflicted, fainting for the bread of life, wormwood and hemlock are dealt in profuse abundance. And if, with all this, there is exhibited a crumb of comfort, a morsel of consolation, special care is taken to deal it out to a select few only, and to them, even, with a sparing hand. I do not impugn the motives of men who thus observe the light of the Gospel by their own dark and dismal creeds. 'Miserable comforters' are they indeed; yet they may be, and probably are, prompted by motives, which in their view, at least, are truly benevolent. They claim to make men better: they hope to do this by exciting their fears; and seem to imagine that the more of terror they can infuse into their discourses the more successful they will be in the good work of inducing reformation. They honestly believe, no doubt, that the Scriptures sanction the course they pursue. And truly, they seem not much at a loss to find passages, upon which constructions may be put, terrible in their aspect, and most horrible in their results. Anxious to reform the wicked, efforts are made to alarm them by awful descriptions of a day of judgment far off in the invisible world, where men shall give a strict account for every sinful act, and every idle word, where punishment vindictive, shall be inflicted upon all who have done evil—punishment without mercy and without end! Thus the whole human family are doomed to endless perdition! For who is there that has not done evil!

* Br. Skinner, I send you this discourse for publication by the request of Br. G. B. Smith. It was delivered on the occasion of the death of his wife, who died at Albion, Orleans county, Nov. 17, 1845. Sister Smith being a member of the Baptist church, her funeral was attended in that church, by its Pastor, who labored to Ecl. ix: 10.

M. B. S.

Most certainly universal condemnation would be the horrible result of such a judgment, whether its advocates admit it or not. Such a result I know, indeed, they do not admit. They say some, by certain means, will escape the demands of justice, and so go unpunished: forgetting that God has said he 'will by no means clear the guilty,' and that 'the wicked shall not be unpunished.' Overlooking the divine testimony that 'the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the ungodly and the sinner,' they seem to think that, if men are not threatened with the most severe retributions in eternity, there is no restraint to vice, no encouragement to virtue. Hence, a formal judgment in eternity is, with them, the grand conservative principle of the Gospel: to depict it in all the terrors which a distorted fancy can give to it, the chief business of their office. A business unenviable enough in all conscience. But the Bible, it is said, is full of proof of such a judgment. True, the sacred writers have spoken of judgments; but unfortunately for the advocates of a formal judgment in eternity, they are judgments which have been, and are to be executed in the earth. Isaiah prophecies concerning the Messiah, 'Behold my servant whom I uphold; mine elect in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my spirit upon him; he shall bring forth judgment unto the Gentiles. He shall not fail nor be discouraged till he have set judgment in the earth, and the isles shall wait for his law.' To the same import, Jeremias says, 'Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth.' And Jesus himself says, 'For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son, and hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man.' And again he says, 'for judgment I am come into this world.' These and other like passages so clearly sustain the doctrine of divine judgment in the earth, that comment is deemed unnecessary. There are indeed passages which are supposed to teach not only a judgment in the future state, but that the eternal weal or woe of millions are fixed thereby. The parable of the sheep and goats, is often referred to as a proof of this theory. But that all this was fulfilled, in that age, in that generation, is too manifest to need argumentation.

With much seeming assurance, a notable passage in the 5th chapter of John is relied upon as proof of a future and endless condemnation, to wit, 'Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice; and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation.' But by examining the context, it will be seen that Jesus was discoursing of a moral or spiritual resurrection—a resurrection which has no allusion to a future state. No one hesitates to admit that the 'passing from death unto life,' spoken in the 24th verse, is figurative—a moral resurrection. It is also admitted that the dead, spoken of in verse 25th, are the dead in trespasses in sins, and not the literal dead. And as we have no reason to suppose that he changed the subject from a figurative to a literal resurrection—from time to eternity—we must conclude that he meant the same, i. e. the morally dead, by those that were in the graves. The term graves may be used in a figurative sense with as much propriety as the term death. That it was used by Ezekiel, (ch. 37,) to represent the dark, degraded, and depressed state of the Jews while in captivity, no one disputes. That it was used by the Saviour in the same sense, to represent the then state of darkness, ignorance and stupidity, in which the whole house of Israel was involved, and that by the term resurrection he meant the waking-up of that people at his second coming, which was then near at hand, and which took place within forty years after the crucifixion, when a terrible judgment was executed upon them; from the calamities of which those only escaped who had done good by embracing the Gospel after having heard it—I say all this is so evident that some learned Orthodox commentators have so explained it. And there are many arguments against the application of this text to a future state, besides those drawn from the connection in which it is found. One or two of which we will notice, and that must suffice, as we have not time to do more. In the first place, then, let it be remarked, that it is one strong objection against the common application of this passage, that it proves too much. For it will be admitted that all men, in the course of their life, have done some evil. Now, if all who have done evil are to be waked up from the literal grave to a resurrection of damnation, and that to be eternal, there is no hope for any; a result not very comforting truly—a result from which the strongest advocates for a judgment and condemnation in eternity, shrink with horror: but a result inevitable from their premises. Their hope of escape through faith can avail them nothing in this judgment which is strictly according to works. Again, I suppose it may be admitted that all men, in the course of their life, have done some good. The common application of this text, then, will secure to all the resurrection of life, and introduce all into heaven. A result comforting enough indeed to us poor sinners; but equally horrible to those good people who fancy that heaven will be no heaven for them if all are there. Furthermore, the common application of this text makes heaven the reward of good works performed here; but the Scriptures teach that it is 'not of works.' One more argument and we leave this text. By contending that in this passage Jesus was speaking of a resurrection into an immortal state, he is made to contradict himself. In his reply to the caviling Sadducees, he says, 'in the resurrection all live unto God'—that all who obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, 'are as the angels of God in heaven.' Here he is unquestionably speaking of the resurrection of the literal dead: and here there is no intimation of any coming forth to condemnation. Paul's account of the resurrection agrees perfectly with what the Saviour said to the Sadducees; but it does not agree with the common application of the passage under consideration. By him we are assured that 'as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.' He tells us that 'all are to be made alive in Christ.' Now as this life in Christ is spiritual, immortal and glorious, it entirely excludes the idea of such a distinction and difference in the immortal state as the resurrection spoken of in John, if applied to the immortal state would represent. Our conclusion then, in regard to this notable passage so often quoted for the consolation of those who mourn the death of friends, is that while it assures us that in the dispensation of God, men have been, are now, and ever shall be, while time lasts, rewarded according to their works, it by no means intrudes upon our hope, that ultimately all men will participate in that eternal inheritance given us in Christ Jesus before the world began.

We now come to notice what may be called a standing text for funeral discourses. 'It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment.' Here it is said the question is settled; the day of judgment in which men are tried and awarded according to their works, is after death—God permits men to go through their whole life without chastisement for their sins; but after death, he will call them to a strict account, and then, when there is no possibility of punishment doing any good, it is to be inflicted endlessly. Such is the doctrine drawn from this text, considered so suitable to comfort those who are bereft of friends by the hand of death. I admit, that if the death here referred to were literal, it would settle the question, whether there be a judgment in the world to come; but it would not settle the question whether in that judgment any are condemned, or all justified. But clearly it is not literal death that is meant in this text. Neither is it moral death; but the death here mentioned is what is called sacrificial death. By reading the whole sentence 'And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation.' It will be seen at once that a comparison is made connected by the conjunctions, as, and so. And by noticing the subject on which the apostle is writing it will be seen, that the comparison contrasts Christ the High priest of the Gospel, with the men who were High priests under the law. That it contrasts the figurative sacrificial death of the legal High priest, with the real sacrificial death of Christ, proving the latter better than the former—the new dispensation superior to the old: and that it contrasts the judgment of the children of Israel, which the legal High priest bore for the justification of the people, with that better judgment of the Gospel, for the free justification of all men, 'through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.' I regret that for the want of time, I can not now go into a full exposition of this passage, which, by being forced from its connection, and perverted to sustain a horrible theory, has so frequently 'made sad the hearts of the people whom God hath not made sad,' and so frequently deprived the hearts of those whom the providence of God has made sad, of all that consolation which the Gospel is calculated to impart. But I can not well close these remarks without a brief notice of one more sentiment which is usually rendered quite prominent in the discourses of those whose business it should be, in imitation of their Master, 'to comfort all that mourn.' As if determined not only to exclude the great mass of our race from all that is good and holy and happy in another world; but to prevent also even the best of men from entertaining much hope of future blessedness; they tell us 'there is no change after death—'As the tree falls so it lies: as death leaves us, so judgment finds us.'

Not finding any text for this purpose written, after life and immortality were brought to light, one of the many remarkable sayings of Solomon is selected, as just the very thing: viz. 'There is no work nor device nor knowledge nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest.' And this same wise man also said, 'The dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward.' There are men at the present day, and their number is not few, who have no faith in a hereafter life, who look upon death as the cessation of all conscious existence; 'when a man is dead, he is dead,' they say: 'he can neither act nor think; he can do nothing; he knows nothing; he enjoys nothing; he suffers nothing; he is nothing but a lump of inert corruptible matter, which is soon resolved into its original elements.' And these men are called infidels. They do not believe in any change after death, save the natural decay and dissolution of the carcass. They do not believe in any transformation from mortality to immortality. But they believe, as they say Solomon believed, that death is the final end of man. Whether Solomon had any faith in a conscious existence beyond the grave or not, I do not undertake to say. If he had, he had it to himself, it is not very discernable in his writings. And it is not so very strange that unbelievers in a future existence call themselves the disciples of Solomon, and quote his words to sustain their dark and dismal theory. But it is strange, passing strange, that a Christian minister should select these very words as his motto, and give to them the very same construction when discoursing upon the realities of man's condition after death. For if he does not give them the same construction as does the unbelievers, they are no evidence of his favorite position of no change after death. What! no change after death? No transformation, no progression in knowledge and glory, no improvement in any way, in any thing, after the soul quits its mortal tenement? Would not this doctrine imply rather more than its advocates are prepared to embrace? Do they not expect to be divested in the world to come of the frailties, the imperfections, the evil dispositions, the lurking inclinations to sin, under which they groan, and with which they are burdened while they sojourn in the flesh? Yea, we know, they expect it. But vain is there expectation, if there be no change after death. It is good logic, I believe, that an argument which proves more, or a sentiment which embraces more than its advocates will admit to be true, proves nothing in their favor.

Now I must say that of all the strange and dark surmisings in regard to the future state, this is the strangest and the darkest ever engendered in the mind of one who gives credit to revelation. Why! it would render that state inferior to the present.—For here most certainly there is such a thing as human progress; and here are the means, and the motive, and the opportunity, for advancement in knowledge and goodness. Yet, though they be improved to the uttermost, a mere approximation to perfection only is attained. The longest life, though its capacities and opportunities be the most assiduously employed, brings man only to the threshold of knowledge—only to the porch of the temple of truth, wisdom and virtue and love and goodness and glory. If then all this intellectual advancement shall cease when this mortal tabernacle is dissolved—if all this moral progression shall terminate when the impervious veil which holds from our view the spirit world shall fall, then, I ask, is not the future inferior to the present state? The scanty attainments of three score years and ten, or in most cases of not half that period, are all that the immortal and ever-aspiring mind shall know, possess or enjoy if even these are not obliterated. And even these are obliterated and lost forever, if the words of Solomon are true, in the sense in which they are taken, by those who use them to prove that there is no change after death. Are such words comforting? Is such a view of man's future prospect fraught with consolation? Who does it reconcile to God and his dispensations?—Who are comforted by such words? I know what is urged in justification of suspending these horrors over the future. It is, that those who were deemed unworthy may not derive comfort from its contemplation. Doubt and darkness, gloom and uncertainty, are thrown around the celestial mansions, least some might hope to arrive there without a passport from orthodox authority. In short, the apology is, they have no commission to speak words of comfort to the wicked.

But let us see whether the doctrines we have been examining do in reality impart any consolation even to the righteous. And as we must be brief, we will come directly to the point. Here, then, are pious parents called to mourn the death of a child towards which they have felt all the tender emotions of parental affection and love. But the child, the son or the daughter, had lived a few years of accountability, and died—died without faith and hope in Christ Jesus. These parents are strictly orthodox in faith, good Christians in life and conduct, and now in their deep affliction they come around the altar of God's house—they look to the minister of God's word—some ground of hope that it is well with the departed spirit of their child is what they look for, is what they must have. The joy-dispelling—the hope-forbidding features of their creed are intruding continually upon their solemn meditations, perpetually haunting their imaginations with fearful forebodings. They can not, they dare not look that creed full in the face, in connection with the circumstances in which they are now placed. They will not listen to the decision of that creed. Ah no! for it would seal the endless damnation of their child. Ah no! sooner than relinquish all hope for their child they will repudiate that creed, even at the hazard of their hope for themselves. These parents, determined to hope against hope, against the creed of their church, I say, look in their extremity, to their minister for consolation, for encouragement to hope, without which they feel that their hearts must break. Ah! how unenviable the position of such a minister! He would doubtless, gladly comfort these afflicted ones, they are worthy, they are, even in his estimation entitled to the consolations of the Gospel. But need I say he can not comfort them, without compromising his sentiments? He may remind them of the grounds of hope which they have for their own salvation. Alas! this but augments their pain. Imagination points the contrast—themselves in heaven, their child in hell! He may well tell them that their child has gone to a God who will do no injustice, but this is indeed cold comfort in connection with the creed that teaches that it would be no injustice in God to burn every soul of Adam's race in an endless hell. He may tell them that though this child may be in hell, they do not know that it is so, and that when they do come to a knowledge of it in the light of eternity, they will be divested of all sympathy and love and affection, so that they shall exult and praise God that their child is to be tormented without end! But if this could possible be a comforting reflection to any, (which to me appears most incredible) no one can fail to see that one item of the creed is abandoned for the sake of it. If there is no change after death, the pain of heart, the mental agony, which parents here endure from the mere apprehension of the possible damnation of their children, must be endured throughout eternity, with such augmentation as reality shall give to it.

But I need not dwell here; I can not think it necessary to occupy more time in showing that the doctrines under consideration do not, and can not comfort even the most pious souls. Such words as are requisite to express the popular creeds of the day, could not have been the words which Paul delivered to the Thessalonians to comfort one another with. For it is not to be supposed but that many of the dead for whom they mourned, would by these creeds, be consigned to endless perdition. Yet he would not have them sorrow on account of the dead. Evidence sufficient that these creeds are not in accordance with Paul's creed. And there is the case of Amnon, son of David, whose doom would inevitably be endless misery according to modern theology; but it is recorded in Holy Writ, that 'David was comforted concerning Amnon, seeing that he was dead.' Evidence conclusive that David's views concerning the dead were not in accordance with modern theology. Alas! how seldom do any die in regard to whose happiness in the world to come there would not be room to doubt, if the common doctrine were true! Nay, it may be doubted whether any live and die so perfect as to be sure of justification at such a tribunal as is contended for, 'when every hidden thing shall be brought to light.' Some are better, and consequently happier in this life than others; but none, even the most virtuous, have any claim on heaven on account of their good works. And none who will not need to be changed, essentially changed, to prepare them for its enjoyment. And to the resurrection which imparts life in Christ to all who die in Adam, we look for such a change. Amen.

FREE AGENCY.

Br. A. Scott says, in the fourth No. current vol. of the Magazine and Advocate that, 'man is free to do as he wills, but that, he can not avoid willing as he does.' Now I ask for information on this subject.

1st. How can man be morally accountable to his Creator, or any other being? Is he to blame for willing as he does, when he 'can not avoid it?' It appears to me that this brother's theology on this subject, is a renunciation of moral accountability, the very foundation on which all religions are built. I hold that man is accountable to the extent of his intellectual capacity, his means of information, and his ability to perform. But if he is under the control of circumstances, the force of which compels him to will just as he does always, and then he is 'free to do as he wills,' why do we blame him for doing as he does? Why enact laws to govern him? I should say he was already governed, and that to by a fatal necessity, that would exculpate him from all crimes; and that is not all, nor the worst! it would seem to absolve him from all virtue also, or it identifies vice and virtue, makes them one, and so ushers in the atheistic millennium, with all its ridiculous pomp and its more than contemptible absurdity.

Though I have professed to be a Universalist for some three years, I am aware that I may be quite ignorant yet of some of the essential doctrines of of Universalism; and I write this to elicit some light on the subject of moral agency. I have always believed that man is capable of reasoning on moral subjects, and of judging what is right, and what is wrong; and that 'he that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin.' 'That he that knoweth his master's will and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes.' But as the principle which I combat, the case of accountability would not be changed, nor altered at all, if man were wholly deprived of his intellectual nature. J. B.

PROFESSOR BUSH.

Br. SKINNER—A letter that I received last summer from a highly esteemed friend and correspondent, in Western New York, contained the following language in reference to 'Bush on the Resurrection,' a work that was at that time attracting a good deal of attention in the religious world. I would respectfully solicit for it a place in your columns. J. M. DAY.

'I have just read your request to Br. Skinner in the Advocate,' concerning Prof. Bush's work. I have just read his book, and think less of it than I hoped I should. He has lamed himself so much, in his denial of the resurrection of the body of Christ, and in defence of that denial, that one fancies he limps every where else. That chapter will ruin his work in the estimation of the world. I was astonished at his effort on that subject; because to prove what he attempts, would be proving that the disciples of Christ were deceived and imposed upon, at the very point where it seems the least possible for them to be deceived. I think if he had humbled himself a little, and taken some counsel of the 'illiterate Universalist,' on that subject, and suppressed that chapter, he would have stood fairer before the world. You have hinted at the true view of that subject, in my judgment.'

Since the articles were in type which appeared in this paper of last week, on the subject of the Circular and Protest, we have received several other articles of the same character on the same subject from H. P., D. B. W. and others. But as they take the same ground and use nearly the same arguments that Brs. Parker and Elwood do, it is unnecessary to publish their articles, and we presume they would not have sent them had they seen theirs first.

A NEW OFFER—PREMIUMS.

Any person hereafter sending us five dollars (postage paid) shall receive five copies current volume of the Magazine (from the commencement of the volume) if sent to one address, and the second volume of the Christian Visitant, published some years since by Br. A. B. Grosh.—This volume contains 144 pages of reading matter. It has an article on the Atonement by Br. S. R. Smith, examination and refutation of the tract entitled 'A strange thing,' by E. D. Wight of West Bloomfield, N. Y., with an appendix, by Br. Grosh, The parable of the 'Rich man and Lazarus,' by Br. W. Fuller, 'Harmony of God's attributes,' by Br. Grosh, 'Punishment and forgiveness,' by Br. Sylvanus Cobb, now of Boston, Mass., 'Kingdom of Heaven,' by T. Fisk, 'Confidence in God,' by Br. Lucius R. Page, 'Brief scriptural explanations,' by Br. Grosh, 'To the Candid,' by S. R. Smith, 'To the teachers in Israel,' by Br. Grosh, 'The last judgment,' 'Demoniacs of the New Testament,' and a compendium of an extemporaneous sermon by S. R. Smith. This volume can be sent by mail at trifling postage.

Any one sending seven dollars, shall receive 7 copies of the Magazine, one year to one address, a copy of the Visitant and the Almanac and Register for 1846. For ten dollars eleven copies of the Magazine will be sent to one address, and last year's (1845) volume (unbound) of the Magazine. For fifteen dollars, sixteen copies will be sent to one address, one year, a volume for last year, and a copy each of the Visitant and Register. Who will avail themselves of this offer? PUB.

THOUGHTS IN A THUNDER-STORM.

Sweep on, loud winds, and dash, thou rapid rain;
Sound forth, thou thunderpeal, and flash, thou lightning chain!

Ye have no terrors for the wo-wrought breast—
Your sympathy may soothe its deep unrest.

Nor can ye move with fear the placid mind,
That is to destiny and Heaven resigned,
Ye only show it nature's changing face,
And render more sublime her charming grace.

What though ye veil the welkin's azure arch,
And like the din of warriors in their march,
Your martial numbers sound from pole to pole?
Their echoes purge the air wherein they roll.

What though the earth, when wildest tempests beat,
Reveal the tread of hostile legions' feet?
Her genial breezes soon efface the track,
And bring increased perfume and freshness back.

Pérchance the power ye elements display,
Pictures the conflict of that triumph day,
When death demands the dust that nature gave,
And, struggling with his trophy, seeks the grave.

Hail! glorious, eastern bow, raising thy crest,
Before the broken clouds have quit the west:
And precious sunbeams, gilding earth anew,
Thick strown with glitt'ring pearls, all hail to you!

Ye tell of promised joys and smiles divine,
That on the ransomed soul shall sweetly shine,
When life's last storm subsides, and sleeps its clay,
And soars the spirit from the world away.

Yes, welcome Tempest, though thy headlong force
May shake the solid mountain in its course;
Though frightfully the lightning leaps on high,
And booming thunders thrill the sable sky:

Only let Phœbus follow in thy train,
Chasing with golden gleams the lingering rain—
Lifting in beauty all that's bowed below,
And painting bright above, his matchless bow.

And welcome, Life, with all thy tumults crowned—
With wars, feuds, famines, plagues, and perils bound;
With all thy pangs and passions, doubts and fears—
Thy sighs and sorrows, blights and bitter tears:

Only let knowledge lead us in thy laws,
And reason in her progress never pause;
And oh, let faith conduct us to the tomb,
And hope point upward to the life to come.

An 'Appeal to the Voters of the State of New York relative to the Licence Question.'

This is a pamphlet of 8 pages (double columns) containing extracts from the proceedings of Temperance Conventions held in Albany and Rochester on the subject of the Licence Law, and a most spirited Appeal to the citizens of the State generally, and to several classes in particular, viz. 1. To the Venders of Intoxicating Liquors. 2. To Tax-payers of the State. 3. To philanthropists and friends of humanity, and 4. To Christians and Christian ministers. There is occasionally a sentiment put forth that smacks a little too strong of modern Orthodoxy (so called) to which we can not subscribe; but in the main it is good and stirring. The pamphlet, bating the above exception, should be generally read and widely circulated. It is stereotyped, and will be furnished by O. Scoville, Esq., Secretary of the Exec. Committee, at Albany, to every county in the State, at $10 per 1000 copies. It is designed to be placed in the hands of every family throughout the State.

We have room only for an extract from the Appeal; and as men generally in these days feel quite as much for their pockets as they do for any other interest, we select that part addressed to Tax Payers: D. S.

TAX PAYERS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Let not the overshadowing moral and physical evils of the licence system, divert your attention from its unjust pecuniary burdens. All your property, real and personal, the fortune of your inheritance, or the fruits of your toil, it covers with a mortgage having priority of any lien you have the power to create—a mortgage, the interest of which you are compelled to pay annually at the call of the tax gatherer, and the principal of which must be abated from the purchase money of your property, if sold. An inequitable mortgage, from which the Chancellor has no power to relieve you, and against which you have no redress but a ballot inscribed 'No License'; for it secures a fund for the public expense, occasioned by the victims of the license law, and their beggaried families. Freeholders, men of wealth, you who have hitherto erroneously supposed that your property was your own, we beg your serious attention to the facts which show how deeply it is encumbered by that liquor trade, which we ask your aid to suppress. Mr. Chipman, to whose invaluable report we have already alluded, visited several years since, all the counties of this state, for the purpose of taking the exact guage and dimensions of poverty, and crime, in our almshouses and prisons. He brought to this task as sound a head, as faithful a heart, and zeal as indefatigable, as were ever enlisted in the cause of humanity; and his researches were aided, and their results certified, by well known public officers in each county, and their accuracy in no single case ever disputed. The proportions of those committed in that year to the jails in this state for crime, were of those

* Look at the following certificates, furnished to Mr. Chipman, the first by Justice Cole, who has often been continued in, and recently appointed to, office by his political opponents,—and the other by a gentleman of equally reliable character, as a specimen of the doings of alcohol at the capital of the State:

'Mr. Chipman: Agreeable to your request, I took particular notice of every case that came before me at the police office in this city during one week; and I now certify that of the FIFTY complaints of a criminal character which were made during the first week in January last, FORTY-EIGHT clearly originated in INTemperance. One of the other two cases partook more of the character of carelessness than of criminal design. The other was the case of a child whose parents are habitual hard drinkers, but are not what are usually called drunkards.

'And the above I have no doubt would be a fair average of all the cases that came before me during the year, that is, NINETY-SIX in a HUNDRED originated in, or were directly caused by intemperance.

'More than TWENTY-FIVE HUNDRED cases come under my cognizance in a year.

J. O. COLE, Police Justice.'

The 17 were from remote towns of the county. Of the whole number 196 were females, and at least three-fourths of them were intemperate, and full one half grossly so. There are a few very respectable and interesting women here, but they were reduced to poverty by the intemperance of their husbands. There were 297 persons in the house on the 1st of January, 1833, so that the whole number assisted in the year is 930.

GEO. W. WELCH, Superintendent.'

Look now at the reverse of this sombre picture, in the following slip from a Massachusetts paper:

From the above data, and others furnished by Mr. Chipman's report, it may be shown, if not with mathematical certainty, at least with so much as would govern us in the most important affairs of life, that of the above amount of annual county taxes, at least half a million of dollars is the consequence of, and might be saved by the suppression of the retailing of intoxicating drinks. And this is only the annual interest of that mortgage of which we have spoken, giving, estimated at 7 per cent, a principal of more than seven millions of dollars, which is a first lien upon all your goods, lands and tenements, for the benefit of rum-sellers, and to the intolerable injury of every one else. And yet to this vexatious annual plundering, this continual taxation, beyond comparison more unjust and oppressive than the British stamp act and tea duty, you pusillanimously fold your arms in submission! Sons of Revolutionary sires! where has fled the spirit of Boston Harbor, and Lexington, and Bunker Hill! Where had now been the cause of freedom, if our fathers had been imbued with that spirit of meek submission to wrong which seems to have overtaken their sons?

'Three years ago there were 469 inmates in the poor-house in Worcester. Last year the inmates were reduced to eleven. In consideration of this great reduction in their pauper tax, the town voted $500 to be paid annually to the Temperance society, together with the use of a large hall, and oil and fuel to light and warm it.'

A CATHOLIC HELL.

Mr. H. C. Wright, a clergyman of some note, is travelling in various parts of the Old Country, and writes notes by the way, which are published in several papers in New England. Under date of July 28th he thus speaks of what we should call a Catholic hell.

'We have just left the town of Manheim. Some of our passengers left us there to go to Baden—now the chief town of the kingdom or country of the same name—and having 45,000 permanent inhabitants. A noted place of resort all over Germany, France, Italy and Great Britain. It is said about 20,000 persons visit it annually. The Hot Springs are the object of attraction. It is a watering place, like Lermington in England, or Saratoga in New York. The castle of the Duke Baden, built about the close of the 17th century, has dungeons beneath it that could tell fearful stories. 'According to tradition, (says one in describing them) prisoners, bound fast in an arm chair, and blindfolded, were let down by a windlass into these vaults, excavated out of the rock on which the castle stands. The dungeons were closed by slabs of stone, some of which weigh 2000 pounds. One chamber is called the Rack Chamber, where stood the instruments of torture, some of which yet remain. There is a deep well, or pit, covered with a trap door. The prisoner, whose doom was sealed, was led to this spot in a narrow passage way, and required to kiss the image of the Virgin on the other side of the door; but as soon as his foot rested on the trap door, it gave way, and he was precipitated down the pit upon a machine at the bottom covered with lancets, by which he was cut to pieces. The punishment was called the 'VIRGIN'S KISS.' When the secrets of this pit were disclosed, many human bones were found.' Scott, in his 'Anne of Geierstein,' has given us a fearful picture of the Judgment Hall and secrets of this old castle.'

That practices of the kind have prevailed in Catholic countries, admits of no more doubt than that such a people have had an existence; and Protestant believers in a vindictive God have been guilty of practices almost as horrible. The partialist religion is the same the world over, and when left to have its legitimate influence, without any counteracting tendencies, it makes people cruel and vindictive.—[Star in the West.

FALSE STATEMENTS OF AN ALMANAC.

The statistics of the different religious denominations in the United States, as recorded in the Protestant Almanac for 1846, frequently find their way into the papers of the day. We have noticed them in several secular prints and they are now before us in the Protestant Unionist, published at Pittsburg, Pa.

The name of the man who compiled the statistics is not known to us, as we have not seen the Almanac itself in which they appear; but whoever he is, he is either profoundly ignorant, or given to writing falsehoods. In either case he is unfit for the task which he undertook, and ought to be exposed. He states that the Universalists have about 600 churches (societies)-520 ministers, and 60,000 members!! Had he consulted our Register and Almanac, which he could easily have done, he would have seen a very different statement. That says, and correctly, that we have 1072 societies (or churches) and 664 preachers; and we estimate that the attendants upon our churches, including believers scattered abroad, who have occasional preaching, do not number much less than a million. I could name two States which contain nearly double the number of Universalists set down in this Almanac. It is presumed that the author of it is a bitter partialist, hence this incorrect information.

The disciples (Campbellites) I notice are set down as having three hundred thousand members. I have received their principal paper for several years, and therefore know that their standard writers only claimed, a few months ago, two hundred thousand, and at that time they supposed they had fifty thousand in Kentucky. Since then they have ascertained by actual count, that they have only about thirty three thousand in the whole State; and it is my candid opinion that more than one third of all their members are in Kentucky. They have not to exceed, I presume, half a dozen congregations in all New England, a region of country where there are tens of thousands of Universalists. In the small State of Massachusetts we have 134 preachers actively engaged, and 145 societies, the most of them large. In Boston there are eight societies, and Br. O. A. Skinner's congregation is the largest Protestant assembly in the city, according to the statement of a Presbyterian gentleman, published in a Presbyterian paper about a year ago. The fact he ascertained by counting the attendants of the different churches as they passed into or out of them.—[Star in the West.

ASSOCIATION.

That different members of the human family are endowed with faculties possessing different degrees of strength, is a truth which will not be doubted by any one given to serious thought and reflection. Some also, being in possession of temperaments more active than many others, are enabled to go forward more rapidly in a course of moral and intellectual improvement, leaving those with whom they set out in life far behind. But this difference in original endowment, does not act upon mankind with more power in a moral sense, than does the influence arising from association. The children of men are social beings; were so created by the Supreme Ruler of the universe; propensities, sentiments, and faculties were bestowed upon them, prompting them to seek out and mingle with their fellow beings and reap as a consequence all of the treasures, and receive all the enjoyment arising from the judicious action of their social powers. Attendant upon that association, is an influence which operates with great strength upon the mind. If all are influenced by motives moral and virtuous, the impressions made upon the individual mind are such as to awaken feelings, moral and virtuous, and reward the actor with the pure pleasure of peace, happiness, and joy. But on the other hand, if associates are governed by the passions alone; their moral powers rendered somewhat dull and obtuse, then the influence of companionship is of the most deleterious and destructive kind, bringing around one, the blight and mildew of iniquity and the consequent miseries ever following swift in the footsteps of vice.

In view of the foregoing truth, how responsible the station occupied by the parent; and in fact, how fearful the responsibility resting upon every instructor of the youth. Training minds for weal, or for woe!—for the accomplishment of high, noble, and honorable action, or for deeds of the deepest, blackest villany!—for stations of the most exalted human fame, or to sink deep in disgrace and pollution! Such being the office of the parent and instructor; every word, every act, every look, should be of a nature to leave a virtuous impression upon the mind of those instructed. The utmost care should be exercised; the watch should be diligent and untiring; no deed vicious in its nature and tendency should go unreviewed, and no virtuous act suffered to pass without the expressed approbation of the parent or instructor. And yet, how sadly is this duty neglected, by parents and others, who have taken upon themselves the high, the responsible, and the important office of instructing the rising generation!

There are many parents who have but little, if any care; but small, if any anxiety, respecting the reputations to be established by their offspring. At least this seems to be the truth, if it is not so in reality. It may not unfrequently be the result of heedlessness, that parents neglect to bestow the proper attention upon the subject of youthful instruction, not being fully aware of the many temptations ever surrounding the minds of the young; but if it is the result of such a careless habit, it should forthwith be corrected, for that habit is productive of some of the most direful results. How many a young man has gone the downward road to perdition, who at last as he cast his eye back upon his pathway, with a mind sorrowful and grief-stricken has beheld the truth in all of its sad and mournful reality, that the inattention of his parents to the proper cultivation of his moral powers, was the great first cause of his fall; the great first cause of all his woes, and of the ignominy at last attached to his name. Neglecting to give him the requisite moral instruction; neglecting to teach him the duty which he owed to himself, to others, and to God; upon the Sabbath, instead of directing him to the sanctuary of public worship where he might be benefited by the truths there proclaimed, permitting him to go forth and mingle with those whose characters were anything but virtuous; to spend his leisure hours and his evenings in such society, surrounded by such worthless companions, until his moral susceptibilities became callous to a certain degree; led on by such influence until at last he awoke to the dreadful reality!—his reputation destroyed!—his name synonymous with infamy and disgrace! Oh! how sadly have many parents neglected their duty in this respect;—their bounden duty to their offspring; suffered them to go onward, and onward still in the pathway of sin, until at last destruction came down upon them in its might, overwhelming those who with proper care might have been saved from ruin and despair. And a voice from these sorrowing hearts bound with distress, shall ascend to heaven and bring down a terrible reward upon those who have lived heedless of the ways of their offspring!

Young man; during the present hour, while calmness and sobriety are around your mind, and passion is silent and unmoved; we have a word to say to you. You are now preparing to enter upon the scenes of active manhood. The hour will soon be at hand when you must go forth; and now ever bear this thought in mind, that your future course, your reputation, all that you may have near and dear, depends upon the associations which you may form; upon the selection of companions. If you make choice of those whose sentiments are just and moral; whose dispositions are virtuous, your future pathway will be in that direction where peace and pleasure ever attend the traveller. On the other hand, if you go to places where young men revel in sensual pleasures; where the sneer, the jeer, the scoff, and even the curse, are thrown upon the precepts and ways of rectitude; contamination will be upon you and your barque of life will go down amid the dark and stagnant waters of iniquity and distress.—We have seen a young man stand upon the gallows-fall, with the shroud upon his person and the fatal cord around his neck, and there listened to his tale of sorrow, and what was it? That his destruction, so horrible in its nature, was only the consequence of associating with those who were regardless of the principles of virtue and integrity! Here you have the truth, and do not let it pass unheeded. Walk circumspectly, and the day of prosperity and enjoyment shall be your reward. S. J. G.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

The following article concerning the discussion between Br. P. Morse and Rev. Mr. Hapgood, was received after the sermon was in type for this number, and in order to make room for it this week we are obliged to give it the place which had been designed for some editorial matter. We thank Br. K. for furnishing the account; and give it place the earliest opportunity. Ed.

THE DISCUSSION AT MEXICO.

This discussion, according to previous engagement and notice, commenced on the morning of the 12th inst., and closed in the afternoon of the 17th, between the Rev. Geo. G. Hapgood (Methodist) and Br. P. Morse. There seemed to be an increasing interest from beginning to end, and certain, there was an increase of numbers in attendance, so that on the last day the house was very much crowded. Mr. Hapgood had pledged himself to 'prove Universalism false from the word of God.' Let the reader remember by what he was pledged to prove Universalism false, namely, the word of God, while we proceed to notice some things that occurred and some positions assumed.

Soon after the commencement of Mr. H.'s first speech on the morning of the first day, he stated that 'if he should succeed in proving the main principle of Universalism false, he should assume that he had proved the doctrine false, even though all mankind should be saved.'—This was rather a novel position, and Br. Morse urged very forcibly upon his mind the fact, that the salvation of all men was the great distinguishing feature of Universalism. Mr. H. next proceeds to give his definition of Universalism, and Br. Morse gave that which Universalists usually give, but Mr. H. found it more convenient to battle the system after his own defining, than to take it as it is believed. The reader, in this particular, perhaps will think Mr. H. a very sensible man. He next proceeds to lay down several propositions which we will name in order.

Proposition 1st. Universalism is so far false as it may deny that God is wholly good. To this proposition Br. Morse replied, that any and every system must be false which denied the goodness of God. And not only this, but he very clearly affirmed wherein the salvation of a world demonstrated the goodness of an Eternal God.

2nd. Prop. Universalism is so far false as it may deny that man was created wholly good and sinless. To this it could only be said that God pronounced all his work good, man being a part of that work, he was good, and consequently answered the purpose for which he was created.

3d. Prop. Universalism is so far false as it may deny that man is a moral agent. Br. Morse of course would admit the agency of man. But it should be recollected that when Mr. Hapgood attempted to prove that some men would be endless sufferers by the use of that agency, there was room for argument which no understanding Universalist would fail to occupy. Br. Morse left not this opportunity unimproved. Mr. Hapgood laid great stress upon the depravity of man—his stubbornness and freedom with which he used his agency,—even so free that he would not be saved, and hence God could not save him. Here Br. Morse replied, that if men by the exercise of their free agency could prevent God from saving them in this world, hence God could not save them, they could, by the use of the same agency, prevent God from damning them in eternity, unless God should deprive them of their agency, and convert them into mere machine. And the idea of being a machine is horrible enough to a Methodist.

4th. Prop. Universalism is false in so far as it may deny that by the Adamic transgression death temporal and moral was introduced into the world. While upon this proposition, Mr. Hapgood thought, we suppose, that he had adduced incontrovertible proof of the endless suffering of a part of the human family, thereby proving Universalism false, by the broad and unqualified declaration that death in its very nature is endless. Br. Morse contended that temporal death was not a result of Adam's transgression, and went on to show that men would have died if Adam had not sinned. And as to death being endless from its very nature, as Mr. Hapgood contended, Br. Morse simply said, that if death was endless from its very nature, then we be to us all, for annihilation is our doom. When Mr. Hapgood arose to speak for once or twice, after declaring that death was endless from its very nature, he attempted to sustain himself by a show of reason in the case. But Br. Morse crowded him close upon this point, and told him that if death was endless from its very nature, as he was a subject of that death, he would forever and eternally remain in its power and dominion. It was nonsense to talk about a thing coming to an end which in its nature was endless, and when he would release himself from the power of an endless death, the rest of us would come out by the same way.

On the morning of the second day of the debate, Mr. Hapgood, probably, not feeling exactly satisfied with his endless death, said he did not mean to assert that death was endless per se. Br. Morse remarked in his turn that death endless per se, was nothing but death endless in itself, leaving the congregation to judge whether there was any essential difference between death being endless in its nature or endless in itself.

5th. Prop. Universalism is so far false as it may affirm that men are saved by the moral law. While upon this proposition Mr. H. labored long and hard to show that Universalists believed in salvation by punishment. And he came forward with the pompous declaration that he would show from the gentleman's own writings (meaning Br. Morse) that he believed in salvation by punishment. Br. Morse called for the proof, declaring, at the same time, that there was not a Universalist on the footstool of God, that believed in salvation by punishment. Mr. Hapgood read from Luther Lee's work a quotation which Lee had made from Br. Morse's letters to Parker, and attempted to show that such was the plain inference from the quotation. Br. Morse then read from his letters to Parker the same paragraph from which Lee had quoted; which denied the charge, and declared salvation to be by grace. Then Br. Morse called upon Mr. H. to retract his groundless charge. But Mr. H. persisted in his declaration. Br. Morse repeated the call several times the remaining four or five days of the debate. But Mr. H. pertinaciously adhered to the letter and spirit of his assertion, and retired from the debate with the groundless charge unretracted upon his head, thereby giving incontestible proof of the depravity of the human, [his] heart, for which he so stoutly contended.

6th. Prop. Universalism is so far false as it may maintain that the punishment of sin unrepented of may not be endless. Mr. H. did not see fit to show, when he laid down this proposition, that there were some sins that would not be repented of, but attempted to support it by what he called reason. And in connection with the 6th he laid down the 7th proposition—Universalism is so far false as it may deny the divinity of Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit. To this last proposition Br. Morse replied that it was foreign to the subject, as he had often stated before, to much that Mr. H. had said. But before the debate closed, he digressed from the main point in dispute, so far as to show the inconsistency of the trinity.

And although Br. Morse repeatedly called upon Mr. H. to bring forward his proof texts of the doctrine of endless misery, yet he offered none until Thursday in the afternoon. When he was called upon to adduce his proof texts, he said he wished to expose all of the errors of Universalism. He chose to occupy his time in asserting that Universalists believed this and denied that. Br. Morse corrected him when he charged Universalists with believing and denying what they do not. And Mr. H. complained because Br. Morse kept his sentiments in the dark, as he said. He wanted he should come out and let him know what he did believe—he wanted more light. Br. Morse told Mr. H., that as he had pledged himself to prove Universalism false, he should have known what it was, before he undertook to show its falsity. But Br. Morse responded, at length, to his call for light upon the subject of Universalism in some very eloquent and forcible arguments upon the salvation of all men, drawn from the attributes of God. After which Mr. H. did not call for any more light—it seemed to be satisfactory—it dawned upon him, and, perhaps, he thought he could no more endure it, than can the new-born babe bear the full blaze of noon-day. Mr. H. employed considerable time in reading from Josephus—from quotations said to be opinions of the early fathers—from Hill's sermon—from the notable Holme's 'House upon the sand' (if I mistake not) and from other pamphlets. He also made a quotation from Homer, showing what the opinion of the heathens was concerning Tartarus—even that they believed it to be as much deeper than Hades, as the earth is below the heavens. What possible bearing all this could have upon the point in dispute, could not be determined, unless Mr. H. brought it forward, thinking as the old lady thought of her tract—that it strengthened the Bible, and that the Bible alone was not sufficient to prove Universalism false. In his quotations from Hill's sermon, they were so made as to leave the impression, upon the congregation that some of our preachers believe in annihilation, and Br. Morse called upon him to retract that charge, but his stubbornness was again his ruling passion, and he showed no signs of repentance to the close of the discussion.

It appeared evident from the beginning to the close of the debate; that Mr. H. intended to rely more upon the prejudices of the people, their preconceived opinions, and the sneers and jeers cast at what he was pleased to call Universalism, the sound of the words hell, endless, forever, and everlasting, to sustain him, than upon a critical examination of his proof texts. It seemed as if he was conscious, that what should have been his strongest, was his weakest point, namely his proof texts. And the more so this appears, when we reflect that the most part of his proof of the sufferings of some men in eternity, was adduced in one half hour's speech. Most else was but a mere repetition of those texts. It will not be expected that I shall quote them here. They may be divided into three classes. The first class consisted of those texts in which the English word hell occurs, translated from Gehenna of Hebrew origin. Most, if not all the texts in the New Testament where this word occurs in the Greek, Mr. H. brought forward. But he could not deny but that the word literally meant the valley of Hinnom, because all critics agree in this. Then it was clear that if it had any signification beyond its literal, it must be figurative, so that Gehenna itself could not mean a place of endless punishment. And Mr. H. did not attempt to adduce any word, which designated a place of eternal torments, of which Gehenna was the figure or symbol. In Br. Morse's reply he told him, that Gehenna was a place near Jerusalem, and as well known to the Jews as Oswego is to the people of Mexico. He also remarked that the punishment of Gehenna was only preached to the Jews, and never to the Gentiles—that the word did not occur in St. John's Gospel, neither in the Acts of the apostles which contains a history of thirty years ministry—neither occurs but once in all the Epistles. After this reply, Mr. H. did not lay quite so much stress upon Gehenna, but resorted to the two following classes of texts for his strong hold.

The second class are those texts in which the Greek word aion and its adjective aiomios occur and are rendered in our common version, age, world, course, ever, forever, evermore, eternal, and everlasting. Upon this class Mr. H. dwelt for some time. But he agreed with Br. Morse, that they were equivocal in their meaning—that they are often applied to things that have passed away—and that extent of duration of time could not be determined by the words themselves, but by the scope of the passages where they were found, and the nature of the things to which they are applied. They agreed that when they were applied to God, they meant endless duration, because God's nature was such, and also when they were applied to the priesthood of Aaron and the hills, &c., they were limited, because the things to which they were applied were so. Then Br. Morse called upon him to show that punishment in its very nature, was endless—and told him, time and again, that all his texts where forever, everlasting, eternal and never occurred, and were applied to punishment, availed him nothing, unless he could prove that the nature of punishment was endless, because he had admitted that the words themselves did not mean endless, unless applied to something endless in itself. But Mr. H. never made the least attempt to show that punishment of itself must be endless. And to the call from Br. Morse he would only repeat his texts in which eternal, everlasting, &c. occur, with considerable emphasis. So that if Mr. H. proved endless punishment true, it was not from its own nature, on which alone as he tacitly admitted, its proof must rest, but from words equivocal in their meaning. Who would not think that a doctrine embracing such unspeakable consequences, should rest on some surer foundation? The third of this class consisted of texts in which sheol and hades occur, and are rendered in our Bible hell, grave and pit. It was admitted by both disputants that hades in Greek of the New Testament corresponded in meaning with the Hebrew sheol of the Old. It was admitted by both that hades signifies the state of the dead generally—the place of departed spirits. Then Mr. H. contended that Paradise was in hades and that the thief upon the cross went there—that the Saviour went there—that Abraham's bosom was in hades—that hell was in one part of it—that the good and the bad went there and were separated only by the impassable gulf—and that at last hades was to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone which is the second death, leaving the congregation to infer that heaven and hell which were included in hades—the good and the bad, were all cast into the lake of fire. Br. Morse showed him the predicament he had got into, and called upon Mr. H. for more light on this subject on Friday afternoon; but he suffered it to remain without farther explanation during the debate.

Thus much for Mr. H.'s proof texts of the doctrine of endless punishment. It can not be denied but that he labored hard in his own way to sustain his darling sentiment, endless misery. He came forward to the work with a spirit that would have done honor to a Nero, and in the most stoical manner 'dealt damnation round the land,' continually exhibiting a kind of exquisite pleasure both in the thought that some would be eternally punished, and at every seeming triumph he gained. He dealt largely in denominational abuse and misrepresentation—he frequently sneered and jeered at what he said was Universalism—often alluded to what he denominated its tendency, and in his last speech he had to tell the congregation that he had been refused in two instances in this place the privilege of praying with the sick in Universalist families. During all this time we suppose he intended that the congregation should understand that he was proving Universalism 'false by the word of God.'

Another thing of quite a novel character was developed in Mr. H.'s last speech. He assumed that he had proved Universalism false by some twenty four or five propositions, when only seven of them had been named to the congregation during the whole debate until his last time speaking.

He once said he believed that the endless punishment of a part of the human family would be for the good of the whole, but he had sagacity enough to discover that such a position needed no proof or reason whatever to sustain it. Before closing this article we would say that Br. Morse proved from the attributes of the eternal and unchanging God—from his unconditional promises—and from the resurrection of all mankind to immortality and incorruptibility, the salvation of all Adam's numerous race. There were some five or six of our preachers—a number of Methodist—some part of the time two Presbyterian and two Baptist clergymen in attendance, and we trust that some good has been done which some day will appear. This is rather an extended notice of the discussion, longer than I first intended, but I could see no stopping place until now, and I hope both the editor and reader will pardon me for this long infliction. INSTALLATION AT PROVIDENCE.—Br. J. M. Cook was installed Pastor of the Second society in Providence, R. I., on Thursday, 22d ult. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou, of Boston, assisted in the services by Br. H. Bacon, pastor of the First society, Brs. J. Boyden, of Woonsocket, S. Streeter and T. D. Cook, of Boston. The services were held in the house of the First society, generously tendered for the occasion. The Trumpet, from which we gather these particulars, says:—[Messenger.]

The services were interspersed with appropriate music, and were attended by a large congregation. It is peculiarly pleasing to see the symptoms of fraternal kindness evinced by the First society and their pastor towards the new enterprise. It is gratifying also to know, that the First society is enjoying a season of prosperity, under the labors of their truly Christian and excellent pastor.

A very interesting Conference Meeting was holden in the evening of the day of installation.

SISTER LAURA EGGLESTON.

The following letter from sister Gibson enclosing some poetic tributes of friendship passed between sisters Laura Eggleston and M. E. Tillotson, together with our remarks will explain themselves to our readers. En.

Bro. Skinner and Walker—To explain, why the accompanying lines appear in my hand. Some two months since, sister Laura Eggleston being in a much better state of health than was usual, set out on a visiting tour to some of her friends, but soon after arriving at the home of sister Mary Tillotson, with whom she purposed to spend a few days, she was taken severely ill—with bleeding at the lungs (a something different from any previous illness) and serious nervous affections, and has never since been able to return home, or even to leave her room. A week since I was down to visit her, when these exchange tributes were shown to me, and Laura expressed an earnest desire to have them published, but on account of their marked personality, Mary hesitated to send them;—she felt too, that L.'s article was too laudatory for her to solicit its publication, and on this account I proposed to copy and send them. She bade me say, if you thought best to suppress the full signature, and give but the initials, you were at liberty to do so. I have carefully copied them from their MSS., and submit them to your disposal.

Do you send Laura the present volume of the Magazine and Advocate? If so, she does not receive it. She thinks the P. M., whom she terms a bigot, is in the fault. If you feel it in your heart to continue it, and to forward, the back numbers, please enclose them in the wrapper directed to 'A. Tillotson, So. Oxford.' She is very low and weak, and is almost childishly affected by the non-appearance of her much loved paper—it advocates her hope, and this hope it is that buoy her up in this, we fear, her last illness.

She is too weak to pen her own high thoughts; but her friend Mary, has written a number of poetic articles, after repeating, and promises to send them to you ere long, together with a bundle of her own.

You will be sorry to hear of Laura's sickness, but you will rejoice to learn that she is with a family, whose every member have shown themselves worthy of the name of Universalists in their treatment of our unfortunate sister. She has every care and attention, and every token of nothing kindness and affection, which she could ask, or require.

Wednesday evening,—I have just heard from sister Laura: she is fast failing and probably can remain with us but a short time. It would be gratifying to her to know whether you had sent your paper or not, and perhaps no less so, to some others, who would know of the P. M.'s honesty. Yours sincerely,
Feb. 4th, '46. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—It was with mingled emotions of regret, surprise and indignation, that we perused the above letter from sister Gibson—regret at the protracted and increased afflictions and of sister Laura, surprise that she had not received this paper, which many months past has been regularly and faithfully mailed to her address at German P. O., and indignation at the cold and unfeeling bigotry and intolerance which we must believe has been practiced towards her by the P. M. at German. Is it possible, we inquire, that a man, claiming to be a man, a gentleman and a Christian, can so far forget the duties and obligations resting on either of these characters—to say nothing of the oath and duties of his office as P. M.—as to suppress and withhold our humble sheet from a poor, sick and afflicted daughter of Adam—a devoted Christian, a sincere believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, who deserves so much comfort in her afflictions by perusing its pages? Is it possible that, in the nineteenth century a Post Master in Chenango county in the State of New York, can be found, mean enough, bigoted enough, cold and cruel hearted enough, and unprincipled enough, to be guilty of such an act, such intolerance and such an outrage? It is almost too much to believe; and yet, how otherwise can it be? The paper has been regularly mailed; and if inquired and sent for, and refused to be delivered, where can the fault be but in the P. M. at German? How can he explain it otherwise? We do not believe he can—though we should rejoice if he could. We believe him guilty of wilfully suppressing the paper; and his neighbors and the world will believe him guilty till he can show otherwise. Let the matter be investigated; and if guilty let public indignation be visited upon him; innocent let him be exonerated. Other P. M.'s and their assistants on the route may be able to testify that the paper to her address has past their offices. The man that could be guilty of such an act, would not hesitate to rob the widow and the fatherless, and take bread out of the mouths of the hungry and the starving—nay more than that; he would rob the soul of its food, and snatch away the joy, the peace, the consolation and the hope of the mourning, the sick and the dying. If any other person has taken and destroyed the paper let him be exposed.

We thank sister Gibson for the information she sent us, as well as for the communications. They shall have a place soon in our columns, and we shall endeavor to have sister Laura receive them if living. D. S.

Some time ago we had a correspondent who usually wrote over the signature of 'Iota.' Said correspondent promised us some favors a long time ago, but we have not received an iota of MS. since. What is the cause?

Rev. Josiah M. Graves—An Inquiry.

There are brethren in Auburn who inquire, whether the Rev. J. M. Graves, said to have recently been converted from the Baptist to the Universalist ministry, was formerly pastor of the Baptist society in this place? If so, there are some explanations they would be glad to receive. They would also like to be informed whether the brother mentioned in the Messenger as having solicited an opportunity for said Graves to preach in New York, is named Joshua Graves? J. M. A.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

Come brethren, one and all, let us go up to the 'Town Hall' in Ithaca, rejoicing that there is one spot in that town, which has become proverbial as being the 'strong hold' of Partialism, and semi-infidelity, where the 'One only living and true God can be worshipped in the beauty of holiness,' and we will have such a 'feast of fat things' as will cause us to exclaim, 'It is good for us to be here.' D. H. STRICKLAND, Secretary.

DEATHS.

In Mexico, Nov. 12th, 1845, of inflammation on the bowels, Mr. CLARK GREEN, in the 52d year of his age. By this dispensation of Providence, a kind and affectionate husband, a much beloved father, has been snatched from the bosom of his family and consigned to the narrow house appointed for all living. His illness which terminated in death was of short duration, but he suffered extreme pain while it lasted. For many years he had been a firm believer in a world's salvation. It was his joyful theme. It made him cheerful in prosperity and adversity. It presented no forebodings for the future, consequently he was resigned in the hour of death. When questioned by his wife, if he was willing to die, he answered, that he was resigned to the will of his heavenly Father and ready to go at his bidding. He was anxious to the last that something should be done to relieve him from pain, but his physician told him he could do nothing to relieve his suffering, and that he had but a few minutes to live, and that he had better compose himself for the struggle of death. He called his family to his bed-side and took leave of them all. He then told the Methodist clergyman, who had just arrived, that he wished he would pray with him. The request was complied with, and while the throne of mercy was being supplicated, his spirit took its flight to its Father and its God. At his request the writer of this notice preached his funeral discourse, assisted in the exercises by Rev. Mr. Sawyer (Methodist), on the 13th. May the blessings of the Gospel, the faith once delivered to the saints—the hope of eternal life, be enjoyed by the bereaved and afflicted family.

J. S. KIBBE.

In Lebanon, on the morning of the 13th ult., Mrs. ROXY A. GATES, in the 36th year of her age.

Mrs. Gates was the daughter of Mrs. Delana Baker, who was buried the week before, and of which public mention has been made. She is spoken of in high terms of respect by her neighbors (that were). Though probably not, on earth, a confirmed believer in the 'restitution,' yet we believe she generally attended our church, preferred its service, and saw more clearly the truth of our faith than any other; and we doubt not that long ere this, the reality of our future has dissipated the doubt and darkness of her past, and filled her soul with the light of truth, and the warm and ecstatic praises of Heaven. May God of his infinite mercy bless the numerous relatives and friends, and especially the doubly bereaved husband of the departed, as He only can bless them; and may this dispensation of Providence redound to the spiritual good of the numerous mourners and neighbors, who were present at the last funeral rite was performed.

The service was attended by the writer, at the Baptist church in Lebanon, aided in the solemn duty by Eld. Reid.

J. J. A.

In Hamilton, on the 14th ult., of consumption, Mr. H. C. ISHAM, in the 39th year of his age.

Br. Isham had been suffering and declining for the past year, and for a while entertained a feeble hope of recovery; but when convinced, by the progress of disease, that it was the will of his heavenly Father to call him home soon, he manifested the utmost Christian fortitude and resignation, and seemed at times anxious that his death summons should come. He had suffered and endured much for a man of his years; but he has gone and left all, and the mourners would not, could not, wish to call him back. May God bless the remaining wife and children, as He beholds their need; and may all the afflicted relatives find in Him an abundant consolation, in this their hour of trouble.

The funeral was attended at East Hamilton, in the Universalist church, on the 16th ult., by the writer. J. J. A.

MELANCHOLY OCCURRENCE.—On Thursday, Jan. 15th, SARAH, daughter of Mr. Benjamin Pinney, aged 15 years, and JANE JOHNSON, a member of Mr. Anthony Thompson's family, aged 7 years, were drowned in the St. Regis river about six miles from Potsdam. They were attending school, and went down to the river to drink, when the ice gave way and the current carried them under it. The body of one was recovered the same day and that of the other on Friday. These girls were both members of our Sunday school at Potsdam and are the first deaths that have occurred in it since its organization. In the absence of the writer, Br. G. S. Abbott attended the funeral services of these children, and spoke words of heavenly consolation to their afflicted parents and friends. W. H. W.

In Onondaga, N. Y., Dec. 25th, 1845, after a short but severe illness, Br. EDWIN JOHNSON, in the 39th year of his age. Br. J. was a highly esteemed citizen, a kind neighbor, an affectionate husband and parent, and a practical Universalist. His loss will be deeply felt by all who knew him. He has left a companion and one daughter who sensibly feel they have lost their best earthly friend. Sister J. mourns not however without hope. Her faith is staid on God her heavenly Father. She feels that her loss is great, but distrusts not the goodness of that Being whose name and nature are love. She confidently believes that she shall in God's own time meet her departed companion and friend with a ransomed world in glory where partings will be known no more forever; where death can never come.—May the blessing of Heaven, and the rich consolations of the Gospel be with her and all who have been called to mourn. May she remember that her heavenly Father has promised to be a father to the fatherless and the widows' God. His grace is sufficient for her.

The consolations of the Gospel were administered by the writer to a large number of mourning and sympathising friends. N. BROWNE.

In Venice, the 24th ult., HORACE B., infant son of Wm. B. and Rosetta Post, aged 2 months. D. H. S.

MUSINGS BY MOONLIGHT.

BY CELIA.

'Tis night again—the hushed and solemn night
When the vex'd soul finds rest, and inward turns
To hold communion with itself, and muse
On life's strange mysteries. Oh holy hour!
How thy sweet influence soothes my harassed soul!
And fills mine eyes with sweet and gentle tears
Of hopeful trust. Of hope, that, though on earth
Is blighted aye, my all of happiness;
There yet may be in some far world above,
A quiet realm of blessedness and peace.

The moon smiles on me with the same sweet look
That beamed upon my childhood—and the stars
Are glim'ring with as soft a radiance, as when I watched them through the waving apple boughs;
And wondered if they might be angels' eyes
From Heaven's blue windows watching e'er the Earth.

Oh God! that I were now as pure as then!
My heart as full of warm and gushing love
For life and all its beauties—and young Hope
Looking as eagerly to coming years.

Alas, for the heart's spring-time!
When once 'tis gone it cometh not again;
The gentle dews bring not its freshness back,—
Nor bloom again its crush'd and blighted flow'rs.
Thought only lives; and, mid the ruins of departed hopes,
Stands like a mourning spirit, grieving for
The bright and blissful, gone to come no more!

This Society shall have the power of striking from its list the names of any members who shall for an undue length of time have neglected without sufficient cause to pay what is due from them, and have thus given us good reason to believe that they have virtually withdrawn from us and wish no longer to remain with us.

'ORIGIN OF SIN.'

In a work upon the doctrine of 'Endless Punishment....' by T. J. Sawyer, I find a chapter upon the subject indicated by the heading of this article; and although I admire the boldness and ease with which the author approaches and demolishes error in other parts of the book, yet I was so forcibly impressed by an attack upon (what I deem to be) truth in this chapter, that I have ventured a few thoughts upon the subject. I seek no controversy; for, if not wholly unused to thinking, I have never practiced giving my thoughts to the public; and perhaps I can not now embody them in language intelligible to others. But if some farther-reaching intellect, and some more practical and powerful pen shall be stimulated by any thing I may say, to take up the subject and endeavor to elucidate the truth of a doctrine lying so near the foundation of all our religious belief, my highest ambition will be satisfied.

The author, after proving conclusively that there is 'no uncreated, and consequently infinite evil being to whom sin may be traced,' and after giving his reasons why 'the holy God can not be, in any proper sense, the author of sin,' proceeds to show that 'it follows of necessity that it was introduced by man.' In examining the subject he says—'if we inquire how it happened that man sinned, I know of no other answer to give than that he willed to do so.' Now this opaque answer induces another very natural inquiry—how man 'happened' to will to do so? If the will of man is not an effect, dependent for its existence upon causes instituted by our Maker, and, for its action, upon circumstances and motives under His control, then where is our accountability? This I think would make man an originator or creator; and God could have no more right to interfere with the will of man than he could with an uncreated, self-existent devil!—Again, the author says—'Of course sin is to be found nowhere as a necessary, or even as a natural result of the human constitution.' To me this involves the self-evident absurdity that nature acts contrary to her own laws. The same, I think, as saying that man acts without motives, and consequently sin is an effect without a cause! With this view of the subject it is a singular fact that Adam took the very first opportunity to act contrary to his nature, and every individual of the human family since has followed his example. Where in analogy do we find countenance for such an idea as this? We see the inanimate creation, without the slightest variation, obeying every law of its existence, from the mightiest worlds above to the minutest particles of earth. Is it said that there are many exceptions; such as the forcing a heavy body away from the earth? I reply, this is not an exception, for it obeys the laws of projectile force while subject to its influence, where it immediately becomes subject to the law of attraction and returns to the earth. We also find the unintelligent animal creation in strict subjection to the laws of its being. And who will deny that God himself acts in conformity to the laws of his nature? And yet in this whole chain of being, man is the only exception to this otherwise universal rule! More reasonable, it seems to me, to believe that humanity is now, in part, governed by laws which shall finally be overcome and annihilated by the all-pervading law of love.

Again—'The elements and the various kinds of destructive animals may work as much evil as man, but no one calls their actions sin.' Whatever freedom the author may claim for destructive animals,

I conclude that he would not contend for that attribute in the 'elements.' Now if these, under the immediate direction of Heaven, 'may work as much evil as men,' do we not come almost as near making God the author of sin, as if we should impute to him the same effect through the agency of man? We at least make God the author of immense evil, and that too through an unintelligent agent, which agent could have no possible effect in changing the character of the act. The author says that 'in conferring upon man moral powers the Creator necessarily exposed him to the possibility of sin.' Why necessarily? A steals from B one hundred dollars. One of the laws of A's nature is to love money for the purpose of supplying what he conceives to be his wants. Could not God have so created him that money should be of no possible use, and consequently he would not desire it? I believe if we could trace all sin to its source we should find it issuing from the same fountain—some real or conceived want resulting from our present organization as physical beings. If so, could we not have been created without those wants and without temptation? But the main argument seems to be that 'God made man in his own image; that is, a moral being, capable of moral improvement and happiness; but to be this, he must be morally free; and freedom to good is not possible in a finite and imperfect being, only on condition of the possibility of evil.' If this 'possibility of evil' be absolutely necessary in a state of imperfection in freedom, how could this freedom be perfected and yet lose so important an appendage? In other words, how could the infinite and perfect Jehovah have this freedom without the 'possibility of evil'? In fact, be freedom what it may, the very idea of imperfection supposes imperfection in every part; consequently imperfection in freedom. But the author says, in controverting the idea of 'sin and misery being endless and indestructible,' that 'had the Omniscient....foreseen in evil a power which he could not control,' &c.—Ah! then this power to do evil can be controlled! without, I suppose, impairing the freedom. By comparing this with a quotation before, it will still be possible for man to sin; but how possible if the power to sin be controlled by the Almighty! How long will it be necessary for us to continue in sin and misery before God can control our power to do evil, and still leave us morally free? I must confess that from this definition of freedom, I can see no way possible for God himself to prevent sin and misery and evil continuing as long as the throne of the Eternal shall endure! But such a thought is too painful to dwell upon. Again, 'God did not foreordain that man should sin; he did not will it.' Did God then will that man should not sin?—if not he had no will in the matter,—an idea which I believe will not be contended for. Now whichever side is taken, I imagine it would not be a hard task to prove from nature, reason, and revelation that that will will be done.

I am aware of the difficulty of reconciling, or rather understanding, the ordination of God together with the freedom of man. But as the health and vigor of our intellectual and moral being depends upon exercise, and exercise consists (in part) in examining all subjects to the extent of our powers, it seems proper that we should try reason and revelation upon the subject before us. If, however, after going to the extent of our intellectual powers, the subject is still obscure, let us leave God in possession of all those attributes necessary to make him God, whatever the effect may be on man. In approaching this subject there is reason to believe that some have stopped short of the truth through fear of 'implicating the holy and sin-hating God in the authorship of sin.' Now, I believe in no secret will as contradistinguished from the revealed will of God. But I also believe there is enough of the will and purposes and works of the Creator, which we do not now understand, to engage our powers through the ceaseless duration of eternity. If then to implicate God in all the management of every event in the wide spread creation, whether we call it good or evil, and to show that 'in Him we live, move and have our being,' is to make him an evil being, then indeed have we greatly mistaken the attributes of God as connected with the conduct and destiny of men. The great question seems to be—May not God ordain in goodness and love what, when performed by man, is evil and wicked? This is stating the question in its broadest sense. In order to understand the subject, we must have some correct ideas of the nature of sin. I do not aspire to rank among the number who have given very learned definitions of this word; but my ideas are something as follows—Sin is a relative term, and relates only to man; to designate that course of human conduct which leads invariably to misery; and it matters little what name we give it so long as misery is the effect. I believe further, that all sin is the result of ignorance. I know I shall be met here with the reply, that sin can not exist without light and knowledge. I admit that there must be sufficient knowledge to stimulate conscience to its duty; but this knowledge amounts to no certainty in relation to any thing future. If all we here call sin is to eventuate in good; (which I can not doubt;) then, could we see with the eye of Omniscience all the bearings and final results of our sinful conduct, that knowledge would change the entire character of our acts; and we should be tenfold more guilty in neglecting to do the same thing which, without such knowledge would be sinful, and bear with it its consequent misery. Thus the man who steals, or murders, supposes he shall in some way increase his happiness; while the future soon reveals his awful ignorance! Sin then, in human beings, is a necessary attendant of ignorance; and it is self-evident that ignorance is necessary to growth in knowledge. But it is asked, does God then direct the steel which the assassin plunges to the heart of his victim? If he does, I can not see wherein he would be the author of evil, more than in directing the tree which the tempest hurls upon the head of the unfortunate traveller. In both cases, a human being changes his state of existence, which change is inevitable to all. In one case God has wisely established a conscience to warn the sinner that he is in the path of wretchedness and wo, while in the other an unintelligent tree performs his will; and if it is mysterious it is because we do not understand the results of the providence of Heaven.

But it is objected, that, as God has said, 'Thou shalt not kill,' if this view of the subject be correct, then God has made a law and determined that it should be broken. It seems to me that when God made his law he must have determined either that it should, or that it should not, be broken. Now he could not have determined that it should not be broken; for then there would have been no necessity for any law at all. On the other hand, I see no other way that man could be made responsible.—And when God determined that his law should be broken, he also determined that the transgressor should suffer the consequences. God also made the physical laws; and will any one deny that he determined that they should be violated? And yet when the infant thrusts his hand into the blaze, God as loudly says, 'thou shalt not disobey my physical laws,' as if he had proclaimed it amidst the thunders of Sinai. But the poor infant must suffer, and suffer on, till greater wisdom teaches him to obey the law. 'For by the law is the knowledge of sin,' and 'where no law is, there is no transgression.' Moreover the law entered that the offence might abound.' And is not the law in this sense 'a school master to bring us to Christ'? God deals with his creatures as finite and imperfect beings, and adapts his laws and his providence to their nature as such. 'But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man.) God forbid; for how then shall God judge the world?' It seems that in consequence of this very doctrine, Paul was 'slandrously reported,' and some affirmed that he said, 'let us do evil that good may come.' But Paul says of such, their 'damnation is just.' I think the case of Joseph and his brethren a very good one to illustrate Paul's doctrine. 'God meant it for good, but they meant it for evil.' God saw that as one link in the vast chain of his providence, which was to accomplish his purposes of mercy; and consequently a succession of events from the beginning of time was ordained with a direct bearing upon this transaction. But Joseph's brethren had not this knowledge. They could only see, or rather imagine the immediate effects, and in them it was evil. So in the crucifixion of the Saviour. No one probably will say it was not ordained of God. But how could he ordain the effect of certain causes without ordaining the causes which led to that effect? And in proof that those causes were ordained, we find the prophets foretelling with minuteness some of those very causes. But it is said, God foreknew,—but did not ordain. How, let me ask, is it possible for any being to know any thing future without the power and act of ordination? I do not, however, intend to examine this Methodist doctrine farther, which appears to me like a contradiction in terms. But no one will refuse to give God the credit of ordaining an act of such vast goodness as the death of Christ, and that of necessity involves him in every circumstance which led to that event. Were, then, the immediate actors guiltless? Let their consciences answer! Very little I apprehend did they know of the merciful purposes of the Almighty in that tragical scene. And if, because God has said, 'I form the light and create darkness; I make peace and create evil.' I the Lord do all these things,' any one should be so foolish as to 'lay the flattering unction to his soul,' that he can sin with impunity, the awful lashes of a guilty conscience will probably remind him of his folly! In order that we should be sinless we must know before hand what God has ordained in relation to our conduct, which is of course impossible. Does not the most powerful motive control in every action? and are we the creators of the motives which surround us in all the transactions of life? We are undoubtedly as free to act as the merry brook that bounds along from hill to vale; but can no more act contrary to the law of motives, than the brook can change its course and travel up the hill. But it may be said that if God has ordered all this sin and suffering, and bound all things fast in the eternal chains of cause and consequence, then indeed God is guilty, for he might have ordered differently. This argument looks plausible, but let us examine.—God could not make man infinite without having an indefinite number of infinities—an impossibility.—Then he must be created somewhere in the scale of knowledge; for, (if not infinite,) he must increase in knowledge in order to be happy. Where then in that scale could he be created better than at the beginning—at the very point where knowledge and nothingness meet? In truth, was it not necessary that he should be created there when we take into consideration the fact that we can know nothing but by comparison—and could only know good by a knowledge of evil—and could only know evil by a participation in sin? Hence, how natural the whole transaction in relation to 'the tree of knowledge of good and evil.' It may be said that angels are happy and yet free from sin and misery. But who knows that angels have not been through the same grade of existence that we are now in? and that having passed on in the scale of being, they are now governed by other laws and subject to other influences adapted to their sphere? And this leads to a train of thought which, if not attended with all the proofs necessary to full belief, is still supported by so much evidence of analogy, as to render it delightful and glorious. It is, that not only man and all intelligences in other worlds, but all the worlds themselves, and all the systems in the vast creation of the Almighty, began at a point and are continuing to increase, worlds in size and man in knowledge; every change being one advance towards the Infinite; and that they will thus continue circling round and still approaching the throne of the Great Creator!

In view of this result of all the complicated, mysterious and incomprehensible machinery in which life is enveloped, can we murmur and say, our Heavenly Father has done wrong in ordaining it? Let us rather 'rejoice with joy unspeakable' in view of 'the glory which is to be revealed in us.'

ELDER EDDY'S SLANDEROUS REPORT—AGAIN.

Weedsport, January 19th, 1846.

Rev. D. SKINNER:—Dear Sir,—I am confident that neither you, nor the readers of your paper, will require an apology for occupying a portion of its columns with a reply to the letter of Elder H. J. Eddy, of Jordan, which appeared in the number of the Magazine and Advocate for May 23, 1845. The communication in question was not seen by myself until several weeks after its first appearance: and as I was not, at that time, one of your subscribers, I had not read the article published on the 2d of May previous, and referred to by Elder E. as charging him with asserting, 'in a discourse delivered by him in Weedsport, N. Y., in the month of February, 1845,' that 'the Rev. Mr. Boughton, a Universalist clergyman formerly of Scipio, had told him that he did not believe in the resurrection,' and with re-affirming the statement in a subsequent interview with me. Surprised as I was, at the unblushing denial of Elder Eddy, and still more so at the bare-faced and unwarrantable perversion of the truth which characterized his communication, I should have noticed it as it deserved, at an earlier day, had not the necessary employment of my time, in attending to my farm and other urgent business, prevented my doing so until now.

Although the article which elicited the letter of Elder Eddy, does not profess to give the precise language employed by him on the occasion referred to, and is incorrect in saying that the name of Mr. Boughton was given in the discourse, it is, nevertheless, in every essential particular, in strict conformity to the truth. The real facts of the case are simply and plainly these: after describing at some length, the 'evils and snares' of the 'great enemy of man,' Elder E. proceeded in his discourse as follows:

'Another way, my brethren, the devil has of beguiling the young convert; a few years ago I was in conversation with a Universalist clergyman, and inquired of him if he believed in the doctrine of the resurrection? He replied; 'I do not!' Well was it, that he said so! Had he not, I would have taken the 15th chapter of 1 Corinthians, and I'd have floored him at once!'

The confident tone in which the speaker had uttered the foregoing remarks, which I had every reason to believe were either untrue, or founded on some misapprehension or mistake, induced me to seek an interview with him after the sermon, not for an instant supposing that he would wilfully misrepresent Br. Boughton, or resort, as he has done, to such a miserable ghost of a subterfuge in order to avoid the consequences of that misrepresentation. Upon my solicitation, Elder J. S. Ladd, then and now the pastor of the Baptist society in this village, introduced me to Elder Eddy, and I immediately inquired of the latter whether he would be kind enough to inform me who the Universalist clergyman was to whom he had alluded in his sermon. He replied: 'It was Mr. Boughton, formerly of Scipio.' I then inquired, whether it was the same Mr. Boughton residing at Watertown, Jefferson county? The answer was—'I believe it is.' I then asked if there was not some misunderstanding on his part, as to what Mr. B. had said. He replied—'there was not!' Upon this, I made the remark, that I had frequently read Br. Boughton's articles in the Advocate, and had never observed any thing of the kind. Elder E. answered it by saying, that 'Mr. Boughton [did] not write much.' I then stated, that for the purpose of satisfying my mind I would write to him (Mr. B.), and know the truth. 'Well,' said Elder E. 'if he denies it, I can prove it!' and in the same breath inquired, in a peremptory manner, and in a tone which showed very plainly that he expected from me the same denial which he had attributed to Br. Boughton—'Do you believe in the resurrection?' I told him in reply, that I believed in the doctrine as it was laid down by St. Paul in the 15th chapter of 1 Corinthians, and if he was in an error, I would be glad to be set right. With this the conversation closed.

Did I depend solely upon my own recollection of the statement of Elder Eddy in his discourse, I should feel some hesitation in pronouncing the version of his remarks which he has himself given, entirely foreign from the truth, and the rhetorical flourishes with which it is embellished, so many subsequent fabrications of the author's imaginative mind. The faithfulness of my memory, however, is confirmed by the recollections of Henry R. Viley, John Lee, and Nathan Chadderton, Esqs., of this village, who were present at the delivery of Elder E.'s discourse, and have kindly furnished me with the accompanying certificate. I may also add, that I exhibited the letter written by Elder Eddy to Elder Ladd, whom I have before referred to, who, after perusing the same, returned it to me, with the significant expression—'Brother Eddy is certainly mistaken!' In addition to this, I have communicated the substance of the article in the Advocate of the 2d of May last, to Adam Passage, Esq., a most worthy citizen of this town, and an active and influential member of the Baptist church in Weedsport, who concurs with me in approving the fidelity of the statement.

It is unnecessary for me to say in conclusion, that it has been no agreeable task for me to expose the mis-statements, to use no harsher term, which occur in Elder Eddy's letter as published in the Advocate. This controversy is not one for which I am in any degree responsible; neither am I disposed to indulge in any commentary upon the motives which may have induced him to attempt to conceal his lamentable ignorance of the Universalist creed by these successive misrepresentations. It is no fault of mine, that the charge of 'falsehood' which he so wantonly put forth, has returned 'to plague the inventor,' and I leave him, more in sorrow than in anger, to the full benefit of the reflections to which the consciousness of this fact must naturally give rise. Very respectfully yours,

JOHN S. EVERTS.

We do hereby certify that we were present at the delivery of the discourse by Elder Eddy, mentioned in the foregoing communication, and that the report of his remarks above given by Mr. Everts, is substantially correct.

THE NATURE OF ELOQUENCE.

The following truthful remarks, on the nature of eloquence, I find in the 'New English Reader.' The name of the author is not given, and I do not know therefore to whom to attribute them, though I am under the impression that they should be credited to Daniel Webster.

J. M. D.

'True eloquence, indeed, does not consist in speech. It can not be brought from far. Labor and learning may toil for it, but they will toil in vain. Words and phrases may be marshalled in every way, but they can not compass it. It must exist in the man, in the subject and in the occasion. Affected passion, intense expression, the pomp of declamation, all may aspire after it—they can not reach it. It comes, if it comes at all, like the out-breaking of a fountain from the earth, or the bursting forth of volcanic fires, with spontaneous, original force.

The graces taught in the schools, the costly ornaments and studied contrivances of speech, shock and disgust men, when their own lives, and the fate of their wives, their children, and their country, hang on the decision of the hour. Then, words have lost their power, rhetoric is vain, and all elaborate oratory, contemptible. Even genius itself then feels rebuked, and subdued, as in the presence of higher qualities.

Then patriotism is eloquent; then self-devotion eloquent. The clear conception, outrunning the deductions of logic, the high purpose, the firm resolve, the dauntless spirit speaking on the tongue, beaming from the eye, informing every feature, and urging the whole man onward, right onward to his object—this is eloquence.

LETTER FROM THE WEST—A NEW CONVERT.

MR. EDITOR—A better acquaintance with yourself and your most excellent paper (for which I hope) might enable me to address you with less embarrassment and more understandingly. With the present character of the Magazine and Advocate, I am quite unacquainted. By the kindness of a friend, some two years since, I was favored with the volumes of 1830 and '31, (bound,) which I value much. Judging from the general character of the paper at that time—the interesting and instructing manner in which it was then conducted; I am far from supposing, that it is now wanting in any particular which would impart lustre to its general character. It is indeed an Evangelical Magazine, out of which the soldiers of Christ can equip themselves with weapons, forged at the great firm of the Almighty, which are not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down of the strong holds of error.

I hope that, since '31, instead of retrograding, it has advanced, and improved, and that it still is, and always may be, filled with the bossy weapons of eternal truth. My present circumstances quite forbid my subscribing for any paper; were it other wise, I would subscribe for the Magazine and Advocate without delay. But I hope soon to be able to forward the money for it, which I shall do with much pleasure. I wish, therefore, if perfectly convenient, you would favor me with one of your late numbers, that I may not be longer in comparative ignorance, with regard to its present character.

It has been but a short time since by the grace of God, I have been enabled to exercise that faith in him, which was counted to Abraham for righteousness. And how true it is, that when the Gospel is received in its fulness and unbounded excellence, it fills the soul with joy unspeakable and full of glory. 'For it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.' Many of my friends are greatly grieved at my embracing what they are disposed to call 'a damnable heresy,' but what I believe to be the eternal truth of God. The Baptist church, of which I have for several years been a member, if they have not done it already, will soon exclude me for heresy, which is a belief in the final reconciliation of all things to God, as taught in his word. No doctrine in the Bible it seems to me, is more plainly inculcated, than the salvation of all men. And if it is heresy to believe the sublime truths of the Gospel, I glory in such heresy. But I am willing both to labor and suffer reproach, because I trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe. I am young in years, but younger still in the faith of Abraham. But by the grace of God, I am what I am. I have quite recently settled in the far western country; and as to my religious opinions, I am almost alone. But all the light I have, though it may be but a spark, I am willing to exhibit it, and let shine. Oh! when I look out upon the world, and see how luxuriantly the seeds of error grow in the heart of man, and what an abundant harvest of woe and misery they have produced, and are certain yet to produce, my heart sickens, and I am ready to ask with one of old, Lord, who hath done this? didst thou not send wheat in thy fields: whence then, hath it tares? But though both grow together until the harvest, yet then the tares of error shall be burned; but the wheat shall be gathered into our Father's garner. But it is not four months and then cometh the harvest—for lo, the fields are all white and ready! Pray ye therefore, with me, that the Lord of the harvest may send forth more laborers thereunto.—For it is great, and the laborers are few. But more perhaps at another time. With sentiments of sincere regard, I am yours in Christian bonds,

J. JONES WEBSTER.

Fitchburg, Jan. 7th, 1846.

RICHMOND, VA.

We have just received the following letter from Br. Griffin the late worthy pastor of the Universalist society in Richmond, which may be interesting to our readers, and especially to the friends of Br. Barry. Another letter (private) from Br. B. states that he is highly pleased with the people of R. and hence we are led to apprehend that we are soon to lose his labors in this section, except in our columns, which we trust he will not desert, even though he be far away in the sunny South. Ed.

Manchester, (near Richmond) Va., Feb. 1, 1846.

BR. SKINNER:—On Saturday the 17th ult., our excellent Br. A. C. Barry arrived in Richmond, and has continued from the Sabbath succeeding his arrival, unto the present period, to supply the Universalist pulpit in that city, to good acceptance—I say good acceptance, for I would not venture upon panegyric,—albeit, truth to say, the warmest friends of Br. B. could not possibly desire him to acquit himself with more credit and propriety, than he has done.

As you have seen by the papers mailed you, Br. B. has within the brief space of his stay in R. performed two marriage services,—besides having ministered the consolations of the Gospel on two funeral occasions.

I had been prepared previously to seeing Br. B.'s 'face in the flesh,' to love and esteem him very much, and have only been confirmed in my sentiments of estimation and fraternal fellowship, by all I have seen and heard in him.

This afternoon he and I have agreed to go and hear Rev. Dr. Thomas (formerly of the 'Campbellite' Baptist church) preach on the subject of remission of sins, or what we must do (!) in order to obtain remission of sin. The 'noble' band of 'Bereans' to whom Dr. Thomas preaches have rejected the blasphemous dogma of 'endless misery' and maintain the final—utter destruction of the wicked: Destructionism, to my apprehension, although not so abominably blasphemous as the [Tertullian] revival of the Pharisaic 'heaven' of endless wrath, is altogether at variance both with Scripture and with reason, and can not be maintained but by a literalism perfectly antagonistic to a sound Scriptural philology! I do nevertheless, esteem these 'Berean' friends—some of them, as worthy personal friends, and all of them as Reformers of Campbellism! Who can say that Dr. Thomas has not improved upon the Campbellism of A. Campbell, to an extent at least equal to his 'reformation' of the Old Side, or Regular Baptist church? My esteemed and talented friend has surely entered upon a 'reform' as far superior to that of Rev. Mr. Campbell, as a negation to the blasphemy of Divine cruelty, is superior in all its bearings to the direct impeachment of Divine Love, contained in the Pharisaic, hypocritical 'heaven' of 'endless life in misery'!! May the society adverted to, as it has made a step of progress from Pharisaic partialism, to a partialism, though negative, of the Scriptural fullness of salvation, yet infinitely less revolting, be yet brought to 'enter into rest' in believing the true Gospel of UNIVERSAL salvation, based in universal divine love! Amen.

I do rejoice to be succeeded by so esteemed, and so estimable a brother, as your co-editor, and my humble prayer is that every blessing of usefulness and happiness may crown all his labors and sojournings in the Capitol of the Old Dominion.—Forbearing to be egotistic, I will not inflict on you, esteemed Br. S., nor yet upon your readers, one word, touching my late relations to the Universalist society in R. In the bonds of Gospel Love and Truth, yours fraternally,

J. L. C. G.

To which is added the history of the United States, by John Inman, Esq. We have just received the first number of the above named work from Daniel Adees, the publisher, 107 Fulton street, N. Y. It is complete in twelve numbers at 25 cents each. No. 1 contains about 120 pages 8vo. of reading matter (neatly put up in pamphlet form with paper cover, so as to be sent by mail) comprising preliminary observations, 'historical, chronological and biographical,' concerning ancient history, previous to the year of our Lord 476, and modern history divided into periods, from 476 down to 1815. An introductory outline of general history is then given, commencing with the antediluvian world and brought down to the general peace after the return of Bonaparte from Elba in 1815. The history of England is then begun occupying the residue of this number and extends to the reign of Alfred the Great.—We are led to believe from an examination of this interesting number, that this work is one of the most concise and valuable historical records extant. The cheap form too in which it is published places it within the reach of all lovers of history. Full sets of the work may be procured of G. N. Beesley of this city, or of the publisher, 107 Fulton street, N. Y.

The Billious fever is said to have been very prevalent since the 1st of January. If some of our subscribers will call, we will give them a receipt for curing it.—[Star of Bethlehem.]

We have not been troubled with that fever since adopting the cash in advance system, some two years since.—That medicine is an effectual cure. We are yet in possession of the old receipt, however, which we should be happy to administer to some of our former patients, who have not yet been cured.

CONFERENCE AT PAINE'S HOLLOW.

On Wednesday and Thursday, the 4th and 5th inst., the first Conference (for the present year) of the Mohawk River Association of Universalists was holden at Paine's Hollow, Herkimer county. The sleighing was good, the weather comfortable, the attendance respectable, both of ministers and people, and a most interesting and, we believe, profitable season was enjoyed. Seven sermons were preached, viz. one by Br. C. M. Patterson, one by Br. J. Douglass, one by Br. J. Tuttle, and two each by Brs. Wm. Parker and D. Skinner. On both evenings, social and free conferences were held after short sermons, for prayer, singing, addresses and exhortations, and the exercises listened to by large, attentive, and deeply interested congregations. We know not when we have attended a more interesting and profitable meeting. We were obliged to leave before the evening meeting of Thursday; but that of Wednesday evening was not only a 'feast of reason and flow of soul,' but a feast of Bible truth and Christian love.

Br. Parker's sermon on Wednesday evening, was on the text Isa. xxxiii : 14, in which he showed that the sinners and hypocrites in Zion, whom fearfulness had surprised, who had made a covenant with death and an agreement with hell, in the vain expectation that the overflowing scourge should not come unto them, and that they should escape the just judgment of their sins, were sadly disappointed when God laid 'judgment to the line and righteousness to the plummet,' and swept away their refuge of lies, and overflowed their hiding places, and disannulled their evil covenant with death and hell; but while the hail storm should sweep away the refuge of lies, and the 'devouring fire' should overtake them and consume their dross and tin, and burn up their wood, hay and stubble, and utterly overthrow all their expectations, the virtuous and the good, he who 'walketh righteously and speaketh uprightly,' &c., had nothing to fear, could suffer no loss; as the gold and the silver would come out of the fire still purer than they went in—that the righteous could as safely 'dwell with the devouring fire, and with everlasting burnings' as Daniel could in the lion's den, or Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego in the fiery furnace—that God was a 'wall of fire round about them'—that while 'our God is a consuming fire,' and will burn up every thing opposed to his nature, he is at the same time love, and will do it for the good of his creature man—that while the righteous have nothing to fear, but every thing to hope, fearfulness surprises the hypocrites in Zion—they tremble even at the fluttering of a leaf, and have to fear the overthrow of all their plans and the consumption and loss of all their works, yet in the end even they shall 'be saved, yet so as by fire.'

At the close of the sermon an appropriate hymn was sung, and a devout prayer offered up by Br. Douglass, when Br. Tuttle arose and addressed the meeting in a strain of pathetic and touching eloquence that seemed to reach every soul, and cause the cords of all hearts to vibrate with the liveliest emotions of joy and gratitude.—Br. T. had formerly been a Baptist; and his theme was the joy, the solace and the rapture inspired and imparted by his present enlarged and glorious faith; which he set forth in striking and happy contrast with his former contracted, partial and gloomy faith—he felt like the bird released from its cage, like the prisoner emancipated from the prison house and set free from the galling chains of bondage. No language was adequate to set forth fully the joy, the peace, the rapture of the soul thus made free by the true faith of the Gospel—it wipes away the tear of sorrow, binds up the broken-hearted, comforts the mourning with Heaven's own consolations, lifts the veil of doubt and darkness and despair from the future, and enables us to look forward to that happy time when all the loved and the lost shall be regained, the long mourned and long separated meet to part no more, when tears shall be wiped from off all faces and a ransomed world shall meet

'A Family in heaven.'

We can give but a meager sketch of his moving and truly eloquent address: but the tears of joy and sympathy that coursed freely down many a blooming and many a furrowed cheek told in unmistakable language that his words were felt and went home to the hearts of that waiting audience.

We arose to respond to the sentiments and feelings expressed by Br. Tuttle, and the joy inspiring character and influence of the true Gospel faith. We briefly adverted to the sentiments of the preceding sermon of Br. Parker, and spoke of the omnipotence of that love, which is the name and the essence of God himself. God is love, and in him is no hatred: God is light, and in him is no darkness. As God is omnipotent and rules over all things, so love is omnipotent and will conquer and subdue all things. The Gospel is of God, and is a system of love. God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, and sent him, not to condemn the world, but to save the world. He came in love to fulfil this mission. His love is stronger than death, and will overcome all things. He who exercises the true faith of the Gospel, will be filled with the spirit of love, and armed with an omnipotence that can never be defeated. He will overcome all enemies, destroy them, burn them up root and branch, and yet never injure them, for love worketh no ill to his neighbor. Hence the apostle says, 'If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.' Brethren, heap up the coals of kindness and love; heap them up high as you can pile them on the heads of your enemies; burn them up root and branch, as Christ burnt up the persecuting Saul of Tarsus till he was utterly consumed and never lived again, but in his place came forth the inspired and good apostle Paul. So, brethren, let us destroy our enemies, and of them make friends. Love alone will kill them. Love alone will destroy hatred, and put its own divine spirit in its place. You can never destroy hatred by hatred or overcome evil with evil. As well might you expect to extinguish the flames of a burning house by throwing fire-brands at it, as to think of overcoming evil with evil or extinguishing hatred by hatred and unkindness. Would you extinguish the flames of the burning house, you must apply the opposite element, water. Would you destroy hatred, it must be done by applying the opposite principle, love. Love is omnipotent, because God is love; and his spirit shall ultimately destroy all hatred and evil. This spirit was in Christ and led him to overcome evil with good, to love his enemies, to pray for his murderers on the cross, and to die that sinners might be saved from their sins and live forever in the love of God. And this is the spirit of our faith, the spirit of Universalism, of that universal love that shall overcome the world and its enmity; for this faith 'works by love and purifies the heart.' 'He that loveth is born of God; he that loveth not knoweth not God.' Brethren, if we would all live the faith that we profess, and exemplify its spirit in all our conversation, we should soon conquer all enmity and overcome all opposition, and the world would be converted to God—to love. All controversy would end, all contention cease, and the doctrine be proved true beyond a doubt by the demonstration thus furnished by the omnipotence of love divine. We then adverted to several historical facts illustrative of the law of love, the power of kindness, in destroying hatred and making friends of enemies. We have not room for near all that was said on the occasion. We concluded our remarks by a renewed exhortation to Universalists to live in the spirit and up to the requirements of our faith, and to heap up the coals of kindness and love on the heads of our opposing brethren, and conquer them by the energies of our faith put in practice.

Br. Parker then arose and introduced the parable of the leaven which the woman put into three measures of meal till the whole was leavened. He spoke of the efficacy of the Gospel in its operations on the heart and the life, and the certainty of its continuing to work in the lump of humanity, till the whole was leavened. We have not room for an extended view, or even a fair synopsis of his remarks on the subject. After a hymn had been sung, an aged Methodist brother arose and added some remarks to what had been said on the subject of the leaven.—He had, he thought, for many years known something of the operations of this leaven, something of its efficacy on the hearts of those in whom it operated, and could cheerfully bear witness to much that had been said. But still he thought that much depended, in its operations, on the condition of the meal to which it was applied—For instance, if the meal was in a very cold condition, exposed to the action of frost, the leaven would not operate—would have no effect upon it.

To this it was replied that, if wise and judicious human agents in leavening their meal, and who have power over both the meal and the leaven, will generally place their meal in such a condition that the leaven will operate efficaciously, it is certainly reasonable to conclude that the Divine agent will exercise as much prudence, and having control both over mankind and the Gospel, (as he turneth the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned,) he will place mankind in such condition that the Gospel shall ultimately operate efficaciously upon all hearts: and as the divine Teacher, by the parable, clearly teaches that the whole lump shall be leavened, we have no reason to question the correctness of his teaching.

Next arose a brother Lutheran, and after offering a few pertinent observations on the leaven of the Gospel, concluded by remarking that, as we see many who live and die without experiencing the operations of this leaven, as they go out of the world unaffected by it, he could not see when and where the leaven was to operate upon them; and inquired how this leaven could operate on disembodied spirits after the body had been laid aside, or put off?

To this we replied, that it is the mind or spirit, more especially than the body, on which this leaven was designed to operate; and it may operate here or hereafter, in this state of being, or another; (though the sooner the better;) that we dare not limit the arm of the Holy One of Israel to a mere point of time or space, and say, 'thus far shalt thou go and no farther;' that death does not dissolve the tie between the creature and the Creator—man is as much the creature of God and under his control in another world as in this: 'For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself: for whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. For to this end Christ both died and rose and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and the living' (Rom. xiv : 7, 8, 9).—That if none can ever be affected by this leaven but such as are affected in this life, then all infants and children dying in early childhood, all idiots and insane people, all heathen, Mahomedans and Jews, who never hear the Gospel in this world, must eternally be excluded from the benefits of it, and therefore, instead of the whole lump ever being leavened, not a hundredth part of it shall ever feel the efficacy of this divine principle, and the Great Teacher's representation of its universal efficacy is not true. But we believe it is true, and that finally 'every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' And furthermore, we urged upon the consideration of all the importance of examining this subject thoroughly; for the more it is examined the more glorious will it appear, and the more powerfully will the leaven work in our own hearts. As the effect of leaven upon meal is, to expand, to raise, to elevate it, so the influence of the Gospel on the heart is, to expand it with benevolence and love, to raise it from every thing low and grovelling, and elevate it to God and every thing great and good, lofty and sublime, glorious and perfect. So let our hearts be expanded and elevated by faith, and hope, and charity divine.

We then sung the Restitution Hymn, and the meeting closed. It was a happy, joyful meeting, and will long be remembered by all who were there. All seemed to enjoy it—all seemed attentive to all that was said and done.—We know not when we have attended a meeting that was more profitable, or one that gave us more heartfelt and true satisfaction. May we enjoy many such hereafter.

Our brethren at Paine's Hollow are few and yet quite young in their efforts to sustain Universalist meetings.—They have not yet organized a society, but are about doing so. Our excellent Br. Douglass preaches to them once in four weeks. And we trust and believe this Conference meeting will prove beneficial, and aid them in the good work they have commenced. D. S.

THE SPIRIT MADE STRONG THROUGH THE MINISTRY OF ANGELS.

'And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him.'—Luke xxii: 43

It surely is not an unpleasant thought that, as of old, there are ministering spirits, who, though unseen, walk this earth both day and night performing the will of God. If it be a delusion, it is very far from being a disagreeable one. But why should it be a delusion? This world surely has not been forgotten by the ever living Father. He has not ceased to regard the human race with a Father's tenderness and love; neither has his interest in their welfare abated. Why may we not then suppose that he operates now through the same instrumentalities as in the years and ages long since passed? and that angels from heaven, though unseen by mortal eyes, execute his righteous commands among the children of men, and strengthen and sustain the struggling, fainting spirit? That there are angels is true, if God's word be true. And to men it is a beautiful and affecting truth that we are surrounded by the spiritual universe, as we are by the spirit and abiding presence of the Father, and that above us and around us are celestial beings, employed on errands of mercy and salvation.

There is something in this truth—in the truth that the angels are looking down upon us in love—nay, that they hover over us with noiseless wing, and stand watching by our pillows through the night time, and are whispering words of peace to the weary yet burthened spirit—I say there is something in the truth that is calculated to refresh, and strengthen, and gladden our hearts. With what power, too, does it strike home to the soul of the sinner!—the friendless and wandering pilgrim. The bare thought, that, though he has forsaken the fountain of living waters, and though cast off and despised by men, denied the fellowship of his kind, with no smile of affection to greet him, there are ministering spirits who surround his path, among whom there is joy when but one sinner repenteth, and by whom every falling tear is noted, and every prayer borne to the throne of God—I say the bare thought that this is so, will make his heart yearn if it be hard as adamant, and melt it down in penitence.

We said,—that there are angels—immortal, spiritual beings—is true if God's word be true. Such beings are recognized there—beings of no earthly mould, but born of the skies—beings who, though unhealed by the natural eye, do yet take an interest in the affairs of men, and whose feelings and sympathies and efforts are enlisted in the behalf of lost and sinning humanity. 'The news of free salvation was announced' to the shepherds on the plains of Judea by an angel; and we are told that when this sublime announcement was made, there joined the messenger a multitude of the heavenly host, who sang with exultation, and along the moonlit vales, and the blue and star-gemmed arch of heaven, rang the chorus of the sky.

They are not imaginary beings, or mere visions to be seen amidst the darkness, but which vanish at the approach of dawn, and are seen no more. This was the error of the Sadducees, condemned by our Lord and his apostles, for they denied that there was either angel or spirit. With them all was materiality—mere gross, earthly matter, with no spiritual existences—no immortal and incorruptible life.

It could not have been an imaginary being who visited Peter in his gloomy dungeon cell, and before whom bolts and bars and massy iron doors, gave way, and the stern and vigilant guards lay locked in profound slumber, with their weapons by their sides. They could have been no unreal, unsubstantial, unsubstantial beings who sat within Christ's sepulchre on the morning of the third day, and who calmed the fears of Mary, and assured her that her Lord was risen. And when it is said, in the language of the text at the head of this article, that there appeared unto the Redeemer an angel from heaven, strengthening him in that hour of the deepest agony; we are not to understand that this was only in imagination; but that celestial messengers in reality came to him with a pitying hand to baptize that agonizing spirit with a diviner courage and a mightier strength for the endurance of the cross.

And I believe, that, to the devoted followers of our risen and ascended Lord—to him whose mission-path is crowded with obstacles and difficulties and trials, and who is struggling against the tide of wickedness, and malice, and persecution that sets in strongly against him—that to him will come an angel from heaven strengthening him—that while he is praying that this bitter cup may pass from him, and yet meekly resigns himself to the will of God, he will find himself nerved at once, as by an invisible agency, for the endurance of sterner trials and mightier conflicts than yet have fallen to his lot. An angel from heaven comes to him, strengthening him.

All spiritual being is interlinked, as indeed all being is. There is a medium by which all things of spirit act on the soul, as there is a medium by which matter acts upon the body. We are sensible of this at times. We all know that at times the soul is impressed, affected, when no outward cause is operating—that at times we are strangely moved without knowing why—that with the quickness of lightning, and unforewarned, a mysterious feeling or sensation vibrates along the chords of the spirit.

'Marvellous stories have been told of individuals who by a sudden impulse have been led to turn aside from a direct and main travelled road in their journey, or to avoid a particular bridge, or to shun a certain house, and subsequent events have shown that by doing this they probably saved themselves from injury or their lives from being are no more marvellous than true. All of you may be able to call to remembrance times, that, when you would engage in a certain business, or pursue a certain route, or set yourselves about a certain work, you have, without any previous reasoning—without any voluntary agency of the will, been suddenly led without knowing how or why, to abandon your deliberately formed intentions; and you perhaps have afterward learned that you were turned away from misfortune and peril. You have called this accident-luck. It was not this—it was spirit acting upon spirit through, or by means of, an established medium. It was an angel forewarning you, and leading you in the way of safety.

We have introduced these remarks for the purpose of showing that there is a medium through which spirit acts upon spirit, and by which all spiritual being throughout the limitless universe is linked together. Through this medium, whatever it may be, man may hold converse with angelic spirits, and with the highest order of intelligences that are said to dwell with God. And we believe that if man was true to his nature,—if his life was obedient and in all respects what it should be, he would hold close and intimate communion with all spiritual beings in all worlds, and that discernible by him, as the faces of friends and seen by the natural eye, angels would come unto him to strengthen him in the day of adversity and trial.

We do not suppose that a miracle would be wrought—that any existing laws, either of matter or of spirit, would be violated for the purpose of bringing man in this world, as it were, into companionship with angels. The supposition is not required. We have shown that there must exist a medium through which the soul is acted upon by invisible agencies, because it is thus acted upon, and influenced and impressed. There are laws then that govern here, as fixed and certain as the laws that govern matter—laws which control spiritual existence, and which operate, under certain circumstances, to produce the effects we have named. True, we can not define them, nor examine into, nor explain the manner of their operation. But we are not thence to infer that they do not exist, and that therefore our conclusions are erroneous.—There are many things with regard to the laws of matter that we do not understand, though an investigation has been going on for several thousand years. 'We can not see that the majestic oak lies folded up in the acorn; still less can we tell how it came there. We have observed that a piece of wood decays in the damp ground, while a nut generates and becomes a tree; and we say it is because there is a principle of vitality in the nut, which is not in the wood; but explain, if you can, what is a principle of vitality? and how came it in the acorn? * * *

But whether it be true or not, that man, by becoming less earthly and sensual, by a true developement of his nature, may see and converse in the spiritual universe around him; it is unquestionable that by such developement and by a more obedient life, he may become susceptible, to a very great degree, of influences from the spirit-world. So, if not visible to the eyes of the soul, angels may in fact visit him, and communicate to him encouragement and strength.

There is for every individual a path for him to walk in, a work for him to perform, a warfare for him to engage in; and he who is faithful in that to which he is called, and who goes forward with a devoted, trustful heart in the performance of duty, will not be left to faint and fall in the day of adversity and trial. His prayer will be heard at the throne of God, and an angel from heaven will come unto him strengthening him.

So those who have taken up their cross to follow Christ, and whose hearts are bound up in his cause, and who in all that they do are actuated by fervent, sincere desires to advance his truth and kingdom in the earth, will not be left to toil and struggle alone. And however bitter and unyielding the opposition they may have to encounter, or whatever perils and reproaches they may be called upon will come to them, imparting courage and strength.

Beyond all this there are crowns of victory and glorious rewards. 'There is nothing so difficult, nothing so appalling, in the whole compass of the world, and career of life, that it can not be overcome by the devoted Christian disciple, with the strength he receives from on high.—'Strong is temptation, strong is trouble, strong is overshadowing night, with all the powers of darkness;' but stronger is the humble follower of Jesus Christ, who, with a submissive, praying spirit, and strengthened by an angel from heaven, can conquer them, and prove himself victorious in every conflict. SLAVERY.

THE CIRCULAR AND PROTEST.

Two of my brother Editors of this journal, have expressed their opinions in regard to the Protest against American Slavery, issued by a mass meeting of Universalists, held in Boston, Mass., on the day following the late meeting of the General Convention. I also feel it my privilege and duty, to 'define my position' on this important subject. And if I shall widely differ from my respected associates, I trust they, and others, will accord to me the same sincerity, and the same desire to discharge faithfully my duty, that I freely grant to them.

I go for that Protest. Every capacity of my soul, mind, heart, and affections, yield it a full and complete approbation. I have signed it. In characters large and distinct as this hand could well trace, my name is annexed to that document. Would that it was worthy to hold as prominent a place on this Protest, as that of a Hancock on a congenial instrument, embodying the same principles, issued by our fathers. Would that like this, it might be handed down, in all its desired prominence, to future generations. For well I know that nothing I could do, would so embalm my name in the most cherished memories of coming ages—that would enable those who perchance may be destined to bear that name, to feel so honorable a pride that it descended to them,—as the attaching it to an instrument of this description. It requires not the ken of a prophet to foresee that the time is not far distant, when the system of American Slavery will be spurned with unspeakable disgust by universal humanity—and when the trivial excuses under which men and Christians now seek to shelter themselves in their inactivity in removing this monster evil, will excite unmingled feelings of astonishment and pity.

Why did I sign that Protest? I blush to think there can be one in my denomination, who could make such an inquiry! Are not my reasons absolutely self-evident? Are they not found in my Bible—in the holy and heavenly system of religion I believe and preach—in the profession made to the world, by the beloved denomination to which I am attached? In fine, are not these reasons written, by God's own finger, on the heart and conscience of every human being, in the love of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,' which he has implanted in all souls?

An evil exists in our land—an evil of the blackest and foulest dye—one in comparison with which, all other forms of human oppression and wickedness, sink into utter insignificance and nothingness!—one indeed, which is the embodiment and consummation of all the woes and curses that have ever afflicted man—and which we may well defy human ingenuity to invent any form of hellish iniquity, to exceed in deep, unmitigated, total sinfulness and cruelty! Nearly three millions of my fellow men—my brethren—'bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh'—whose only crime is, that the common Father of them, and us, and all, has dyed their skin with a tinge a few shades darker than my own—are held in perpetual bondage, in the very bosom of our country. They are robbed of that 'inalienable right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness,' which God has bestowed as the birthright of all. They are reduced to a level with brute beasts—made mere 'goods and chattels,' to be bartered for, and bought and sold, like horses, or dogs, or stones! They are denied the common enjoyments of domestic and social life—their wives are torn from each other and compelled to re-marry—thus violating every commandment of God and man. Indeed slavery is but a great system of concubinage, adultery and fornication—and the land of its existence, is but a vast moral pest house! They are denied the blessings of learning, and to a great extent, the consolations of the Gospel. In many of the slave States, to instruct a slave even to read the word of God, is a crime visited with the penalty of death!!

This double distilled concoction of evil, is supported by the laws of my country. In a legal point of view, I am an abettor and supporter of this cruel system of oppression. Legally, as far as human laws can bind me, my foot is resting on the necks of millions of my brothers, and my hands are holding fast their fetters. Should any considerable number of them, fired by the noble spirit that urged our Revolutionary fathers to battle, dare arise (which God forbid) and assert their inalienable right to 'Liberty,' I should be compelled by the government of this land, to shoulder my musket, march to the scene of insurrection, and imbrue my hands in the heart's blood of my fellow man, who would be contending for that 'freedom' which I so dearly prize!

Have I not a right then, to raise my voice against this system? Can I not 'Protest,' against being made a participant in a wickedness so awful, without being condemned as a troublesome intermeddler of that which does not concern me? The southern gale is loaded with the cries and groans of my oppressed brethren. A million of voices from the cane-brakes and rice-swamps of the South, are calling upon me—Help! help! for the hand of the oppressor is on us! Help, for degraded, imbruted, crushed human nature—struggling beneath a mountain weight of cruelty, ignorance and sin! And another voice falls upon my ear from Heaven—saying—Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself!—All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them! To these vices shall I be indifferent? Can I not respond to them sufficiently at least, to 'Protest' against a system which grinds my unoffending brother man into the dust? Can I not 'Protest' against that which makes this boasted land of Liberty, an object of hissing and contempt in the eyes of the civilized world?

I profess a religion which teaches that all men are brethren—which makes 'the brotherhood of the race,' a prominent article of its faith and teachings. Is this all mere profession?—is there no reality in it? If real, have not the world, have not God, and Christ, and all pure spirits, the right to expect and demand, that I shall act on this reality—sufficiently at least to manifest that I have some sympathy for my down-trodden and oppressed brother man? I can not answer for others—I would not impeach the purity of the motives of my brethren, or cast the slightest disparagement upon them—I speak solely for myself, when I declare that I should have deemed myself recreant in my duty to the Father of all, to the holy religion I profess and teach, to my beloved country, to the ties of our common humanity, to the spirit of the age, to the imperative demands of conscience within me, had I refused, or hesitated for an instant, to sign that Protest!

'But we at the North,' are all opposed to slavery!'—Yes; this is the profession. It is seldom a man breathing the air of a free State, can be found sufficiently hardened to defend the institution of slavery. But the moment it is proposed to do anything for the removal of this acknowledged evil, however, legal and safe, the designed measure may be—the moment it is proposed simply to sign an earnest, yet candid, mild and respectful Protest against the institution of slavery, that it may exert a moral influence on this important subject—lo! numberless excuses are offered for the neglect of the duty! We all want the credit of being opposed to slavery, so long as we can be allowed to do nothing against it. But when we are required to test the soundness of our profession, by taking some decided stand before the influence of abomination that the sun ever shone upon, where are we then?

I can not doubt the sincerity of the reasons offered by those who refuse to sign the Protest. But still I can not avoid feeling that these reasons are fallacious—nor avoid seeing the inconsistency of the position in which it would place me, were I to give them my sanction. Profession and practice should ever correspond; nor should we allow any views of expediency to separate them. Principle should rank before expediency, in all cases. If we believe in our hearts, that the system of American slavery, is a great evil—a monstrous wrong—principle calls upon us to say so—in other words to 'protest' against it—however many dangers expediency may conjure up as connected with such a step.

It is impossible for me to see how division and disruption can be caused in our denomination by this Protest. I can not conceive how a Universalist society could become divided by this matter. That a society composed of anti-orthodox, might fall into jangling, on the question whether slavery should be countenanced or discountenanced—or whether (acknowledging it to be an evil) they should speak out, or remain silent—I can easily believe. But how a society where the slightest love for the principles of Universalism prevails, could hesitate or become divided on this subject I can not understand. Neither can I believe that such will be the effect of this Protest, on societies or the denomination at large. I have a far better opinion of the sincerity of the professions of the class of Christians to which I am attached, than to suppose they can become divided as to the propriety or impropriety of protesting against a system so diametrically opposed to all the teachings, principles and promptings of their faith, as American Slavery! I can not believe the perpetuity of the union which now so happily links us together, depends upon our remaining silent and dumb on a vast system of oppression, cruelty, and corruption, which now festers and corrodes the very vitals of our nation!—Could I believe this, I should blush for my denomination! But I have no fears on this head. The same cry of division was raised when our General Convention took its noble stand against American slavery, at the Akron session—the same cry has been raised whenever our various ecclesiastical bodies have acted on this subject. But no divisions have yet been seen. None will be seen. If the denomination is as pure, and as faithful to its professions and principles as I believe it to be, it will be impossible to divide it on the subject of slavery. Not one Protest, nor a thousand can loose its bands of union, but will draw us, if possible into a still greater unity of opposition against all oppression and sin. Sincerely do I believe that all apprehensions on this head should be banished at once and forever from our midst!

'Ye fearful souls, fresh courage take;
The clouds you so much dread
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head.'

There are many other thoughts which rush into my mind and are almost clamorous for utterance. But I have already occupied more space than I designed. I have spoken plainly and frankly, yet with no disposition to call in question the motives or wound the feelings of those who differ from me. If any thing I have uttered may bear this appearance, I trust they will attribute it to an error in judgment, and not to any disposition of the heart.

I rejoice to believe that this Protest will receive the hearty sanction of the denomination, at least in the free States. While some respected and beloved brethren of the ministry, may deem it their duty to withhold their names, I am confident the great body—comprising a vast majority of the worth, purity, intelligence and talent of the order—will unhesitatingly affix their signatures. I am confident I am, that those who will nobly throw aside any trifling objection which may rest in their minds, regard to the manner of getting up, or the precise wording of the Protest, and give it their names, will do so in honor of themselves and their denomination, in the sight of God and a Roll of Names will be preserved. It will stand forth in bold promise on the Records of our denomination, and receive the admiration and gratitude of all lovers of human rights and freedom, long after the hands that wrote it will have crumbled into dust.—Who can not desire that their signatures should stand in such a catalogue? We can hesitate to send their names down into the very abyss of the blaze of light and liberty of coming ages, attached to an instrument which will command the respect and reverence of all, in the glorious day when humanity shall be enfranchised from every species of bondage and servitude? J. M. A.

THE CIRCULAR AND PROTEST—AGAIN.

As our readers have perceived in articles published and not of articles received, on this subject, multitudes are not to rush at once into the discussion of Slavery and Abolitionism in our columns. The very brief article of Br. S. R. Smith on this subject, though written in a mild spirit and not at all advocating nor seeking to justify slavery, nor yet condemning the language or sentiments of the Protest, has already called out about half a dozen strong Abolitionist articles, attacking him in no very gentle terms for the views he advanced; and would we give unlimited scope to them no doubt twenty more would follow in the same strain. But this we can not do consistently with our sense of duty to the public and the cause of religion. For this is not, nor will it be while we control it, either an Abolitionist or an anti-abolitionist paper. It is a Universalist religious paper.—As such it was commenced; as such it will be continued. If our Abolitionist brethren, therefore, wish for a medium of conveying their thoughts to the public, let them send their articles to an Abolitionist paper—the 'Liberty Press' if they choose, published in this city, a good and ably conducted paper of the kind. But we can see no good resulting from devoting a large share of our columns to this subject, but apprehend much positive evil to our denomination.

Of the several articles received for publication in our columns, we select; and give in to-day's paper one only, the strongest and most pointed; and this must suffice.—It is from Br. J. M. Austin, one of our Corresponding Editors. We think his language is too strong, or rather, that it is too much the language of excitement, and implies at least a severe censure on those differing from him. But let that go. We have no pecuniary interest in this paper, none in any slave State, or property pertaining thereto—nothing to gain or lose personally or pecuniarily by this discussion, or the course we take in it. It is only the cause, the good of the cause we advocate, that dictates our course. We have long and carefully weighed the subject, and looked upon it from different points and positions. We have travelled considerably in slave States and countries on this continent. We have seen and deplored the evils of slavery, and we think we are better prepared to judge of the subject and the expediency of the course we take, in closing our columns for the future against these exciting Abolitionist articles, than those who have never been in a slave State nor known aught of the institution save what they have got from hearsay.

We give below a very sensible and well written article from the pen of Br. Geo. Messenger formerly of this State, containing his reasons for not signing the Protest, as published in a late number of the 'Ohio Universalist.' Br. M. is a good and a benevolent man; and has lately travelled and sojourned much in a slave holding state, and speaks from close observation and careful consideration. We agree with him in saying that we 'can not see any good that will result to the poor slaves, or their masters or ourselves; from signing this Protest, or agitating the subject here. And we would call particular attention to another remark of Br. M. viz., 'How many there are here at the North, who can fight most courageously when they are beyond the reach of danger, but when they go into the slave holding States where there is danger, will be as silent as death upon abolitionism.' We commend his article to the serious consideration of all our readers and correspondents.

[Since the above was written and Br. Austin's article was in the hands of the compositor, we have received a private letter from Br. S. R. Smith, in which he says, concerning those who have assailed him in our columns, 'I can never take any notice of these men nor of their rude and uncalled for assault upon me.'

We feel that we have already admitted too much upon this subject into our columns; and we should not have admitted Br. Austin's article in to-day's paper, but from the fact that he, being one of our corresponding editors, had not before spoken, and his article, though very severe, is not so personal as some others which we have received. Our correspondents, we trust, will understand us. Finis.

Reasons for not signing the Protest.

BRS. H. BACON, S. STREETER, S. COBB, L. R. PAIGE, E. H. CHAPIN:

Dear Brethren:—Being absent from home when your circular containing a protest against American slavery came into the Post Office, and not returning home till a short time since, I could not well give you an earlier reply. I respectfully decline signing the Protest, because I am convinced I can do more good without, and that the Protest itself will do more injury than good: for I can not see any good that will result to the poor slaves or their masters, or to ourselves. I have had some time and opportunity to mature my decision on this important subject, having for a number of years been intimately acquainted with the feelings and situation of our fellow citizens in the slave holding states, having spent a part of two seasons among them.

I think the Protest is as unexceptionable in its language and spirit as any document of the kind I have seen, and even more so; yet I apprehend at this time, when political abolitionism is a highly exciting theme, fraught with so many extravagances, in connection with so much abuse, slander and falsehood in reference to our Southern citizens, that even this mild and reasonable Protest will create alarming divisions in the peaceable ranks of our own denomination, and increase the already high wrought prejudice and hatred of the southern people against the northern, without doing them or us any good, but enhance the evil to both. For they will look upon us as drawing up ourselves in hostile array toward them, and bid us defiance. They will consider us as joining in a crusade against them, and hence, while we maintain such a position, we can do them no good by argument, persuasion, or reason. And if all our clergy should sign this Protest we should be looked upon as political abolitionists, both at the South and North. Nor would it avail us anything to declare it to be merely a moral and religious movement, and not a political one.

It may then be said, as slavery is an evil totally incompatible with the genius of our free institutions, what ought we to do, or what can we do to remedy the evil? With no design to dictate to any one, I will answer. Let those who choose, go to the slave holders as friends and not as enemies, actuated by philanthropy and good will, without the feelings or appearance of hostility, armed only with the weapons of truth, goodness and love; cautiously avoiding all censoriousness and angry controversy, and they may be assured of a candid hearing; and then they might proceed to show the slaveholders clearly the superior advantages to the masters as well as to the slaves, of the permanent establishment of freedom and equal rights to all. If this course would not prove effectual, I can not conceive of any that would, in the present arrangement of southern society. If we are to subdue any enemy, it is the best policy to go where he is and not attempt to fight him at so great a distance that our shots can do little or no execution. How many there are here at the North who can fight most courageously when they are beyond the reach of danger, but when they go into the slaveholding states where there is danger, will be as quiet and peaceable as possible, and silent as death upon abolitionism.—In a word, I view the anti-slavery movements in the free states as of little consequence, and calculated to effect very little good any way.

Yet I am not indifferent to the subject, but it is my fervent prayer to God, that the best means may be devised for the ultimate and total extermination of slavery. I am convinced if this shall ever be done without the horrors of a bloody revolution, it must be done gradually, by having laws enacted for that purpose by the Legislatures of the slaveholding states. An immediate and total abolition of slavery in the southern States, would in my humble opinion, be a great injury to both master and slave, in consequence of the sudden disorder that would be likely to succeed, jeopardizing the lives and property of the whites, and introducing drunkenness, idleness, and a wandering life among the blacks. In all probability, thousands of colored vagrants would wander through the community. The slaves commonly are without education, have no calculation or economy in providing their own food and raiment, and if left to themselves without some judicious preparatory measures, would doubtless soon be reduced to a condition of want and destitution worse to them than slavery. The subject is surrounded with difficulties on all sides, yet they probably may be overcome by the adoption of appropriate measures, and the enactment of just and salutary laws.

With profound respect and esteem, I remain your fellow laborer in the Gospel,

GEO. MESSENGER.

P. S. The above was intended to be sent as a private letter, but at the solicitation of Br. Emerson, I have consented to have him publish it in the Universalist.

CHEERING LETTERS.

We give the following cheering extracts from letters received from the persons severally named—cheering in two respects particularly—one, the cause of universal grace is onward, and another that the Magazine is increasing in its circulation—success to both. The first extract is from the letter of Br. H. E. Whitney,* dated Columbia, Pa., Feb. 6, 1846, and after giving directions how to apply ten dollars for the paper, runs as follows:—

'I moved into Columbia last May, and had been here but one week, when I had the misfortune to break my leg, in consequence of which I was confined all summer. After recovering from my lameness, I commenced preaching the Gospel of universal grace and salvation, in the following places, viz., Troy, Columbia Flats, Burlington and Jackson, where I still labor one fourth of the time at each place. The cause of Universalism here, is progressing slowly, but I trust permanently.

We have lately formed a Universalist society in Columbia, and have petitioned the Court to be incorporated according to the laws of this State. Yours respectfully,

H. E. WHITNEY.'

The next is from Br. J. M. Cook of Providence, R. I.

* Br. Whitney should be addressed at Columbia Flats, Bradford county, Pa.

He says, 'Enclosed you will find ten dollars, for which you will send the Magazine to the following names,' (giving them.) After which he writes, 'We are getting along finely in the 2d society here—the great difficulty now is that we have no room for the hearers—that is, after we have packed away nearly 1000, too many are obliged to leave—we shall endeavor to remedy this evil before long by building a good house—i. e. if we are prospered of the Lord.'

The last is from Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn. He says, 'A large church will be built by our friends here the coming season—much of the stock is subscribed.'

INSTALLATION.—Br. E. H. Chapin, having on the previous Sunday preached his valedictory sermon to the society in Charlestown, was on Wednesday evening the 28th ult., installed pastor (associate with father Hosea Ballou) of the second Universalist society in Boston. The sermon on the occasion was preached by the venerable senior pastor himself from 1 Peter iv: 10, 11. It is spoken of as a plain, strong and appropriate discourse, truly characteristic of that venerable father in our Israel. BRS. T. D. Cook, A. Hichborn, S. Streeter, H. Ballou, 2d, O. A. Skinner, C. H. Fay, and A. P. Cleverly, took parts in the solemn and interesting services.

Br. T. C. Adam, of the West society in Boston, as we learn by the Christian Freeman, owing to ill health, has been obliged to leave and return for the present to his former home in Michigan. It is hoped his health may so improve by the change as to enable him to return again to his charge.

We learn by the Star in the West that Br. W. E. Manley has asked a dismissal from the pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Chicago, which request has been granted, and Br. Samuel P. Skinner has been invited to and accepted the charge.

NEW SOCIETY.—A second Universalist society has lately been formed in Louisville, Ky., under the efficient labors of Br. E. M. Pingree. The cause of truth in that city is said to be onward and in a highly prosperous condition.

NEW MEETING-HOUSE.—A new Universalist meeting-house, as we learn from the Ohio Universalist, is about being erected in Mesopotamia, O., where under the labors of Br. H. Kellogg we learn the cause of truth is greatly prospering.

THE UNIVERSALIST QUARTERLY AND GENERAL REVIEW for January has come to hand. We shall notice it more at length soon.

Br. S. Cobb's COMPEND OF DIVINITY is received, and will be more particularly noticed as soon as we find time to peruse it.

The GAVEL for February is received, and presents an excellent treat of selected and original matter.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

The EDITOR will preach at Remington's next Sunday, and at Canajoharie village on the first of March in the forenoon, and at Ames at 2 o'clock P. M.

Br. J. H. STEWART will preach in Bridgewater on the first Sunday in March.

Br. GIBSON will preach in Stockbridge, Friday evening Feb. 20th—at Madison, Sunday, 22d—at East Hamilton Sunday, March 1st.

Br. N. BROWN will preach at Onondaga South Hill the fourth Sunday just.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—There will be preaching in the 'Lease Town' School house (Onondaga,) the third Sunday in February; let there be a general attendance. A three months sleep is thought to be sufficiently long for the moral health of the society.

A CONFERENCE, or two days meeting will be held in the Union church at West Potsdam, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday, 25th and 26th of the present month. A large and profitable meeting is expected.

Canton, Feb. 11, '46.

TO OUR FATHER, IN THE WEST.

A weary time hath passed, Father,
Since from our little gate,
We saw thee go, to brave alone,
In stranger-lands, thy fate.
And then there was a darkness came Unto our cottage door,
A shadow and a cloud, Father,
It never knew before.

The shadow lingers yet, Father,
The cloud is still the same;
The brightest sunbeams break it not,
Nor thy beloved name.
We look around the room, Father,
As though thou might'st be near;
And listen for the kindly voice,
We always used to hear.

And when the daylight fades away,
And earth forgets her glee,
We gather round the fire-side hearth,
And sadly call for thee.
We call for thy bright smile, Father,
That gladden'd with its light;
And made it noon-day to us all,
When, else, it were but night.

The things that were thine own, Father,
Are strewn around us there;
The Bible, with its aged look,
(And e'en, thine own arm-chair.
But ah! there is a gloominess,
Around the chair entwined,
The Bible's sacred leaves are turn'd,
By other hands than thine.

Sometimes, we think it strange, Father,
That every thing should be
So faithful to its sacred trust,
So faithful unto thee!
But so it ever is, Father,
And all thou'st left behind
Still whispers to thy children's hearts,
Of parent, good and kind.

You know we used to mourn, Father,
When the flow'ret's cheek grew pale,
And the hill-side streams kept murmur'ing,
The low and dirge-like wail.
And we wept, when the gentle sky
Had lost its summer hue;
But now we know a deeper grief—
To mourn so long for you.

We miss you, all the time, Father,
When the flush of morn is light,
And when the noon-day creeps along;
And then,—the fond good night!
We miss the happy voice, to-day,
That welcom'd in the year;
The merry wish of other hearts
Can bring no laughter here.

We miss you in the darken'd way,
Where sorrow's foot hath trod;
For we've no arm to lean on now,—
No arm, save that of God.
And do you sometimes think, Father,
Of that far-sadden'd home?
And do you hear the children ask,
'When will our Father come?'

FRANKLIN COUNTY—MY LATE VISIT THERE.

Left home Sunday morning January 11th, and rode to Potsdam, distance eleven miles and preached there during the day. After services rode to Parishville, distance nine miles where Br. Worden had preached the same day and who had an appointment in the vicinity in the evening. Expected to hear him preach, but by his solicitation was induced to do so myself. Spent the night with Br. Stevens who is a relative by marriage of Br. E. Ballou of Vt. On Monday Br. Worden and myself journeyed on to Malone where resides Br. E. A. Holbrook, pastor of the Universalist societies of Malone and Westville. We arrived at M. a little before night, and there being a revival in progress at the Presbyterian church, we went with a friend to attend the meeting in the evening. There was evidently up-hill work on the part of the speaker—the substance of whose discourse that night was, Behold now is the accepted time to be made one of my party—behold now is there a great crisis with our order! About nine o'clock we returned to our lodgings, and the next day, we went down to Westville to attend the Conference and Ordination on the following Wednesday and Thursday. We found the friends prepared for the meeting, and in expectation of rich and profitable times.

Wednesday morning. The brethren present were Brs. J. Baker, Abbott, Worden, Holbrook and Waggoner. The congregation assembled and listened to a clear, and somewhat new exposition of 2 Cor. ii: 15 and 16, by Br. Baker. His remarks were listened to with good attention. In the afternoon the writer preached a funeral discourse on the death of a son of Mr. Hadley in that place, Brs. Holbrook and Baker taking part in the service.—The congregation in attendance was large and the occasion was truly a solemn one. Mr. H. only a short time previous having lost a child, all present seemed moved with sympathy in his behalf and that of his family. Service was again held in the evening, and Brs. Worden and Abbott preached to excellent satisfaction.

Thursday morning. The people assembled from the surrounding towns and with the congregation at Westville, filled the house above and below.—Br. Abbott and the writer preached, and during the delivery of both discourses, all was order and attention.

Ordination of Br. E. A. Holbrook. This took place in the afternoon and in the following manner. 1. Reading of the Scriptures by Br. Abbott. 2. Hymn. 3. Introductory prayer by Br. Abbott. 4. Hymn. 5. Sermon by Br. Baker. 6. Ordination prayer by the same. 7. Charge and delivery of the Scriptures by Br. Waggoner. 8. Right hand of fellowship by Br. Worden. 9. Address to the society by Br. Waggoner. 10. Hymn. 11. Benediction by the candidate.

These services occupied considerable time, yet an almost breathless attention was given to the whole by the large concourse of people present.—And the occasion was one that will long, long be remembered by our esteemed brother there set apart to the work of the Christian ministry, and indeed by all who participated in the solemn and thrilling joys of the meeting. It is believed too that it will tell for good throughout that community, and especially upon the societies heretofore named.

After thanking the friends for their Christian kindness and their liberality, which truly are praiseworthy, we reluctantly bid them farewell, and with the other brethren we journeyed back to Malone where appointment had been given out for Baker and myself to preach that evening. We arrived there in season for the service and upon entering the Court House, found a fine congregation in waiting to listen to the expected messages. We delivered ourselves of what we had to say, and then retired for the night. Friday morning, Br. Baker left to visit St. Albans, Vt., his former place of residence. Br. Worden started for Nicolville where he is expected to locate immediately and preach a part of the time. Being induced to remain at Malone over the Sabbath, Br. Abbott was engaged to supply for me at Canton, for which place he made the same day. We tarried with Br. Holbrook and his excellent society till Monday morning, and we must say, that although somewhat unwell, we never enjoyed a visit better. We preached again in the Court House on Saturday evening and also three times on the Sabbath. Our meetings were large and the part taken in the service by the choir, charmed our inmost soul. That was well done you young ladies and gentlemen, and may the Father of mercies grant that you may never have occasion to hang your harps upon the willow, nor change the joyful songs of Zion into the mournful requiems of sorrow.

During our stay in Malone, we had opportunity to learn the condition of our cause in Franklin county. And we ascertained that its condition was good, and that the societies in Westville and Malone owed their present wholesome standing in a great degree to their present worthy pastor. We also found that the society in the latter place, who are destitute of a meeting house, are abundantly able to build one, and that in all probability they will have one built and dedicated before the close of the present year. Brethren, go forward, multiply your triumphs of truth over error, and may the Lord bless you forever. W. H. WAGGONER.

UNIVERSALISTS AND UNITARIANS.

We cheerfully give place in our columns to the following fraternal letter from Rev. Mr. Emmons, together with the articles from the Christian Register which he desires us to publish. We were about to write some comments on the article from the Register correspondent, 'Aletheia,' when we received an article expressly prepared for that purpose, from our corresponding Editor, Br. Smith, which we also give a place in this number. So we add nothing of our own, except two or three brief notes which we thought would be of interest to the public. We can charitably suppose that Mr. Upham, the Editor of the Register, was not as well acquainted with the facts of the cases referred to as he might have been, and as his correspondent ought to have been, when he penned his article. For one, we should heartily rejoice to see the bonds of a true Christian fellowship strengthened between these two denominations, who hold so many and so important principles in common, and between whom there is so little that need to conflict.

The kind and fraternal feelings expressed by Br. Emmons we most fully and heartily reciprocate. We regard him as a true brother in Christ. We have several times exchanged with him by his own request, and probably shall again when convenient for us both to do so. His frank, cheerful unreserve, the cordial grip of his fraternal hand, and his whole bearing and deportment when we have been in his company, are unmistakable evidences to us of his hearty sympathy and fellowship. The counterfeits of these are easily detected, and distinguished from the genuine. They are cold, formal, round-about—and the disguise is seen through at once. But Mr. E. is a true Universalist at heart—we mean in feeling, fellowship and charity—we care not to inquire or to know what are his peculiar views on certain speculative points of doctrine. If he is on the broad platform of benevolence as universal as humanity, and feels its power, it is enough.

We have also received a communication from Rev. Mr. Buckingham, (the Unitarian minister of Trenton,) in reply to an article signed 'W.' in the 6th No. of this paper, for which we will try, notwithstanding the present crowded state of our columns, to find place in our next number.

ED. MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

MY DEAR SIR,—It has been with pleasure that I have read several articles of a respectful and conciliatory tone in recent numbers of the Christian Register, (Unitarian,) and Trumpet, (Universalist,) published in Boston. The remark of the Register, some months since, that Universalists were approximating towards Unitarians, it seems has called forth an editorial in the Trumpet, to which I infer that the paper I send you is a reply. If it is consistent with your views and arrangements, I should like to see the article in the Register, with the comments of the Editor, copied into the Magazine and Advocate. The spirit of this article is such as Christian sects ought to manifest toward each other; and all who have been in the habit of reading the Register, especially since it has been conducted by the present Editor, will perceive that it is homogeneous with all that has come from his pen in reference to the Universalist denomination. If the facts stated in the article by 'Aletheia' are correct, they have an important bearing on the relative position of the two denominations. And I know that a conviction of their truth is the basis from which many Unitarian ministers and laymen view the present position of the Universalist denomination. It is this view in connexion with a determination to be faithful to the claims of that most important religious principle, the rights of individual judgment, which actuates many, especially of the younger portion of the Unitarian ministry, in reciprocating ministerial and Christian courtesies with the brethren of the Universalist denomination.

That some do not think it their duty to exchange pulpits with Universalist clergymen, of respectable attainments, shews that there is a difference of opinion on this, as on all other subjects. Such difference might be expected from the adoption of the principle I have alluded to. Every man is his own judge of duty. This is the great and, to my mind, the most glorious feature of the Unitarian denomination,—that every individual is allowed to hold his own opinion, and pursue independently his own way of doing good, irrespective of all others. Owing to this fact, it is always difficult to speak of the opinions of the denomination, on certain controverted subjects. Every individual in this respect stands alone. He protests against the body speaking for him. And he must speak, if at all, for himself, nor for his brethren. That there are some inconveniences attending this state of things is true; but the good far outweighs the evil.

For myself I pray ever to be preserved from denominational bigotry. While viewing Christian truths, and their applications, from a different standpoint from the Universalist portion of the Church Universal, I rejoice in the wider extension of the true spirit of Christian charity and courtesy, which apostles enforced, and many good men of all ages desired,—which even Cotton Mather in the days of strictest Puritanical Theology dimly foreshadowed in the following words, which breathe a truth far beyond the conception of the man who uttered it.

'The period hastens for a new reformation, wherein 'tis likely that our Holy Lord will in some degree reject all the parties of Christians at this day in the world; and form a new people of the good men out of the several parties, who shall unite in the articles of their goodness; and sweetly bear with one another in their lesser differences, leaving each other to the Divine illuminations. Piety, will anon be the only basis of union in the churches of the revived, refined, reformed Reformation; and pious men, in several forms, will come to live and love as brethren; and the purged floor of our Saviour will be visited with the tokens of his presence which shall be very comfortable.'

Respectfully and fraternally yours,
H. EMMONS.

STATE OF DOCTRINE AMONG THE UNIVERSALISTS.

Several years since a secession took place from the Universalist denomination, under the name of Restorationists. As the professed point at issue was that of future retribution maintained by the Restorationists, and from the very great earnestness and excitement between the parties, the public derived the impression that all who remained with the Universalists, as distinguished from the Restorationists, rejected the belief of a retribution beyond the grave altogether. Within the last two or three years, many of the most accredited authorities among the Universalists have avowed and urged the doctrine of a righteous retribution beyond the grave. We naturally regarded this fact as an evidence of progress and change since the date of the Restorationist succession, and congratulated ourselves and them, in view of it. In the last 'Trumpet' there is an instructive editorial article, written in an excellent spirit, on this subject, in which we are informed that many who held the doctrine of the Restorationists, did not withdraw with them, but remained with the Universalist denomination. What we have regarded as evidence of progress, is, it thus appears, evidence only of a more open and unequivocal avowal of sentiments always entertained. While we make this correction we still are confident in the belief that among Universalists there is as much progress in truth as in any other denomination.

Since putting the above in type we have received the following communication:

THE UNIVERSALIST DENOMINATION.—The writer of this confesses, that he is greatly surprised at the declaration of the Editor of the 'Trumpet,' that 'we know of no general change of opinions having taken place among Universalists on the subject of retribution,' if the language is to be taken in the most absolute and unqualified sense. And equally surprised is he to find so well-informed and attentive an observer of what is going on in the world, as Rev. S. R. Smith, of Buffalo, N. Y., laboring to give the same impression. He can account for it only by supposing, that both these gentlemen have not turned their attention so much in this direction, as is necessary to a full apprehension of the actual state of things.

But be this as it may, of one thing the author of this is certain, and that is, if there has not been a 'general change,' there has been a very great relative change, among the ministry especially, upon this subject. He has had the means and opportunity of knowing as well how matters have been for more than a dozen years, and how they now are, in respect to the prevalent views in the Universalist denomination, concerning retribution, especially in the New England States, and particularly among the ministry, as any one could desire; and he hesitates not to affirm, most distinctly and emphatically, that a great change has taken place in this denomination, in respect to retribution, and for the better, as he thinks, particularly among the ministry, within the last ten years, and that there has been and now is a constant and rapid approximation toward the Unitarians, in several respects. In proof of this, I will state a few facts, which no well informed person will attempt to contradict.

Ten years ago, there were hardly so many clergymen connected with the Universalist denomination, in all New England, who were known to hold, that man's future condition would be at all affected by their present conduct. The only man of any distinction, who stood out openly for future retribution, connected with the denomination in this Commonwealth was Rev. Lemuel Willis, then of Salem. If others entertained this view, a most studied silence was maintained in relation to it, as it was somewhat hazardous to take decisive ground upon this subject at that time. But it is believed, that very few indeed, held this doctrine in any form, even as a remote probability, if indeed it was admitted as a possibility.

But what is the state of the case now? Throughout New England, and particularly in this Commonwealth, an entire revolution has taken place. We can not affirm so positively concerning the remote parts of New England, but in relation to Massachusetts, the number who will now take this ground, that man's future condition will not be at all affected by his present conduct, is about as small as that in favor of future retribution, ten years ago. This we affirm to be the case among the ministry of this denomination, and a rapid change is going on among the mass of their congregations, in the same direction. The belief that the future condition of men will not be affected by their present conduct, is now mostly confined to the older men in the ministry, and this is true of the congregations, to a very great extent. Indeed we do not know a young man in their ministry, of any tolerable attainments, who denies the doctrine of the connection of man's present conduct and his future condition. In this respect, if such are the facts, is not the denomination, as such, advancing towards Unitarians?

But this is not the only, not the most important change that has taken place in this sect, within the last ten years. An entire change has come over the general tone and spirit of its pulpit performances. Sermons of the character which generally distinguished their preaching at that period, would now be highly offensive to most of their established congregations. Occasionally we may hear a discourse of the old school, from some wandering preacher and in some remote corner of the land; but seldom is any thing of the kind heard in their established churches, even approximating to it.—If any such performance should be inflicted upon one of them, in the morning, by some stranger, if he was expected to occupy the pulpit in the afternoon, he would find a wonderful falling off in his audience.

The truth is, at the present time, a tone of serious earnestness marks and pervades the performances of the pulpit in the Universalist denomination, which might have been looked for in vain, ten years ago. Instead of their being a mere ringing of changes upon the doctrine of universal salvation, or a mere declamation about the errors and sins of other denominations, or the horrors of endless punishment, their tendency and aim is more to enlighten, instruct and elevate their hearers. Attention is manifestly directed more to the promotion of piety and goodness, and the reformation of the people, pointing out the way of salvation and showing men how to attain salvation, than to proving that all men will get to heaven, somehow or other, at last. Although some may think there is still room generally, for improvement in this respect, and some instances may be pointed out, which are exceptions to this statement, still so great has been the change already effected, and such the tendencies of things among them, that a reasonable ground of hope is afforded, that the day is not far distant, when the most evangelical tone and spirit will universally pervade their pulpit performances.

Besides this, ten years ago, there was a general neglect and disregard of the ordinances of religion, and there were hardly so many churches in the whole denomination.* The same was true in relation to Sabbath Schools. In fact, there was a decided feeling of hostility to all these things in the minds of a very large proportion of the members of their congregations. They were generally spoken of in terms of dislike and disapprobation, if not of contempt and ridicule.†

* This is a sad mistake in every respect. Instead of there being a general neglect and disregard of the ordinances ten years ago, there has been for more than twice that length of time, indeed from the very origin of our denomination in this country, a general respect and attention to them wherever practicable. But when, in some towns there were none, and in others but two or three believers, and seldom a preacher among them, the organization of churches and the administration of the ordinances was deemed impracticable. Ed. Mag. and Adv.

† This is also untrue. Universalists, as a denomination, were never opposed to the institution of Sunday schools per se. They opposed the perversion and abuse of the institution by such men as Dr. Ely and his coadjutors, when they undertook to organise a 'Christian party in politics,' to effect which the Dr. said 'the Presbyterians alone would bring half a million of electors into the field'—that the President of the United States had no right to attend a 'heathen conventicle,' (alluding to Mr. Adams attending the Unitarian church)—that 'our President, secretaries of government, Senators, representatives in Congress, governors of States, judges, state le-

But what is the state of the case, in reference to these matters now? The entire current of thought and feeling is changed. In almost all their established societies, a church and Sabbath school is established, the ordinances of religion regularly administered, and the social conference meeting held weekly, in which laymen speak and pray.‡ Among their Sabbath schools may be found some of the best arranged and conducted schools in the land.

In view of these facts, it seems to the author of this, that the article in the 'Trumpet,' to which we have allusion, is calculated to make a wrong impression concerning the state of things at the present time, or what it has been in times past, and that to the discredit of the denomination. It appears to the mind of one at least, that so far from attempting to conceal the fact, that a great change has taken place in the Universalist denomination, and is now going on, its friends should be proud to acknowledge it. If they are really making progress, it is very much to their credit, and a harbinger of their future success. It goes to show that there is a great activity of mind in their midst, great freedom of thought, and that they are no slaves to creeds or the sentiments of the fathers of the sect. It goes to prove also, that there is great fidelity to individual convictions, that individual integrity is fully maintained and practically exercised.

In view of these facts, we also think the friends of enlarged and liberal views in theology, have great reason for rejoicing, and that the more free interchange of civilities which begins to be more generally practiced, among the different classes into which the friends of religious freedom and enlarged and liberal theology are divided, is not only warranted, but absolutely demanded as a matter of imperious duty. ALETHEIA.

gislators, justices of the peace, city magistrates,' &c., 'ARE BOUND TO BE ORTHODOX IN THEIR FAITH'—that 'IN TEN YEARS, OR CERTAINLY IN TWENTY, THE POLITICAL POWER OF OUR COUNTRY WOULD BE IN THE HANDS OF MEN WHOSE CHARACTERS HAVE BEEN FORMED UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF (ORTHODOX) SABBATH SCHOOLS.' To such a use of Sunday schools, we proudly confess we were opposed, as a denomination, and presented a bold and unyielding front. But to Sunday 'schools in themselves, we were never opposed. Ed. Mag. and Adv.

‡ We could name societies, or at least one society in our denomination, where, if we mistake not, 'the weekly conference' spoken of, was instituted nearly fifty years ago, and has been regularly kept up ever since. (Father Streeter's church, Boston.) Ed. Mag. and Adv.

REMINISCENCES—LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Br. SKINNER—What thoughts crowd around and rush into the mind, when, after a long absence, one stands again amid the scenes of his early days! And here I am among old friends and dear kindred, surrounded by the associations which memory, faithful to her charge, is bringing up, one after another, causing me, as it were, to live over again the past. But in vain do all these bright pictures endeavor to conceal the fact that, stern time has been busy in its accustomed work, and has written CHANGE, in emphatic characters, upon almost every thing which surrounds me. The prattling child upon its father's knee, is now the youth, enjoying the scenes which in the same joyous period, I once enjoyed. The youth has assumed the parents' charge, and the parent is now tottering with age! And death, too, has done its work. The cold marble in yonder yard tells the story of the termination of the earthly career of many, very many of the acquaintances, and friends of other days. And as ever, death has been impartial in his selection—all classes have bowed to his mandate and submitted to his embrace! The maiden, whose countenance was beauty, and whose voice was music; the young man in his strength and youthful ardor; the parent and the child, have each in his turn, heard and obeyed his voice.

How sensibly was I impressed with the reality of all these changes when standing, last Sunday, before an audience in the Universalist church at this place, endeavoring to proclaim the doctrine of the glorious 'restitution of all things.' How few of that audience did I recognize, so changed were those whom I once knew perfectly well! 'Sic transit gloria mundi.'

The Universalists of this place, as you are aware, own a large and fine church, and have a large number of names enrolled upon their society book. Br. Morse labored with them for some time, but at present, and for nearly two years past they have had no preaching except occasionally, though with truly Christian and praiseworthy zeal, they have not 'forsaking the assembling of themselves together,' but have continued their meetings each succeeding Sunday nearly the whole time, and had service read by one of their number. I am not wholly acquainted with the causes that have kept them so long destitute of preaching—it has resulted, probably, from a number of causes combined, which, I have no doubt, may be easily removed, and which, ere long, I trust will be removed.

I last night heard a temperance lecture in this place, delivered by Rev. J. Burchard, of protracted meeting memory. I say a temperance lecture—so it was noticed previously; but I confess I did not considerate it a very temperate lecture. It was not a true Washingtonian lecture. It evinced considerable tact and knowledge of human nature; but was not so fully characterized as I could wish, with that glorious and triumphant spirit which has marked the progress of the temperance cause for a number of years past. Would to Heaven, that no ruthless hand had ever dared to wrest, in any degree, the reform from the only principle which can secure a victory over one of the most mournful evils which ever inflicted its sting upon humanity! But in this instance was freely mingled that dreadful doctrine which one of its own believers said, 'makes some mad and others melancholy.' The doctrine of a personal devil and of endless death, was no scarce article in this theatrical effort. What was quite amusing was, the manner in which he brought in Universalism. He said he thought the temperance reform must succeed and licenses be withheld, because the Universalists all over the land had taken hold of it! He thanked God for it, and said that, in this respect at least, the prophecy was fulfilled that, the lion and lamb should lie down together. Good! But I confess I did not anticipate such a compliment from such a source. But true it is, when the spirit of Universalism takes hold of a measure, it is sure to triumph if permitted to have its legitimate and perfect work. And if the lion is so sensible of the beneficial labors of the lamb, it is to be devoutly hoped that, he will henceforth cease all endeavors to devour and destroy so necessary and important a means in the work of human improvement. I never witnessed in any meeting whatever, so much uproarious laughter, as in this instance, and it was joined in as heartily and with the same zest apparently by the speaker himself, as by the audience. However, I suppose that, that is his way; and as 'every man has a way of his own,' we must not find too much fault. It is hoped that some good will result from this meeting. God bless the temperance cause!

Yours &c.

REV. GEO. G. HAPGOOD.

SIR:—Your public and private attack upon me and my family, and especially the one in your recent discussion in this place, demand from me a passing notice and public reproof. I think I am not mistaken in the supposition that my family was one of the two to which you had reference, when you stated that you had been denied the privilege of praying with the sick in two Universalist families in this village. You evidently have sought to prejudice the public mind against me, and Universalists generally, by stating the circumstance. I regret that this is so. And I still more regret the necessity which compels me to step before the public in vindication of myself and family. And as I can not speak directly to the people whom you addressed, I must resort to this medium of defence. However much you may seek to justify yourself and motives, your conduct appears sadly at fault as a Christian. And let me inquire, if it did not occur to your mind that the candid and reflecting part of community might ask why and how the request should have been denied you? Such requests are not often denied the minister who has the spirit of his Master—whose conduct and character is above reproach—whose Christ-like spirit begets the good will of men—and whose heart is filled with that charity which thinketh no evil. But to the explanation.

You will recollect that you called frequently at my house after my son came home sick. At such times, your frequent harsh and ungenerous expressions against Universalists and Universalism, made no very favorable impressions upon my son's mind. And he lost all confidence in you, when you called at my house last August, to arrange the business respecting some land. Of this you could not have been ignorant. In short your conversation and conduct, for the most part only betrayed, in my son's estimation, the dishonesty—the wolfishness and rottenness of your heart. But further;—you will remember that at one of your calls, you commenced conversation barely touching upon my pecuniary affairs, and then left the subject. You had been repeatedly informed that my funds were exhausted and that I was needy. But in vain did I solicit from you a few dollars which were my due. You seemed not to remember the widow and the fatherless in this way. It appeared much more convenient for you to say to them, be ye fed and clothed, than to pay the demand I had against you. You had prayers for the soul, but could not trouble yourself to obtain a penny for the starving body. Yes, verily it was so,—for you proposed to have a season of prayer, to which proposal I hesitated a moment, and then replied, that I could not request prayer under existing circumstances. You then said, Oh no, you do not request it, but perhaps you are willing. I then told you that perhaps my views respecting the object of your visits to my house might be changed, if you would leave your gift before the altar and go and make reconciliation with your brother. To which remark you made some unsatisfactory answer, and then proposed again to offer a prayer. I again said that my views were not changed upon the subject. But you replied, perhaps your son would like to have prayer. I remarked that if it was his desire I had no objections, and as to that, he could speak for himself. His answer was, that he was not particular. And before closing this letter, I would simply say that my son expressed his willingness to have any one pray with him, who should ask the privilege except yourself.

The public will judge between you and me with reference to your being denied the privilege of praying in my family. If it was any argument against the truth of Universalism, either with or without the above mentioned circumstances, it is all on your side. That you esteemed it so, would appear evident from the fact, that you stated the mere item of being denied the privilege of prayer, in the Methodist E. Church in this place the next Sunday after its occurrence, and also in the recent discussion in this place. Let the candid and impartial judge.

Yours truly,
Mexico, Feb., 1846. LYDIA LAMB.

EXPOSITION.

Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death. Heb. ii: 14, 15.

1. Who are the children mentioned by the great apostle?

1. The tender appellation in the text, (children), denotes the special relation to God, of those about whom the apostle was speaking in this particular discourse. They were God's children in the following senses. First, By creation. 'He hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell upon the face of the whole earth.' Secondly, By providence. 'He openeth his hand and satisfieth the desire of every living thing.' Thirdly, By redemption. Christ, 'by the grace of God tasted death for every man.' Fourthly, By partaking of his moral qualities. Knowledge, power, justice, love, mercy and truth. These are the distinguishing properties of beings created in the image of God. Without these, they could not be accountable. Without these, they could not progress in moral virtue.

2. Those who are thus denoted could not be in a sinless state; for in such case, they would not stand in need of the interposing labors of the great Redeemer for their deliverance.

3. They are represented by a striking characteristic;—partakers of flesh and blood. Men in a mortal state.

4. They appear to be equally the objects of divine goodness, since no distinction is marked by the providence of God, or the revelations of his will concerning them.

5. Their number, moral condition and need of grace, is clearly implied by the death of Christ.—He died for all.

II. What part did Christ take with these children?

1. The human form and constitution. Embracing its entire organization and all its powers.

2. Its various infirmities; all its afflictions—all its crosses and all its pains. 'He was made in all points like unto us, yet without sin.'

3. He took part with us in all the wants, dependencies, passions and desires of the human constitution.

4. He took part in all our temptations, which supposes him to be subjected to the same laws that the children are. 'Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered.'

5. He, like all the children mentioned in the text, was subject to organic dissolution.

III. For what purpose did Christ take part with the children?

1. That he might show forth, by the rectitude of his example, the purity of God's law, and the disposition which dictated this law to man.

2. That he might shine before the world in the light of pure moral example.

3. That by his knowledge he might unfold the dark sayings of prophecy that were uttered from ages then long past, and illuminate the path of hope.

4. That He might effectually and forever destroy him who had the power of moral death, that is the Devil; and destroy and put an end to sin throughout the universe.

5. That through death, he might effect the deliverance of them that were all their lifetime subject to bondage through fear.

IMPROVEMENT.

1. We all stand in the relation of children to God, which admonishes us to regard him as a Father, whom we are bound to love, serve and adore.

2. Our obligations to obey, are not diminished, but enlarged and strengthened by the manifestations of divine love, and the luminous example of Christ.

3. The great end of Christ's mission admonishes us to place our supreme affections on things above, and to live, in this vale of tears, by faith and hope of joys to come, immortal and divine.

JESUS WAS TRUE TO HIMSELF.

The examples of Jesus eminently corresponded with his doctrine. What he did may be regarded not only as benefits immediately conferred, but as tokens of the economy of grace, in its great spiritual work in behalf of man. No lame man ever applied to him, in vain for relief; and never will. No Bartimeus ever supplicated for sight, unheard, or unblest; and no blindness of the soul can ever meet with less success. No penitent sinner inquired after the way of life, but he received the proper directions; nor will Jesus ever cease to direct the seeker. He reproved the opinions of the Pharisees sharply, but his heart was never embittered against the persons or interests of those errorists. So he will continue to be the enemy of error until vice and false doctrine are destroyed; who, then, shall say that he will not continue his love for the errorist, until all such are redeemed?

AN ACT WORTHY OF NOTICE.

A scholar of the Sabbath School attached to the First Universalist Society of Canton, was called on by a Preacher of another order, probably to entice her away to his own S. S., and being inquired of what books the Universalists used, and being requested to show one, brought the Reverend Divine, the Bible!

DEATHS.

In Tonawanda, Dec. 4th, 1845, Mrs. LUCINDA VEDDER, wife of Alexander H. Vedder, and daughter of Adam W. Zimmerman, in the 32d year of her age. She sustained an illness of more than four years, with Christian fortitude and resignation, looking up with confidence to the Giver of all good; and died, firmly believing, that, as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. She has left a husband and three children, besides numerous other relations and friends, to mourn her loss. The funeral sermon was delivered from 1 Cor. xv: 22, by Rev. L. S. Everett.

We weep, for in Death's cold embrace thou art sleeping,
No more shall we gaze on thy love-beaming eye;
We rejoice, for we feel thy blest spirit is keeping
Communion with angels and cherubs on high.

We weep for, we feel that this world will be lonely,
Unblest by thy friendship, uncheered by thy smile;
We rejoice, for the loss is not thine, but ours only;
For thou art rejoicing in heaven the while.

We weep for thy husband, whose fond hopes have perished,
Who hung o'er thy pillow unable to save;
We weep for thy mother, so fondly that cherished,
Who watched o'er thy cradle, and wept o'er thy grave.

We weep for thy little ones tearful and tender;
What heart like a mother's could soothe their distress?
What smile such delight as a mother's could render?
What balm half so sweet as a mother's caress?

We watched o'er thy pillow with hearts that were breaking,
And we strove with our feelings their pangs to conceal,
While thy spirit communion through faith was partaking,
Sweetly blest with the faith by our Saviour revealed.

No more in thy presence we'll spend the dear hours,
Or weep with the thought of thy suffering again;
No more o'er thy pillow we'll strew thy loved flowers,
For now thou art free from earth's trials and pain.

O'er our sad hearts hath fallen the dark blight of sorrow;
No words can disclose the deep loss we deplore;
But thy mem'ry we'll keep, and some joyful to-morrow,
We again hope to meet thee on Heaven's blissful shore.

In Lebanon, on the morning of the 30th of January, Mr. JOSEPH FORD, in the 79th year of his age.

Br. Ford had been for many years a firm and consistent believer in the 'restoration' of the whole human family. His life was in beautiful harmony with the rule, requiring us to deal justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly before God. His worth as an exemplary citizen is spoken of in high terms of praise by all. His family best knew his deep affection as a husband and father. And all classes would do well to imitate and emulate his many virtues, even looking higher than all human models of holy living. May his memory disseminate a hallowed influence among his numerous friends; and may God of his infinite mercy richly bless those who cherish his memory, and who mourn his departure to his final home.

The funeral service was attended at the Universalist church in Lebanon, on the 31st of January, by the writer, aided in the solemn duty by Eld. Jerauld. J. J. A.

APPROXIMATION TO UNITARIANISM—AGAIN.

It will be recollected, that a short time since, we noticed an article from the 'Christian Register'—the Unitarian paper published in Boston, Mass., asserting that Universalists, were rapidly approaching Unitarianism, in their views of a 'righteous retribution,' and in all the 'essentials of doctrine and sentiment.' Our remarks were intended to show by a direct disclaimer on the one hand, and a very brief statement of particulars on the other—that the Editor of the 'Register' was in an error respecting both his assertions. Those remarks were made as the present are—without any feeling of unkindness or disrespect for the Editor of the Register, or any of the members of his denomination, who exhibit the spirit of Christian liberality—but we did, and do still design to rebuke that condescending and patronizing manner and tone, in which Unitarians habitually indulge when speaking of Universalists and Universalism.

In the 'Register' of Feb. 7, inst., but under the editorial head, we have a communication over the signature of Aletheia—devoting more than a column to the reiteration and defence of the Editor's previous assertions. From the position, and the tacit approval of this communication by Mr. Upham, we must hold him responsible for its fallacy.

It is obvious that he intends to perpetuate the impression among Unitarians, that his assertions are correct, by backing them with the quite intelligible assurance that he knows our opinions better than we ourselves do; and by construing our more practical preaching into a progress towards Unitarianism.

We shall leave the assumed change of the views of our ministry in New England, respecting 'future retribution,' in the hands of the Editor of the 'Trumpet,' who has distinctly avowed his conviction, that no denominational change has taken place in relation to that subject. And it will scarcely be pretended, that the minister of another sect, is more competent to become the exponent of the views of Universalists in that region. But in the State of New York, and others except in New England, no controversy has ever existed among us, on the subject of retribution. And while the ministers were generally well aware of each other's views—they were held and preached as they still are, with perfect harmony. It is beyond doubt, that a large majority of the ministers in this State, have always been believers in future retribution—and equally certain that they so preached, before Unitarianism, as such, existed among us. We shall not evoke the memory of the dead, nor call for the specific testimony of the living, in proof of this statement—but we will hold that man a willing dupe to his prejudices who shall again assert the contrary.

But suppose such a change had taken place—does it necessarily imply an approach to Unitarianism? Must every moral and religious movement in the civilized world centre exclusively there? We should as soon suppose that the gravitating nucleus was contained in a nut-shell! There are many older sects who maintain a future retribution,—either limited or endless; and who might perhaps claim with equal propriety, that we were rapidly approaching them in all the essentials of 'doctrine and sentiment.' We are happy to say that we sympathise with Unitarians in several particulars of great moment—but at the same time we are doing our own work, in our own way, entirely irrespective of their opinions—their approval or disapproval. And certainly it must be difficult to imagine, how we can approximate them on a subject which was very generally maintained by us, before they were known to the sects of our country.

Again. It is assumed that a very great change has taken place among us, in our pulpit performances—in relation to the ordinances, and the establishment of Sunday Schools; and that this change is an approach toward Unitarianism. This is cause and effect with a vengeance! As if it were really impossible that a change of circumstances, could have any influence in modifying the character of our pulpit ministrations, without our being at once and forever precipitated into the hands of Unitarians! At this rate, they will at least, find their hands full. But let us examine this subject.

That a great change has really taken place in the particulars named, we most thankfully admit. But the reasons why it has occurred, have no possible relation to the particular usages or dogmas of any existing denomination. Our doctrines were new to the great mass of the population; and so long as our congregations required to be informed what we believed—so long there was a necessity for preaching open and distinctly on doctrinal subjects. As a natural consequence, the ministers, by the frequent contrast of their own views with the obnoxious tenets of opposing sects, acquired a great degree of censoriousness; while at the same time, they attached vast consequence to their own opinions. During all this time however, churches were being organized and the ordinances were regularly administered wherever practicable—and that too, from the first planting of the denomination. As societies and congregations became more permanent, more attention was naturally attracted to their spiritual interests,—and hence, the great increase of churches and augmentation of the number of communicants.

There is probably one fact in relation to the establishment of Sunday Schools among us, which was overlooked by the writer of the article under review—Universalists were a denomination many years before Sunday Schools were known in this country. When first introduced among us by the Calvinistic Congregationalists and Presbyterians—was that measure an approach—a rapid approach toward Unitarianism? If not, why is it assumed, that when our circumstances and our preferences lead us to their introduction into our denomination—we must be supposed to learn their value and importance from that quarter? Are Unitarians the only people under heaven from whom we can learn any thing, and whom we are bound to imitate on peril of expulsion from the common pale of Christian charity? When so many different denominations were giving us lessons on the value of the Sunday school, it seems to betray a want of modesty, to presume that we must exclusively learn of one of the most recent sects among us.

Without the means of certainty, by us, we do not hesitate to avow the belief—that even ten years since, we had a greater number of Sunday schools in the United States, than the Unitarians had at the same time. Since then, our approximation has been so rapid, that we now probably have some twice or three times their number!

We have cheerfully admitted that a great change in the character of our pulpit ministrations, has taken place.—The sermons of the order generally, are not at this time surpassed probably by those of any sect in the country, for spirituality and devotional character—and it is hoped, Christian charity. And they have become so, not because such was the character of the ministry of any other people—but because the condition of our congregations no longer required a different procedure. Similar reasons we have no doubt operated to produce a similar change in the character of the Unitarian ministry. We were for several years, in our young days, a hearer of a distinguished Unitarian clergyman; and recollect the decided doctrinal character of his truly able discourses. He labored the distinctive doctrines of Unitarianism—and belabored Calvinism without stint or remorse. The Unitarian controversy, so termed, while it called out the champions of the unity of God, also induced a course of preaching very strongly marked with the cherished opinions of the respective clergymen. And the asperity with which much of their ministry of that, and even later times is characterised, is such as most Unitarian ministers would now deem improper and unprofitable.

The 'pulpit performances,' of Unitarians, have therefore changed. Whom have they approximated by this change? When they shall be able to answer this question to their own satisfaction,—they will probably discover why, and how, we can modify our ministrations to the wants of the denomination, and become a devotional people without a rapid approach to themselves or others.

'I.'

That God created Man to be lord of this lower world, is a truth which but few if any will dispute; but that he created any one individual of the human race, to lord it over any or all of his fellow beings, is a question which will admit of some doubt. There are two extremes upon which some men are wont to act; not the same man upon both extremes, but some upon the one and some upon the other. The one, is that of an individual supposing himself to be a natural fool and that every body else is wise; but we find but few upon this extreme; but now and then a solitary individual, lamenting the absence of that which is so necessary to the constitution of the human mind. The other extreme, is that of one supposing himself to be the only wise man upon the world, while every body else is a fool, or at least somewhat deficient in common sense; and here we find a multitude, all priding themselves upon their superior abilities; and each one supposing himself to be the sole and only paragon of perfection ever moulded by the plastic hand of Heaven.

There is a story told well, descriptive of those of this latter class; showing the thought uppermost in the mind, and that the reflections of him who acts upon this extreme, are not far removed beyond the circle of his own bulk; that his thoughts are not

'Wont to stray

Far as the Solar Walk or Milky-way.'

The story is upon this wise—An individual, some twenty-five or thirty years since, was fortunate enough to secure a seat in the legislative halls of this State. Whether this mark of confidence and esteem was extended to him because his constituents supposed him to be a man of real worth, or because he had the wherewith to purchase rum, by which to enlist men in his favor, is a point upon which the reader must be his own judge. But certain it is, that there are now two ways in which men may reach the temple of Fame; or at least secure a seat in the halls of the Legislature. The one, is by superior intellectual abilities; abilities which show to a demonstration that their possessor is a statesman of no ordinary make; that he is able to stand at the helm of the ship of State, and guide it safely over the troubled waters. One possessing such abilities, if not very unfortunate in some other points of view, may be one of the favored few set apart to enact laws; for the purpose of making rogues, and then punishing them after they are made! The other way, in which one may accomplish the object of his wishes by reaching the legislative halls, is through the influence of rum, the great auxiliary to political principle; the pure spirit and strength relied upon by those political demagogues who have so much anxiety for the welfare and perpetuity of the government. The recollection is now fresh in the mind, of an individual ascending to a high and important station in the political world; and whose election was sounded abroad as a great triumph; a triumph of principle, when in fact the individual was elected by only one majority, and that one vote bought with a pint of whiskey! But to the story.

The man had secured a seat in the chamber of Representatives, and his fellows soon found him to be of that class, the members of which seldom have but one idea in their heads—self! Whenever any new bill was spoken of, or any suggestion made, he would always observe:—'Well, I was just thinking of that myself.' With him this was a stereotype phrase; in reference to all subjects and upon all occasions, it was the same; 'well, I was just thinking of that myself.' At last it became not only disgusting to many of his own political creed, but absolutely unendurable; and they determined not only to compel him to abolish 'I myself,' but also to have a joke out of the way of accomplishing the wondrous feat. In furtherance of the work, a 'caucus' was appointed to be held at one of the public houses, and of course this hero had a special invitation to attend. After smoking a few 'long nines,' besides emptying a few bottles of Jamaica, for the benefit of the public, or public-an, the meeting commenced in due form by choosing a chairman and appointing a secretary. A motion was found on the table, laid there by some unknown hand, recommending the presentation of a bill to the legislature, to remove the Salt Works and establish them upon Albany Hill. No sooner was the last word of the motion out of the secretary's mouth, ere the gentleman in question, bounded like a kangaroo, his head shot forward and his finger sticking direct into the face of the moderator, and bawled out at the top of his voice: 'Mr. Chairman, I was just thinking of that myself, and about to make the motion'—Poor fellow, he had fallen headlong into the pit which had been dug for him. After he had blown off a sufficient quantity of wind, of which legislative members are wont to have no small supply, he resumed his seat to await the effect of the powerful effort so fortunately made. The suspense was not long, ere a gentleman rose and said that he would propound one question, which he wished the gentleman last up to answer. If the legislature should receive the bill favorably and grant the removal of the Salt Works to Albany Hill, where would the water be obtained out of which to manufacture the salt? All eyes were upon the 'pronoun' gentleman; he winced a little; there was a slight curl of the upper lip, as if in utter indignation of evening 'caucuses' for the public weal; and somewhat mortified to think that the old edition would not answer, came out with a corrected copy: 'Well, I had not thought of that!' 'Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof,' saith the good book; and surely, sufficient unto this evil was the correction thereof. There was no farther necessity for rebuke; 'I myself' became less officious during the remainder of the session, showing by the shade of regret which came over his visage, that he had fallen from the pinnacle of his glory!

'I' is an important letter, and had the founder of written language left it from the catalogue, there are not a few who would have been in a bad fix; without a substitute, perfectly nonplussed! With many it is the soul of thought; the heart of reflection; the constantly present and great I-dea: standing first and foremost in all considerations; and being the chief aim and object of all toil. And woe to him that dare treat it with disrespect! Woe to him who would even presume to jostle it! Woe to the man who would endeavor to counteract its influence or circumscribe its importance! He might better beard a lion even, or have a millstone hung about his neck and be cast into the sea, than to lay a straw in the pathway of the pronoun, 'first person singular!' First person, i. e. a person of more importance than any other person; first in consequence; first in ability; first in every thing worthy of the human character! 'Singular,' i. e. there is but one such individual. 'I' am that one, and 'you' must stand in the rear rank. Does the reader doubt this? Skeptical man! view the thoughts which are written out for the consideration of the world, and observe the number who do not attach more importance to themselves, than to their various subjects. That number in comparison with those upon the other side, is indeed but small. 'I' is first and foremost with a great majority of all classes; throughout all grades, ranks, and conditions of men; in all stations in which men are placed, a majority may be found of the same mind; the one thought, with now and then an exception, is the same, from the king on his gilt-covered throne—might it not be said, guilt-covered?—down to the cobbler upon the bench, in deep meditation upon the sole!

Let the sacred desk be observed, and too many will be found there, somewhat wanting in becoming humility; too frequently 'I' stands first in importance. If there is a situation in society in which one should be humble and unassuming, it is that of the public promulgator of the Gospel. An overbearing selfishness is far beneath the dignity which should be attached to the Christian ministry, and highly unbecoming the true character of a herald of the Cross. The Apostle is careful to inform us, that he and his fellow laborers preached not themselves, 'but Christ Jesus the Lord'; but unlike the worthy promulgators of the Gospel in olden time, many are now found who have departed from the course so plainly marked out, and if it is not heard in words, appearance speaks plainly: 'I preach myself, and you are my servants, for my sake.' And it is a source of serious regret, that the influence thus exerted upon the members of community, is such as to bring disrespect upon the cause of the Redeemer, for there are none but what will readily observe how unbecoming the spirit of Christianity, is such an overbearing selfishness, so far from that spirit which ever does and ever will find a dwelling place in the heart of the humble religionist.

Again—Step into the sanctuary of public worship, and listen awhile to the discourses and exhortations of that philanthropic individual who is engaged in that 'protracted effort' for the salvation of immortal souls, and there again may be found that precious and ever to be remembered 'I.' The terrors of an endless hell of fire and brimstone, or something more dreadful, are portrayed in all their frightful colors; day after day, and night after night, the same theme is dwelt upon, and though with seeming outward sorrow, yet with an inward delight.—The sinner; the poor sinner, or rather, the rich sinner, i. e. rich in this world's goods, so if converted he can give a good bonus to the church, is pointed to that eternal ruin, upon the brink of which he is now standing; is told that 'God has long waited to be gracious,' that his mercy will endure but for a little while longer, and that soon the sword of justice will fall with all of its tremendous vengeance, and his dreadful doom be fixed for eternity. But how is it with the revivalist? Would he cast off his brother man beyond the reach of mercy? Would he have no compassion upon the individual, though that individual might be exceeding sinful? Not he, for he is sure to tell the sinner, that were the power in his hands, he would purify him from all iniquity and save him with an everlasting salvation. He would go even farther than this; were the power in his hands, he would redeem the whole human race from all sin, and bring them home to heaven and to God. 'I' would do it, but God will not, is the substance, if not the very language of the revivalist's profession. Hence, what a pity it is, and how unfortunate to mankind, that 'I' was not seated upon the everlasting throne! Pardon the thought; but traced out and such is the conclusion which must inevitably follow from the words of the revivalist—that his love for the members of the human family, is far greater than that of that being who is Love. It may be the result of an over anxious desire, that his hearers may not be unmindful of what he is doing, and would do for them, that such information is ever kept full in view, by him who is laboring for the salvation of the world. Be this as it may, 'I' is the first object, and all other things must take at least the second rank. There is a dignity of no little importance, in self-examination at least, and it is common among men!

It is indeed amusing to observe the ways of mankind! to stand a little on one side, or perhaps in the back ground somewhat, and contemplate the movements which are made and the motive power to action. There is now and then a generous, noble-hearted soul, whose mind is of no ordinary mould, and who is willing that others should enjoy a share in those blessings which Heaven has bestowed upon the world. God bless them! Would that there were more such, for upon them, and upon their efforts, society is dependent for its peace and perpetuity. But there are a multitude of 'I's' who can see nothing, and care for nothing, and will do nothing, which will not at once contribute directly and immediately to their own aggrandizement. God pity them, for surely they stand in need of pity.

MEDITATION.

'My heart was hot within me; while I was musing, the fire burned; then spake I with my tongue.' Ps. xxxix: 3.

The words which head this article, were spoken by David. They, in connection with the context, indicate that he was musing upon what course he should pursue in the presence of his enemies; how he should bear his troubles; what his constitution was; how frail and short were his days. His heart was warm with this musing—and as his thoughts grew strong, truth burned within him, until he could no longer keep silence, and in an audible voice, he communed with God about the themes which occupied his meditation. The result of this communion is given in the remainder of the Psalm; whose instruction all can examine at their leisure. It will repay examination.

My object in quoting the passage, is simply to get at the principle upon which it is founded, viz., the power which man possesses of calling up facts in his mind, and of reflecting, meditating, musing concerning them; for it was by this power that David mused upon the circumstances in which he was placed.

That quality of the mind is wonderful, by which man can call up, by the aid of memory, ideas of things and events; consider all their circumstances, their results, and their bearing on the drama of life. To this power of memory and reflection, there is, as it were, no past time nor future—for with this power, man can transport himself to past events and in a manner witness their passage; and by judging from what has been, and relying upon prophecy, can see events which are not yet, become present facts, and then past history. An individual may be sitting as motionless as a statue, and apparently without thought. Yet, though there may be no outward evidence of its truth, his mind may be in most active labor, calling up wondrous scenes in succession, like a continued vision of all the events of life. His body may be rooted to one spot—that spot may be in a far wilderness, away from every human eye—and thick darkness may be upon him—but his active mind will create its own light and people its own solitude. From that spot, his mind can traverse all climes with the rapidity of thought, and by the aid of history and experience, behold all events. While reflection will show him the consequences of these events, and their connection with the wonderful chain of human existence. He can stand amid the snows and ices of the Poles of the earth—he can behold the magnificence which grows in the fires of the tropical sun—he can walk with the panting caravan over burning deserts—he can wander over the trackless ocean or sail on wide rivers—and he can dwell in vast cities. He can follow Alexander the Great in all the wonders of his conquests—he can trace the visible causes which have carried men forward on the resistless tide of civilization and improvement which have changed the face of the earth—he can see the first stone used in the foundation of imperial Rome; watch it through all the successive stages of its stupendous growth, until it stretched its arms over the world and subdued it to its dominion; and he can trace out the corrupting influences which dimmed its glory, destroyed its power, and brought it to the dust in ruins—he can look into the causes which peopled this country from Europe; can stand with the pilgrims on Plymouth rock; can watch them in all their struggles with the lurking foe and the sturdy forest; can see the planting of the principles which enter into all our institutions; can discover the causes, labors, and toils which resulted in our becoming a free nation; and can follow out the influence which our country is pouring upon the kingdoms of the earth. Thus, in his mind, he can travel the world and behold its wondrous scenes—and that too without moving a muscle or departing from the spot on which his body stands.

Yet, the power we have thus feebly adverted to, is more or less the property of every individual. By storing the mind with various knowledge and strengthening its habit of reflection, it may become warm with thought and be illuminated with the fire which will make it a constant traveller over the world of past, present, and future events.

There are stories whose basis is a dreamy fiction of past ages, in which a Jew is spoken of as being incapable of death, who, for long and weary centuries, has visited all climes and witnessed the passing events of successive generations. What this Jew is represented as having done, is really true of individual minds. For in the mind, with eyes and feet of history, we can travel into the past, and behold people whose bodies have perished forever, and see all the striking scenes with which they were connected.

We can behold the wickedness of the antediluvians; the building of the ark; the awful horrors of the flood; the upheaval of the beds of former oceans, as future inhabitable land; the increase of people as they diverged from the confusion of Babel and settled in various portions of the earth; and the growth, strength, and decay to downfall of mighty empires and kingdoms. We can see the troubles of the Jews in the Egyptian brickyards; the slaying of the first-born of every Egyptian family; the passage of the chosen people through the divided waters of the Red Sea, and the destruction of Pharaoh's hosts;—we can trace them in all their wanderings through the wilderness, until their settlement in Palestine; all the varied events of their history after that settlement; and their hanging their harps on the willows by the Euphrates, as, in Babylonian captivity, they mourned for the burning of their holy city and temple—we can look upon their restoration to the land of their fathers; upon the siege of their city by the fierce legions of Rome; upon the destruction of it and its splendid temple by fire; upon their captivity and their scattered condition among all nations—we can trace them through all their toils and troubles, until they stand before us at the present age, a signal instance of the truth of prophecy.

We can look upon the corruptions, blood, cruelty, and vices of ancient heathenism; and upon the relentless spirit and wicked conduct of haughty Pharisees and the bigoted skepticism of arrogant Sadducees. In the midst of these, we can see the humble man of Nazareth, who, abjuring all political power and the use of arms, yet labored to establish a system for the reformation of the world. We can walk by his side, and witness his miracles, hear his simple, subduing discourses, and wonder at his wisdom, his spotless character, his unflinching courage, and his undying love—we can stand with him before Pilate; see his treatment by the soldiers; go with him to Calvary; behold him nailed to the cross between two thieves; and as our blood boils within us at the mocking and jeering of his foes, and our desire for revenge arises for power to crush them, we can witness the noblest feature in the Saviour's character, as like the music of heaven, we hear the prayer of forgiveness issuing from his lips.

We can see his system, made strong by his blood and his death, commencing its career of influence on the Pentecostal day; can see it in all its struggles with the powers of paganism and of bloody persecutions; can see the heathen forsaking their falling altars and temples, to sit at the feet of the Saviour; can see it multiplying its converts, until a professed follower of the Lamb filled the throne of the Roman Empire. We can discover the corruptions which successively crept into the Christian church, until truth was buried far beneath the accumulated rubbish of the dark ages, and Christian character was lost in the vices of ignorance. We can behold the growth of those causes, which, concentrating their power in the efforts of the noble men who led the way to the Reformation, resulted in bringing up truth and virtue from their grave, that they might go forth and destroy error and vice—we can watch that truth, as it destroys creed after creed, irresistibly attracts inquiring minds to the doctrine of the cross, and elevating them above the slavery of opinion, makes them bold in searching the oracles of God.—We see it the companion of kings, the friend of the humble, the triumph of virtue, and the vivid hope of the dying. We can trace it into future, earthly periods, and under its influence, see the armed ship turned into a peaceful trader; the warlike soldier turned into a man of quiet; and changing the clang of war into the hum of industry—until the earth, in all its wide dominions, becomes filled with the divine principles of Friendship, Love, and Truth.

All these are absorbing subjects. And yet mind, strong with knowledge and reflection, can travel among them thoroughly, and discover their vast influence over human affairs and civilization. And as mind muses upon them in the warmth of thought, desire will become a brilliant flame in leading man upward and onward in knowledge; until, with an understanding instructed in the works of God, he worships Him from whom all knowledge emanates.

G. W. MONTGOMERY.

COVERING UP INIQUITY.

We have received from Mr. James McAllister of Groton, Tompkins county, a long communication in relation to his wife's connection with the Methodist church in that place, the treatment she received from its members and preachers, and the iniquities practiced by those who controlled its action. But from the length of the article, the crowded state of our columns, and the particularly local character of the subject, we do not deem it advisable to publish it; though we doubt not the correctness of his version of the affair and the serious injustice and grievance committed against his family.

It seems his wife joined the Methodist Episcopal church some three or four years since, and they were highly elated at the time, on account of supposing she had previously been favorable to Universalism. She occasionally reproved the members for their iniquities; this offended the individuals, and they took frequent occasions to injure and annoy her. Conspicuous among them was a man by the name of Hall. They finally stole her overshoes at a meeting—whether to appropriate them to their own use or merely to annoy her, does not appear—Difficulties multiplied, till she desired a public investigation of the matter. This, our correspondent says, they dared not allow; for 'It would uncover a sink of sin and filth that lay covered by falsehood and deception.' They told her she must not accuse her neighbors of the theft of her shoes, &c. Finding no investigation would be allowed, she requested a letter of dismission and recommendation from the church, which the preacher in charge readily promised. But instead of fulfilling, he, at the close of a meeting some weeks afterwards, stated that Mrs. McA. wished to withdraw from the church if there was no objection. None being made, he then pronounced her 'no longer a member of the church;' and by the instigation, or through fear of the pious Mr. Hall, refused to give her the promised letter. In relation to her difficulties, or by way of removing her objections to communing with two or three of the members who had abused and injured her, one of the members remarked that he would commune with the devil before he would be kept from the table; (and our correspondent says, 'by his actions that day I believe he would.') Our correspondent intimates that the author of a notorious work, entitled, 'A house upon the sand,' had a 'finger in the pie' during the latter part of the business; and was quite averse to having the matter investigated, or probed to the bottom. He thinks that too many of the members of that Church, both preachers and laymen, 'love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil.' 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' D. S.

LIBERALITY OF METHODISTS.—The Methodist Episcopal General Conference, at a late session, passed a resolution that Universalists be excluded hereafter from preaching or holding meetings in all or any of their meeting-houses. In many places Universalists have helped to build their houses, and had solemn contracts with them for the occasional or stated occupancy of them: yea, in some instances Universalists have built the most of them; and yet this clerical (for their laws are all enacted by the clergy) resolution, tells the members they must shut their doors against us! Reader, which is this, Christianity, or Methodism? Not the former, most certainly.

Br. Tompkins—In No. 3, current volume, I directed you to send Wheeler Truesdell current volume of the Quarterly, credit him and charge me $2.00. He says he has not received the Jan. No. Please attend to this matter.

INSANITY PRODUCED BY RELIGIOUS ERROR.

From all the Reports of Lunatic Asylums published of late years, the fact stands out in bold relief that one of the most fruitful sources of insanity is religious error. But true religion never makes people insane. Christ nor his apostles, nor their preaching ever drove one soul to insanity. On the contrary, they cured it wherever it existed. Christ's religion in its purity cures, modern religion (Orthodoxy so called) occasions insanity. The 'Star in the West,' in noticing the 7th annual Report of the Ohio Lunatic Asylum, says,

'The total number of admissions during the last seven years is 691 and of these 70 were made insane from religious causes; in other words, from the fear of future torment; for nearly or quite all, it is presumed, lost their reason from the fiery representations of those preachers who call themselves orthodox. Only 48 became insane from intemperance, showing after all that is said and truly so, about the frightful influence of rum drinking, that endless misery is a more prolific source of insanity if not of suffering in general.

'But in the period above specified there were 548 applications which were refused for want of room. Of this number we might probably safely say sixty became insane from religious excitement, making a total of one hundred and thirty, whose minds were destroyed, as we suppose, by false dogmas palmed off by ministers as being truths of the Gospel! In view of these solemn facts—the wreck made of human intellect—the families destroyed and the children scattered and beggared, does it not become every friend of truth to throw his whole influence and put forth his utmost energies in favor of that cause which alone can stay the wide spread evil?'

THE MIRACLES OF JESUS.

Miracles were wrought by Christ, not only by way of establishing the validity of his mission, but for the most benevolent of purposes. Never to gratify any ambitious desire of his own, nor the idle curiosity of the multitude, did he exert his miraculous power. When the great Forerunner sent to him from his prison with the inquiry, 'Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?'—he returned for the answer, 'Go and shew John the things that ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight and the lame walk; the lepers are cleansed; and the deaf hear; the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them.' And so it was—every miracle of Jesus was a miracle of mercy. Not one was wrought to purchase for himself a single moment's ease, nor a single luxury, nor to make his own mission-path more smooth; but all for the alleviation of suffering and sorrow around him, and to lessen the amount of human misery and woe. They possessed, therefore, 'an internal evidence of their verity, and of his divine power.'

He rests his claims here, and here the Christian may rest them. No need of labored argument—no need of accumulated proofs—the entire claim of Jesus and his religion rests on the great fact of his miracles of mercy and love. "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not."

MATTHEW HALE SMITH.

This notorious reviler and libeller of our most holy faith, we understand, after a vain effort to get elected Chaplain in Congress, has so far imposed on the people of Washington, as to 'get a call' to settle there as pastor of the second Presbyterian society. Having accomplished this preliminary arrangement, he is immediately 'at his old tricks again,'—is on a visit to Richmond to edify the good people there with his great light on Universalism. We have just received a letter from Br. A. C. Barry, under date of 'Richmond, Feb. 12th,' in which he says:

Br. SKINNER—We have just learned that the notorious M. H. Smith is in town, and that he will commence his attack on Universalism and Universalists next Monday evening in Dr. Plumer's church. We are prepared, however, for his descent, and have the fullest confidence, that in this, as in every other instance, the wrath of man will be made to praise God—that the unholy and mad efforts of our enemies will work for the advancement of our glorious cause—of our most precious faith.

The society in this city is moderately prospering—rent and distracted as it was, union and harmony now prevail in the midst thereof, and we sincerely believe that the dawning of a brighter day is at hand.

We suppose Matthew has now found the right climate—that at Nashua did not agree with him; after his dis-mission. He tried to find a society in Maine and several other States that would furnish the right climate; but did not succeed. Climate is very important with him.

Br. J. Stebbins of Hume.

We received, sometime since, a communication from Br. J. Stebbins of Hume, complaining of a cruel and unmanly attack made upon him by a writer in the Luminary, on account of the article we published from him in No. 45 of last Vol. of Magazine and Advocate, relative to the meeting-house and situation of our cause in that place, which article last received has by some means got mislaid or lost. As far as we recollect, he corrected the misstatements of his assailant, and complained of the editor of that paper for admitting such an attack upon him in its columns, and then refusing him an opportunity to reply in the same medium. We know nothing about the circumstances of the case, but what we gather from these communications. But judging from these we are led to believe Br. Stebbins has labored for the good of the cause with true devotion and a self-sacrificing spirit. And as to the attack made upon him in the columns of the paper referred to, we think, from the horrible murdering of the English language which it exhibits he has nothing to fear from its influence among intelligent readers. Br. S. made no attack upon others in the article which we published. Why then should others assail him with bitterness and falsehood, and seek to injure him only for the zeal he manifested in his efforts to advance the good of the cause? We can not understand the reason nor see the Christianity of this. D. S.

CHRIST—THE OBJECT AND SUCCESS OF HIS MISSION.—A Christmas sermon, delivered in Aurora, N. Y., 1845. By Rev. S. Goff. This is a 12mo. pamphlet of 24 pages. It is written in a beautiful, yet plain and forcible style, and happily adapted to the occasion on which it was delivered. The author's text is Gen. xlix: 10, and he clearly exhibits the doctrine of the ultimate universal ingathering, and final holiness and happiness of the great family of man, through Christ, the true, Shiloh or Teacher, the Head of every man, and the Saviour of the world.

DEDICATION.—We learn from the Universalist Union, that the new Universalist meetinghouse lately erected at Stanford, Ct., was dedicated to the worship of the one true God on the 5th of Feb. ult. The sermon on the occasion was delivered by Br. S. B. Britton, Brs. C. H. Gardner, J. N. Parker, and Halleck, the present pastor, taking parts in the services. A Conference meeting was held after the dedication, and several other preachers present; and a most interesting season enjoyed. The cause is highly prosperous and the society in a most flourishing condition.

A Universalist church of forty members has lately been gathered in Harvard, Mass. There is a good society and meetinghouse there and Br. G. Proctor is the pastor.

The Universalists of Gainesville have purchased a meetinghouse of the Presbyterians, and dedicated it to the universal Father.

A Universalist Missionary is wanted at Carlton Place, Merrickville, Ramsey and Dalhousie, Canada West.

Br. John Gregory has received and accepted an invitation to locate in Chittenden county, Vt., and will preach alternately in Burlington and Williston, making the latter place his residence.

Our thanks are due to Hon. T. Jenkins for valuable Congressional speeches and documents.

Br. L. B. Mason, recently of Albany in this State, has received and accepted an invitation to take the pastoral charge of the Universalist society in Lebanon, N. H. We are sorry to lose the valuable labors of Br. Mason in the Empire State; but we trust he will not be less useful in N. H. and that he will do much good in his new location.

Our friend M. A. Sherman is informed that the poetry he sends us for publication is very incorrectly written; and moreover, was published in this paper a number of years ago, under the title of 'The Wheat and the Tares.'

'CATALOGUE OF WORKS IN REFUTATION OF METHODISM, from its origin in 1729, to the present time: of those by Methodist authors on lay-representation, Methodist Episcopacy, &c., &c., and of the political pamphlets relating to Wesley's Calm Address to our American Colonies; compiled by H. C. DeCanver. Philadelphia: John Pennington, 1846.'

This a large octavo pamphlet of 54 pages, elegantly printed on splendid paper and type, and contains a list of 277 Anti-Methodist Works—55 by Methodist authors, 82 Miscellaneous, and 20 Political—exclusive of numerous anti-Methodist essays occurring in British and American periodical literature, and of a number of pamphlets not now extant, and which have been destroyed. The compiler states that many of those which he has enumerated are 'very rare, owing to their having been bought up and suppressed by the Methodists.' We have no doubt this Catalogue will be of great interest and value to those who wish to see a full exposure of the corrupt and priestly hierarchy of Methodism; and as little doubt that the Methodist priesthood will wish the compiler of it in Tophet.

'A CLASS BOOK FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, containing a correct system for keeping the entire records of each Sabbath, the name, age, and residence of each scholar, and a blank form for making a report at the end of each term: with general directions for the proper management of schools. By Wm. S. Balch. Second edition. Published by C. L. Stickney, 140 Fulton street, N. York, 1846.'

Such is the title and character of a neat little book just sent us by the publisher; we think it a very useful work of its kind.

CATALOGUE OF THE LIBRARY BELONGING TO CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE, Clinton, Oneida county, N. Y., Jan. 1846. 12mo, pp. 24. The above catalogue has just been published at this office, and is ready for distribution, by and among the friends of the Institute. It embraces a list of over 1200 volumes, many of them among the most interesting and valuable works extant. Indeed we were not before aware of the extent and value of this Library. It is true the works are not all of them as valuable as could be desired, nor are all the works here which we could desire to see in the Library. But it is certainly a good beginning, and a foundation, which, if continued to be built upon, will ultimately make it of inestimable value to the students attending the Institute. Indeed it is so already. Let the friends every where, who have them to spare, donate valuable and interesting works, and make it a Athenaeum worthy our growing denomination.

LITTLE HYMNS AND PICTURES FOR LITTLE CHILDREN.—This is a neat little pamphlet of 32 pages, lately published in Boston, by Br. James M. Usher; and as its title would imply, is designed to interest, instruct and edify little children. The Hymns are mostly written by D. H. J., D. K. L., H. B., and M. A. D., and are very pretty.

We are indebted to Mr. G. N. Beesley for the March No. (3 Vol. 28) of Graham's AMERICAN MONTHLY MAGAZINE. THE CROSS.

'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.'—Luke ix: 23.

But what is the Cross? Is it bars at right angles?
Or is it the tree on which Jesus was slain?
Or is't symbol'd in gold ornamented with spangles
On the breast of you fair one attached to a chain?

Ah, no! 'tis a curb on our turbulent passions,
A rein on the powers that lead us astray,
To bind down the soul to this world and its fashions,
And lure us from wisdom and virtue away.

'Tis a friend sent from heaven, on purpose to free us
From the state of a slave that is galled by his chain;
'Tis the herald of Liberty long to see us Restored to our rights and to freedom again.

'Tis a guide to the pilgrim, appointed to lead us,
From the world's barren hills to the valley of peace,
Where the Shepherd immortal will shelter and feed us,
Who cares for the flock, but regards not the fleece.

'Tis the strong one that casts out the strong man in armor, Makes a spoil of his goods and restores the domain.
'Tis the Fan, in the hand of the heavenly Farmer,
That winnows our chaff off and leaves us the grain.

'Tis the axe which the husbandman, purely from kindness,
Applies to the root of bramble and brier—
To nature's wild branches, which man in his blindness,
Would shield from the cutter and save from the fire.

But who can be blind to the value of treasures
In mercy so richly extended to man?
'Tis the vot'ry of folly in search of low pleasures,
Which fade as we seize them and die in our hand.

Thrice blessed even now tho' in life's lowest station,
The Christian who sits at the feet of his Lord,
With joy bears his cross through the scene of probation,
Crown'd with peace, here, the pledge of his final reward.

The following exposition of the pious labors and devout propensities of that noted religious mountebank, Jacob Knapp, is taken from the Erie Observer of the 7th inst.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Published by request.

Albany, January 19, 1846.

FRIEND FARRAR:—Dear Sir—Yesterday, for the first time, I had the privilege of hearing the famous Elder Knapp, and a statement which he made during his evening discourse, induces me to address you, and, if possible, ascertain its truth. He, of course, as is his custom, slandered and abused the Universalists, calling their doctrines the creeds of demons and of devils. But I do not complain of this—truth may be abused, but it can not be crushed. The following is his statement, in his own words, as near as I can remember.

'Some time since, a Universalist minister by the name of Gifford came into Erie, Pa., and AS THE PEOPLE ARE VERY IGNORANT THERE, he soon raised up a large society—they thought it a fine doctrine; but I went there to preach (I think he said at a camp meeting,) and on the first evening I had occasion to speak of the Universalists as they deserve, when Gifford rose up and contradicted me.' I told him we could not be interrupted—and then we turned to praying for him. I prayed that he might be converted, or if he had sinned away the day of grace, and was bound for damnation, that God might seal his lips and never suffer him to speak again. Gifford followed me out and said he would interfere every night I meddled with Universalism, but Gifford never spoke after that. At first he could whisper but could not speak aloud. God cut his speech off that he might not serve the devil any more, by preaching his doctrine of demons. Gifford went to Boston, or somewhere at the north to recover his speech, but as I came from Pittsburgh, he had returned, but had not recovered his speech, and can not even whisper, now. God has stopped his mouth entirely.'

The foregoing is the substance of his remarks, and very nearly literal. If it be true, the day of miracles is not passed. You can make use of this letter as you please; I have no motive but to ascertain the truth. Yours very truly,

A. H. CRAGIN.

Erie, Pa., January 29, 1846.

Mr. F. F. FARRAR:

Dear Sir—I have examined a letter written to yourself by a gentleman of Albany, rehearsing some story as told in a revival meeting in Albany by a certain Elder Jacob Knapp, respecting Rev. H. Gifford, Universalist clergyman of Erie, Pa.

As you desire, I cheerfully engage in correcting the misrepresentations of Elder Knapp. I am fully able to do so, having been in the habit of daily intercourse with Rev. Gifford, ever since he came to Erie as pastor of the Universalist society.

It is true Rev. H. Gifford has lost his voice. It is also true, that, on account of the weakness and gradual failure of his voice, he had ceased to preach for some time before Elder Knapp came to Erie to get up a revival. He sensibly felt a failure of voice for over three years.

An account of Br. Gifford's labors will enable you to judge whether Elder K.'s prayers, or some other more natural cause, had the power to produce this effect. He was in the habit of preaching occasionally four or five times a week, at a distance of from ten to forty miles from Erie—in addition to his pulpit labors on the Sabbath in Erie, suffering much from exposure to our climate, with its severe lake winds. These winds affected him injuriously from the time of his first arrival here. Besides, he held a discussion the fall previous, which lasted eight days. In the evenings the church was extremely crowded—the air being hot, foul, and oppressive. Speaking with great earnestness (as was always his custom) he would become covered with perspiration, and at the close thoughtlessly venture out in the cold air to return home without waiting a sufficient time to properly prepare himself for a change of atmosphere. By these means he caught a severe cold and was so much exhausted by his efforts, that it was with the utmost difficulty he was able to preach that winter, i. e. the winter previous to Elder K.'s coming here. A few months previous to Knapp's arrival, a physician told him that if he was not more careful of his lungs, and did not avoid exposure to the lake winds, he would be carried off by a quick consumption. I was told the same thing by another physician.—Thus you can see how powerful are Elder Knapp's prayers.

When Knapp came here, he preached for the first time on Sabbath afternoon. I attended. He shamefully abused the Unitarians. From what I had learned of the character of the man, I felt assured it was but the prelude to a more violent abuse of the Universalists in the evening. Being entirely unable to speak myself, so as to be heard by the congregation, owing to a pulmonary disease, I saw Br. Gifford and urgently solicited him to attend with me, and if he slandered us, to expose him at the outset of his abusive career. Br. G. wished not to go, pleading his inability to speak, and the exertion it would cost him to do so. He finally consented. We were not disappointed in our expectations of receiving abuse. Accordingly, at the close of the meeting after the benediction was pronounced, Br. G. arose and addressed the meeting in the few following words. 'I respectfully request permission to correct some statements that have been made against Universalists and Universalism this evening.' Elder K. immediately beckoned to the people to pass out, which they slowly did, and then directed the choir to sing. He knew that to give permission to Br. G. to speak, would be to expose his falsehoods to all the people.

As he came down from the pulpit I accosted him and appealed to him as a Christian and a gentleman—as a professed follower and preacher of the truth—to permit us to be heard in defence; and if he had told the truth he need not fear investigation. The only word of reply he made to my respectful appeal, was the constant use and repetition of the following polite and refined phrases: 'You are going to hell—you'll be damned—you'll be suffocated in fire and brimstone—you'll go to HELL!' Meaning by the word 'hell,' I suppose, a place of endless misery, although he did not say so. When we were talking, Br. Gifford stepped up and a few words passed between him and Knapp—Knapp all the time pale and trembling. We then passed out into the vestibule, and there, among the crowd who were looking on, I again appealed to him, and received in reply language similar to that used before. Noticing his confusion from being exposed before so many, I ventured to suggest to him, that he was in hell then, at that moment. He was determined to pass out and suffer exposure no longer there; having the same way to go I kept pace with him until he suddenly dodged into a house by the way. I assert positively that Br. Gifford never attended Elder K.'s meeting but this one time. I attended his meeting the next evening about ten or fifteen minutes and left; being satisfied that we had exposed him effectually, I never again attended.

The Universalist society is intelligent, large, flourishing and united. They have nearly finished and paid for a most beautiful church edifice.

The Baptist society is pretty much as it was before Elder Knapp came among them.

When Knapp was in Erie he told a story about Father Ballou. We wrote to Boston, and Br. Whittemore, of the Trumpet, pronounced and published it a falsehood, and called upon each and all of the Baptist preachers of Boston, personally by name, to deny the truth of his statement if they could. They have not done it. The article was published here, and his friends have not to this day vindicated the Elder from the charge of falsehood. The Elder himself has been through Erie on his way to and from Pittsburgh, and did not relieve himself from the charge. He made indeed, a very flitting stay in Erie.

It may be as well to remark here—in order to fully show his propensity to slander Universalism—that he (Elder Knapp) likewise made a declaration injurious to the religious reputation of the church, and an individual (N. M. Woodruff) connected with it, in Watertown, N. Y. There were two or three individuals living in Erie who resided there at the time the affair was said to have occurred. They knew it was false. However, one of them, H. Cadwell—wrote on to Watertown and obtained from a gentleman of the most undoubted integrity and excellent reputation, an affidavit taken before a Justice of the Peace, declaring the whole story to be false. The affidavit is now in his possession. Sufficient had been published to show up the man, therefore this affidavit, not being received until afterwards, was never published.

ORIGINAL SERMON.*

Preached in Slab City, (Livonia,) Jan. 11, 1846, on the occasion of the death of DECATUR HOLDEN, son of J. A. Holden, who died in Galesburg, Mich., Nov. 8, 1845, aged 30.

BY REV. O. ROBERTS.

(Published by Request.)

'For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me.'—Job xix: 25-27.

We have met here on an occasion of mourning to impart to the afflicted some of the consolations of truth derived from the language of Job just read. This passage is thought by some to be one of the most obscure in all the Old Testament writings.—This supposed obscurity is one of the chief reasons why I have chosen the language on the present occasion. I wish to offer some remarks by way of elucidation; for my object is not only to comfort, but also to enlighten the sorrowing, by adding to their stock of biblical knowledge. Another object is, the passage rightly understood contains truths applicable to the circumstances and the occasion which have called us together. Though the original ideas intended to be conveyed by these words are supposed by some to be wrapped in profound mystery, yet to my mind they are easy of solution, and what is not least, contain, or set forth, one of the most important lessons ever presented to the Christian learner.

One of the principal reasons, as I conceive, why this passage is not more clearly understood, (and it is the same why a great many others are not,) is the fact, that we are almost irresistibly impelled to lean towards that sense of a passage which favors most our most cherished views. For instance, we believe most devoutly in the doctrine of a future life; we love that doctrine so ardently, and cherish it so affectionately, that we wish to bring every word and every sentence into our service which affords any evidence of that doctrine. We wish to give up no passage which affords any light upon that momentous subject. And here in the passage before us we find that most singular expression; 'Though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God,' &c., and such is our fondness to grasp at anything which favors the doctrine of a future life, we take this as expressing the opinion that after the literal dissolution of this body and 'worms' had destroyed the same, Job would 'see God,' that is, in his resurrection state he would see his Redeemer. Now all this is true. I do not dispute the fact that Job will see God in that state, but I deny that the language was intended by Job to teach that fact. I do this with as much reluctance as any other man. For I would gladly retain every word and every passage in the Bible that teaches the glorious doctrine of the resurrection and of a future life. I would cling with the utmost tenacity to the last vestige of evidence that could be culled from the sacred pages calculated to inspire me with hopes of the future. For I love that doctrine more dearly than life, yea, more than all things else. It is a blessed boon from heaven to mortals given, and should be received with gratitude, and not bartered away for the toys and vanities of earth. For earth hath no treasures that can be compared with it.

* I have an apology to offer for presenting this sermon in its present dress. It is nearly verbatim the same as pronounced on the occasion for which it was expressly written. This then is my apology, I had not time in the midst of my multiplied cares and labors to transcribe it. I should have altered its phraseology some, for it has imperfections in it, being written in great haste. But hoping the imperfections in its composition will not materially affect the truths it contains, I submit it to the reader.

I object to reckoning this passage then among the number of the many affording strong evidence of the doctrine, not because I wish to weaken the evidence or diminish the amount of testimony, but because I most firmly believe it was not intended to teach that doctrine, and is no evidence of itself in favor of it. My reasons are the following.

1. Job was not a prophet. But if the word 'Redeemer' signified the Messiah of the Jewish Scriptures, or, if the whole passage was intended to set forth the Christian doctrine of the resurrection, then Job was both a prophet and a 'believer.' But he is not represented by any of the sacred writers as having the gift of prophecy, neither is he reckoned among those 'who by faith obtained a good report,' or as an example of faith, but merely as a pattern of patience.

2. The book appears not to have been of Jewish origin, or written in a Jewish country. Neither have we any clear evidence to believe that Job had any acquaintance with the writings of the patriarchs and prophets concerning the true Messiah. Therefore his language could not with any degree of propriety be supposed to refer to that Messiah, or the literal resurrection of the dead and a future life, but referred to God, as the Redeemer, and to Job's future prosperity and temporal exaltation, as I shall presently more fully show.

3. The word Redeemer in the text, simply and originally signified a vindicator, or deliverer, and is referred to God in this place, who, as the sequel proves, was his vindicator or deliverer.

4. And perhaps the strongest reason why the text was not designed to teach the doctrine of a future life, is found in the language itself. It is said, (as quoted before,) 'Though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God.' That is, after the event of his skin and body being destroyed, in his flesh he would see God. Does this afford any evidence of the Christian doctrine of the resurrection? Did the apostles teach that in the resurrection men would have bodies of flesh and in such bodies see God? Nowhere is such a doctrine inculcated either by the ancient prophets or apostles. Their language is, when speaking of the resurrection body, 'a glorious, spiritual, and incorruptible body,' not a body of flesh. Hence the language of Job is sufficient evidence of itself that it was not intended to teach the doctrine of a future life, but only referred to the fact of his emaciation by sorrow, represented by the figure of worms destroying his body—and of his being renewed in vigor, in health and strength, and seeing God rise up to vindicate his gracious cause and restore his former prosperity to him.

One reason, and perhaps the strongest one, why obscurity has been thrown over the text, and many have been prevented from getting its true meaning is, the awkward translation of the original. That you may have a clearer perception of what the language was designed to teach, I will here give from that profound scholar, Prof. Bush, a literal translation of the Septuaglot Greek, and the Latin Vulgate. The following is the English version of the Greek, or of the translation of the LXX so called.

'For I know that he is eternal who is about to deliver me, to raise again upon earth this skin of mine, which draws up these things. For from the Lord these things have happened to me, of which I alone am conscious; and not another; and which have all been done to me in my bosom.'

The following is the English version of the Vulgate or Latin translation:

For I know that my Redeemer lives, and that in the last day I shall rise from the earth; and again I shall be enveloped with my skin, and in my flesh shall I see my God. Whom I myself shall see, and my eyes shall behold, and not another: this, my hope, is laid up in my bosom.

The two renderings differ very materially from each other in their language and in their meaning; and both differ widely from the common rendering in our Bible. But what is the most obvious import of either of these renderings? What is to be understood by the phrase, 'Shall stand at the latter day upon the earth,' or as in the translation of the Vulgate, 'last day'? I understand Job to refer to the last days of his earthly career, to the decline of life, when he should again enjoy prosperity from the hand of the Lord, signified by 'standing upon the earth.' He confidently believed he should once more stand erect upon the enjoyment of health and other temporal blessings, and not be always bowed down with afflictions. He says, 'I shall rise from the earth,' according to the version of the Vulgate; and 'He who is eternal shall raise again upon earth this skin of mine,' as in the English of the Septuagint, meaning by the expression that he would not always be covered with the dust of shame—his skin which was so shrivelled and contracted by long continued heaviness and grief should be restored to its wonted freshness and elasticity. He should not always remain buried beneath the weight of accumulated afflictions; he should come forth from them all. For says he, 'I know that he is eternal who is about to deliver me.'

By reason of Job's afflictions he had become exceedingly emaciated, and the color and freshness of his skin had changed, awfully changed. Hence he says, 'My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my flesh.....Even to-day is my complaint bitter: my stroke is heavier than my groaning!.....And thou hast filled me with wrinkles, which is a witness against me: and my leanness rising up in me beareth witness to my face.....My eye also is dim by reason of sorrow, and all my members are as a shadow.....My bowels boiled, and rested not.....My skin is black upon me, and my bones are burnt with heat.....My flesh is clothed with worms, and clouds of dust; my skin is broken and become loathsome.'

These are the effects of deep and long continued affliction. His skin clave to his bones, and his flesh was nearly wasted, even 'clothed with worms and clouds of dust,' so that there was but a little left of his former self. Yet he was confident that though his skin and flesh were then wasting away and being, as it were, devoured by worms, he should see God—he should yet live to behold with his own eyes this Redeemer vindicating his cause against the unjust accusations of his enemies—he should be re-enveloped with skin, or clothed again with the freshness and vigor of health. 'Whom I shall see,' says he, 'for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another: though my reins be consumed within me.' 'This my hope is laid up in my bosom.'

How true, how encouraging to his patience, and how full of instruction to us! He lived to realize these fond anticipations—declaring in chap. xlii: 5, 'I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee.' He had previously affirmed with the utmost confidence, even when all things around him, within him, and upon him, seemed to mock and contradict him, that he should in his latter days see his Redeemer for himself.—And he was not deceived. For advanced in life, he declares with child-like simplicity and innocence, 'Now mine eye seeth thee.' Yes, he saw this gracious Vindicator or Redeemer for himself, and saw him while he was in his flesh, faithfully vindicating his cause, and defending him from the unjust charges made against him by his professed friends. And we are told that 'he lived an hundred and forty years after this'—that the 'Lord turned the captivity of Job.....and gave him twice as much as he had before.' All his brethren and sisters and former acquaintances came together to 'eat bread with him in his house: and' they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the Lord had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an ear-ring of gold. So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning.

Here then, we find fulfilled all that Job had fondly anticipated, and all that the language of the text was designed to show should come to pass. I regard this language as expressing Job's unbounded confidence in God as his deliverer, and a confidence which nothing earthly could weaken or destroy.—And hence we cease to wonder that he should so ardently desire as he did that this sentiment or conviction of his heart should be engraved in a solid rock forever, that all, whether friend or foe, who passed by in coming time might know in the issue, that his confidence was not misplaced. He was sure that God could overrule his afflictions for good, and 'make darkness light before him and crooked things straight.'

Here is an instance before us showing the exceeding value of a firm reliance upon the wisdom of God under all the adverse circumstances of life—an instance of patience, resignation, hope and trust, showing with what calmness and composure one in the sunset of life may go down to his last earthly resting-place whose mind is stayed on God.

Let us, therefore, receive this lesson before us, as one calculated to afford us all profitable instruction, and particularly those before me who are touched with bereavement. It is true, my dear friends, ye afflicted parents, that there is not an exact parallel between your case and that of Job, but there are some striking similarities which it will be well here to notice. He was bereft and in affliction; and so are you. He was in the decline of life, and at the head of a numerous family; and so are you. He was afflicted by the loss of his worldly property. In this you know how to sympathise with him, having borne a large share of affliction from a similar cause. He had enemies who cared not for him in affliction, and friends who sought to comfort him; and so have you. He had acquaintances and kinsmen who came together to bemoan him; and so have you. There are then some marks of similarity between your case and that of Job.

Hence under these afflictions and losses may you be like him in his latter days, full of patience, and hope, and confidence, and like him say, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.' Yes, may you with him ever cherish this blessed truth in affliction, that for the afflicted a Redeemer lives. May you never lose hold of this soul-anchor, but like him cling to it to the last, even though professing friends may taunt and ridicule, and cast reproaches upon you; for it may be there will be this similitude or likeness between your case and that of Job, that some professing to be your friends will visit you to impart comforts unto you, but will be 'miserable comforters,' for having never drank at the pure fountain of consolation themselves, they have no true comforts to impart. Be ye then like Job, steadfast, trusting in God only for deliverance and comfort—holding fast your integrity—striving for spiritual enlightenment and 'letting patience have her perfect work.'

The language of our text embodies a great deal of very important and interesting matter—interesting to those who are bowed down with affliction. It is the language of unbounded confidence in the great Ruler of the universe. Job could not be persuaded even by pretended friendship, or the luring smiles of popular favor, or the greatest earthly afflictions, to renounce finally his confidence in God. In the midst of all, he would cry out emphatically, and with such tones of earnestness as gave full proof of sincerity, saying, 'I KNOW THAT MY REDEEMER LIVETH.' And he could wish that these words expressing the conviction of his soul, might be so deeply engraven that the hand of Time might never be able to erase them. He was not ashamed of them. Full of truth, they would shine the more brilliantly the more that age increased upon them. For though losses and afflictions come, God still lives. This was the conviction of Job's mind at the time he uttered the language of the text. Though professed friends or avowed enemies might strive to persuade him that his hope and trust were without foundation, and his belief in a Supreme Being was all a phantom, yet he remained unshaken in his faith. Earthly afflictions were no evidence to him that there was no living fountain of mercy.—Had he experienced the loss of his wife, and children, and all that he held dear on earth, it could afford no evidence to his mind that there was no living Father—none to care for the frail and erring children of humanity.

Notwithstanding all his losses, which were great, and almost beyond endurance—and notwithstanding the deep and multiplied afflictions which he bore, he felt more than ever to affirm before the world that his Redeemer lived. Yes, not only that he had a Redeemer, but also that his Redeemer was a living one, 'from everlasting to everlasting the same.'

How precious this truth to all who are bowed down in sorrow! How sweet and consoling that voice which has declared it to man. Harken then, ye sorrowing, to that voice as it is sounded down to you from heaven, declaring to all the sons and daughters of affliction,—'I am thy Redeemer; in me is redemption;' and though I send affliction, my loving-kindness is not withdrawn; and 'though I cause grief, yet will I have compassion according to the multitude of my mercies.' Consider then that you are not forgotten by your gracious Redeemer amid the vastness of his works, or the multitude of his incessant cares. The same voice that spake anciently of redemption, speaks to you now. The same voice that uttered consolation to a persecuted David—to afflicted Job—to a sorrow-stricken and lamenting Jeremiah—the same voice that spoke unshaken confidence to the heart of Daniel—that offered peace to the troubled mind of weeping Rachel—that would wipe the tear of sorrow from the pallid cheek of a bereaved Mary and Martha—that spoke from heaven—that was reiterated upon the walls of spiritual Zion and echoed over all Christendom—that voice, I say, which made all heaven ring with hallelujahs and the angels to shout aloud for joy, that calls the morally dead to arise, that makes the lame to walk, the dumb to sing, the blind to see and the mourner to rejoice—this day speaks to you, saying, 'I am thy Redeemer.'

'Earth hath no sorrows that Heaven can not heal.'

This fact was what sustained Job under his trials. He knew that he had a living Redeemer.—How welcome was that fact to his sorrowing mind, considering the trying circumstances under which he was placed. How sweetly did it fall upon his ears, saving him from despair, and from an untimely grave. Grateful was it to him, as the angelic news was to Judea's shepherds, when in heavenly strains and melting eloquence it was declared that there were good news and glad tidings of great joy which should be unto all people, in the birth of a world's Redeemer.

What would have been the condition of Job had he not believed that he had a Redeemer? And what would be your condition, my mourning friends, under this bereavement, had you not faith in a Redeemer? no voice coming from the past and reaching into the future, declaring unto you a day of redemption, when sorrow's tears shall be wiped away—grief and pain forever cease—and mourning and bereavement no more be known in the great family of man? O, how precious is such a hope in the hour of affliction! How it smoothes the rugged path of life, and lays her rough places even! How it sweetens the otherwise embittered cup of human experience, making the thorns interspersed among the roses of life appear beautiful themselves, and contribute to the great and good end for which they were designed.

When we behold the rose-bush, our eyes are first of all attracted to the roses interspersed among its branches, while the thorns perhaps close by their side scarcely attract our notice. But the thorn exhibits as much wisdom and mechanical skill as the rose, and received its form and delicate structure from precisely the same source. The rose attracts and pleases by its colors and variegated hues; but it displays no more design or skill in the contriver, than the thorn, when minutely and scientifically examined in all its parts. It requires the same inimitable skill to send nourishment to and form its delicate point, that it does to give color, and freshness and odor to the rose.

So among the rose-branches of human life, we behold thorns mixed with the roses—both grow up together. We are first of all attracted and pleased with the beauties, and gaieties, and pleasures of life; but when thorns are thrown in our way—when sorrows and afflictions, losses and bereavements come upon us, we are repulsed—we start back with horror—we see nothing pleasing, beautiful or useful, and we are filled with murmuring and disquietude. But the true philosopher sees beauty in every thing. He sees a wisdom and a design no less in the thorns of adversity than in the roses of health and prosperity. The same unerring hand that gave the beautiful tint to the rose, also gave point to the thorn—purposed an end, an object, and a glorious issue, perfectly consistent with the highest good of the created. All things alike are subject to the superintendence and gracious care of Him whose 'judgments are unsearchable and his ways past finding out.' Were we as much in the habit of examining critically and minutely into the causes and objects of adversity, as we are to talk about the evanescent charms and pleasures of life that bloom but for a day—much of the grief and anguish of heart now endured would be unfelt. We should feel to say that our afflictions are light, endurable, and designed for good—designed to 'work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory!' How calm and resigned is the Christian under such a frame of mind. All things work together for good to him who sees God in the storm as well as the sunshine, in the loud crash of thunder that peals through the sky, as in the low whispering of the summer breeze; 'who sees a God employed in all the good and ill that checker life'—who finds 'Sermons in stones,

Books in the running brooks,
And good in every thing.'

His mind is stayed on God, and the tempest of affliction can not move him. Like the storm-beaten oak, the more the storm beats upon it the deeper the roots will descend, he will cling closer to God, and nothing can alienate his affections from him, or avert his eye from the glorious prospect before him of sorrows ended, death vanquished, friends united, hearts perfected, heaven's full purpose completed, and a world redeemed.

Such my friends is the consolation of truth which you are now, by the grace of God, permitted to enjoy. May the same consolation attend you till your 'last expiring breath.' May you like aged David, whose hope was in God, say, 'It is good for me that I have been afflicted.' The ways of God with wise design are framed for the good of the creature, though they may be and are, to a certain extent, inscrutable to mortals. You are not to be bowed down as those without hope. God has never designed to throw around the minds of his children the chains of error and give them no hope of freedom. Men may throw them around the mind, and thrust them into interminable bondage and give them no ray of hope,

'But He, the Eternal Ruler, willet not
The slavery of the soul. His claim is love,
A filial spirit and a song of praise.
It doth not please him, that his servants wear
The livery of mourning. Peace is sown
Along their pilgrim path—and holy hopes
Like birds of Paradise, do sweetly pour

Melodious measures—and a glorious faith
Springs up o'er Jordan's wave. Say, is it meet
For those who wear a Saviour's badge, to sigh
In heathen heaviness, when earthly joys
Quench their brief taper? or go shrinking down
As to a dungeon, when the gate of Death
Opens its low valve, to show the shining track
Up to the angel's heritage of bliss?

Who, then, that 'bears a Saviour's badge' will 'sigh in heathen heaviness'? Who that has drank of the spirit of the Gospel and knows that his Redeemer liveth, will 'wear the livery of mourning'? or go shuddering down to the grave as to a dungeon whose everlasting doors are no more to be opened through the long periods of eternity; or if opened, fear that it will be only to usher him into one still more awfully to be dreaded, from whose gloomy walls there is no escape, and where there is 'no beam of hope from any point of heaven'?

Say my friends, is this your condition, this your despair, your gloom, your wretchedness? O, let it not be. The cup of your affliction is now well nigh filled, and let not this bitter ingredient be poured therein or superadded. God says to you, 'I am thy Redeemer.' This is enough—let your whole soul be resigned—you can ask no more—you want no more. What heavenly treasures are there for the mourner in that brief saying! It contains within itself the imperishable assurance that he who uttered it will infallibly seek your redemption from the tears that now flow, from the mourning that weighs your spirits down—from the bondage of mortality—from death, and from the grave—and thus prepare you to chant in everlasting strains the anthem of free redemption with the perfected and redeemed above. And can you ask any thing more in accordance with the highest and holiest desires of your hearts? This you do ask—and can you ask any thing too good of your heavenly Father? and beyond his ability to grant? Ah, 'be not faithless, but believing;' for one has declared that 'He is able to do exceeding abundantly, above all that we ask or think.' Receive this then as an assurance from God for your consolation. For he who said, 'I am thy Redeemer,' also said, 'I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death.' In accordance with this, Paul speaks of an 'adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body,' of a 'redemption that is in Christ Jesus—redemption through his blood,'.... 'who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption.'

Redemption, then, is the theme of the Gospel, the song of the blessed, the consolation of the mourning, and the inheritance of the glorified above.—Why weep ye, then? Why those tears, since all heaven is gladdened with the song, and the labor of the Gospel on earth is to produce 'joy and peace in believing,' and to enable all earth's mourning children to look upward by faith and 'be glad in the Lord.'

May you not be like weeping Rachel, who 'refused to be comforted for her children, because they were not.' Remember the gracious words of Christ your Redeemer, who, when he was about to leave our earth said, 'I will send you another comforter.' This he did. Then refuse it not; receive it as a rich boon from one who 'careth for you,' and who has said, 'I will not leave you comfortless.' Rest often to his word and to his testimony, for Paul himself speaks of 'the comfort of the Scriptures.' There we find that He who said, 'I am thy Redeemer,' has also said, 'I am he that comforteth you.' Paul says, 'He is the God of all comfort,' and 'comforteth us in all our tribulations.' Yes, God is to be praised for the free manifestation of his boundless benignity—for having made such ample provision for all the wants of his suffering children, and made himself appear so lovely in our eyes.—So that you can say, you ought to say, and may the great Disposer enable you sincerely to say, 'The Lord hath done great things for me whereof I am glad.'

He has taught you that he is your Redeemer—that he has made Christ unto your sanctification and redemption, that God himself has made him so, and not left him to be made so or not by human agency, and what God has made so, no power can undo. He has also taught you that the day of mourning shall end—death be vanquished, the grave destroyed, sin finished and the reign of Christ be completed, when God shall be 'all in all'—that friends long separated shall be united on the blissful shore of immortality where no parting sighs are heard or farewell tears are shed; where the parent shall meet the child and the child the parent in union sweet, and

'All the ransomed happy throng
To praise the great I AM,
Shall join their voices in the song
Of Moses and the Lamb,' where each shall have exchanged a natural, corruptible, and inglorious body, for one that is spiritual, immortal, and glorious, and have bodies 'fashioned like unto Christ; glorious body, according to the working, [or energy,] whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.' Here then, to you parents, is the word of consolation sent—to you are given great and precious promises—that you weep not without hope; and the same are given to the brothers and sisters of the deceased. To you may I appropriately repeat the language of our dear Saviour addressed to the weeping sisters, mourning for the loss of an affectionate brother—'Thy brother shall rise again.' May the same assurance that spoke peace and comfort to their troubled heart, also minister comfort to yours, to all who are afar off, and to all who are nigh—and 'the God of peace who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus,' bless you through all time, and at last receive you to himself with the sanctified and redeemed above to praise and glorify him eternally, when in a sense never before felt, you may shout in long, loud, earnest and rapturous strains, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'

VISIT TO THE STATE PRISON AT AUBURN.

MR. EDITOR,—On my return from a recent tour to the western part of this State, I tarried a day at Auburn for the purpose of taking a look into our State Prison. A high wall surrounds the prison, which of itself, is sufficient to strike terror into the mind of the beholder. The watch stationed at intervals on its top, must in my opinion vanish all hope and means of escape from the minds of those that indulge the thought. I was admitted within the walls. The sound of the ponderous gates grating on their iron hinges fell heavily upon my ears, and struck terror into my heart.

One of the keepers kindly conducted me through the various workshops, of which there are a great variety, and showed me many beautiful specimens of their various manufactures. As I slowly passed along I could not but notice the melancholy and gloom that rested upon the countenances of the prisoners. Here were confined nearly seven hundred of our fellow men, shut out from friends, from society and social intercourse. O, who can paint the suffering and anguish that burns deep in their sickened hearts? Who can tell of their struggles with passion strong and ungovernable—of their exposure to temptations and sin—of the scorn and frown they endured from their fellow beings?—Alas! who can tell the amount of crime, for which society is responsible? Would it but protect and cherish the unfortunate among them, rather than cast them forth neglected and despised upon the world's wide face, by which they are often forced or at least strongly tempted into the very vortex of crime and wretchedness, much of the guilt and misery endured might be averted. Could mankind but look upon each other as brethren, although weak and unfortunate, how much less evil would the world present? Would they but seek the reformation of the offender, as the great object and aim of punishment, then should we see less crime stalking abroad over the land?

Among the group of unfortunate men I beheld one whom I had formerly known. There stood robed in the emblems of the prison, a being whom I had seen and known in my childhood. Alas, how different! Then a professed minister of the Gospel; now a condemned criminal. O how memory travelled back to the time he was seen standing in the pulpit and warning his fellows of the wrath to come! He practiced the doctrine he preached, that the path of sin is pleasant, and for thus doing he is damned. What a sad comment this on the popular belief! How many of the group before me are victims of this fatal delusion; who can tell? Here, thought I, are living testimonies for the truth of the doctrine 'that the way of the transgressor is hard'—living testimonies to the truth, 'that, though hand join in hand, the wicked shall be unpunished,' and 'that there is a God that judgeth in the earth.'

When will men believe and preach these truths to the world? When will they cease to proclaim sentiments inimical to these great truths, truths that alone can restrain the vicious and lead them in the paths of wisdom and peace. Can it be that each one must learn them by experience before they will believe? If not, behold these poor and condemned outcasts, and shun their path if you would avoid their fate. What a comment this on the now popular doctrine that the path of sin is pleasant and leads to happiness. Ere a century hence, that it may be forgotten and cast to the moles and the bats, is my sincere prayer, and God grant that it may be.

Could mankind be convinced—have a firm and realizing faith in the doctrine that there is no escape from punishment, nor possibly can be—that as sure as thunder follows lightning so sure it is, that punishment follows swift upon the heels of transgression, then what would be the motive to transgression. It is the hope of escape that leads men to sin and to follow in the path of transgression. We must see to it then that the great truth 'that there is no escape for the wicked,' is proclaimed to mankind—that it is powerfully impressed on their minds and written on the fleshly tablets of the heart. Let this be our theme until all mankind are firmly persuaded, each in his own mind, 'that there is no peace to the wicked, that they are as the troubled sea whose waters cast up mire and dirt, and that though hand join in hand they shall not be unpunished.'

I must confess that on leaving the prison I was more convinced than ever of the truth of this doctrine, that God exercises a righteous retribution in the earth.

Here are arguments that no one can evade, testimonies which no one dare gainsay, witnesses, whom no one can successfully impeach. They are more powerful than all the smooth and splendid theories, which man in his ingenuity can invent. They speak not only to the senses, but also to the heart, the conscience bearing witness that they can not be mistaken. When all mankind shall believe these Gospel truths, practice them in their walk and conversation, then will the kingdom of Christ be established upon the tops of the mountains and exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it, then shall tears, sorrow and sighing be no more, and truth and love shall reign triumphant throughout the vast family of man. LINESTO LAURA EGGLESTON, (BY AGREEMENT,) WITH A DESIGN TO EXTEND ACQUAINTANCE.

To show the willingness with which I grant
Thy kind request, thus soon these lines are penned:
My friendship would not of its office vaunt;
Nor could it claim return, if slow to serve a friend.
Idle it were to tell thee that my heart
Oft bath its thrills of love and grief for thine;
I've seen thee, and its warmth evinced—thou art
Too generous to suppose dissimulation mine.
Thou wouldst that I 'remember' thee, and not
In vain the wish, though 'twere to me unknown:
Ungrateful were I for a halter lot,
Did I forget a friend, disease had marked her own.
Imagination at thy couch presides,
With healing cordials, music, myrrh, and balm—
An anodyne for every pang provides,
Lulling thy tortured nerves to rest, and slumber calm.
While fancy soothes thee, sympathy deplores;
Yet all anxieties with joy abound—
Thy buoyant mind o'er transient sorrowing soars,
Having a panacea precious and priceless found.
Earth's many trials have not power to cloud
The mind that sees a God in each event,
Such being thine, it shall remain unbound
Till life's decaying sands, and flickering fires are spent.
It loves the world and doth its charms enjoy,
Mount dell, and plain, in harmony it blends—
Bright orbs and skies its functions high employ,
And dearer far than these, the converse sweet of friends.
But dearer still, the Hope that turns to Heaven—
The Faith that brings a world enfranchised there—
That sees in death a kindly angel, given
The soul to realms of rich beatitude to bear.

Let us rejoice that this full faith is ours,
And make of earth a blest Elysium;
Green vales and lawns we'll deem fair Eden bowers,
Our faithful friends a band of kindred seraphim.
The native melody of birds and streams
Shall be the cherub harps that cares beguile—
The sun's effulgence and the moon's soft beams,
The gladdening glow of our Immanuel's fav'ring smile.
Thus life's enjoyments, heightened into bliss,
Shall light each darksome lurking-place of woe;
Then, if immortal life is unto this,
As transport is to pain, what rapture shall we know!
Here, we'll essay to tune our fragile lyres
In unison with lyric nature's song;
There, stirred by breath the soul of praise inspires,
Their notes shall swell the strains of all the hallow'd throng.
Sister, wilt thou in change for thine receive
These lines, though they be hurried, vague and weak?
Thou answerest, yes, and I reply, believe
That all of truth is felt, which they may fail to speak.
So. Oxford, Sept. 15, 1845. MARY E. TILLOTSON.

RESPONSE.

INSCRIBED TO MISS MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Sweet sister, thine offering is welcomed with pleasure,
Receive, in exchange, this tribute of mine:
The jewels of friendship I still love to treasure
In 'Love's golden vase,' the heart's sacred shrine.
O, sweet is communion, in life's mental border,
With souls rich and lofty, in feeling refined,
Whom Genius hath stamped with his beautiful order,
And the smile of the muses to song hath inclined.
I love kindred minds, high-toned, sincere, tender,
Whose tastes are electric on sympathy's wire;
My warmest affections I freely surrender,
Where friendship hath kindled her heavenly fire.
My spirit, deep crushed by affliction, oft pineth
For the soft ties, of sympathy soothing and sweet,
But few are the hearts, where my feeling divineth,
The meek drooping lilies, the gentle gales greet.
The loss of my health I have deeply regretted;
I sigh to be useful, but know I shall fail;
My fond aspirations have ever been wrecked
In cold disappointment's un pitying gale.

Excuse these effusions, nor deem them sad breathings,
My spirit is joyous, though fading my form;
On faith's sparkling plumes, I will soar above grieving,
And view in perspective the heavenly calm.

Where health's fragrant breezes forever are blowing,
O'er brightseraph bands, wreath'd with amaranth flow'rs,
And the deep springs of Life Immortal are flowing,
O'er emerald sands in love's golden bowers.

Your harp breathes of peace, and charms away sadness,
As dew on the roses so blandly distil;
It steals o'er my soul, and responsive to gladness,
The soft chords of feeling in melody thrill.

Submissive I bow to a heavenly Father,
Whose fiat is mercy, whose nature is love,
To drink of the chalice he fills I had rather,
Than limit his grace, and in ignorance rove.

I love to commune with the bright page of nature,
And study her laws and economy there;
The boundless beneficence of the Creator
Is beautiful, written in characters fair.

Our Faith, dearest sister, you prize above treasures,
Or coronets sparkling with gems of the mine;
O, cling to it firmly, and holiest pleasures,
Unfading in life and in death, shall be thine!

Attune the sweet lyre which kind nature hath given,
To peace's mildest numbers, to solace and cheer;
In Truth's thrilling accents, the love of high heaven
Proclaim to the erring and sorrowing here.

In lines to me often, your sentiments whisper—
Believe me sincere, as I deem thee a friend;—
Farewell, for the twilight is holding her vesper,
And silvery moonlight doth round me descend.

CONFIDENCE.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

How beautiful is Confidence! Whether we contemplate it in childhood, which, all trustfulness, confides its every wish and fear, as well as every secret, to a mother's listening ear, or between those who have pledged themselves in Friendship's golden bowl, and with unity of spirit and feeling entwined about them the beautiful bands of trusting affection, it is in each and every instance, the same beautiful and holy principle! But it is of confidence in neither of these senses, that we would now speak.—These afford themes too poetic for our prosy mood, and besides, these spring up spontaneous in every human breast, and no disquisition, however truthful or labored, would promote their growth.

But it is of confidence in the great family of man—of confidence, the opposite of that cold, theorizing and distrustful misanthropy, which induces its possessor to look upon the great brotherhood of nature, as destitute of that principle of innate integrity—that spark of divine fire, which we trust the God of nature has implanted in the bosoms of all.

Many, and by far too many, who profess to have received enlarged views of the Author and his works, are lamentably deficient in this confidence; and this deficiency is almost universally accompanied by a boasted superiority of wisdom and discernment in themselves. They have mingled much with the world, they will say, and in all their minglings, sought for that generosity of feeling, that disinterestedness and benevolence which they are told lives in the hearts of men and so much exalts their nature, but they have never found that which will bear the test, and they will add in a tone of voice and manner, which would induce the hearer to believe that they exulted in the discovery, that vanity, avarice, and selfishness, are the main-springs of human actions.

And alas, that so many who thus profess, should 'live the doctrines that they teach'! Is it not true indeed, that in the majority of instances, the advocates of such sentiments, are those who have fallen from the high standard, which they are anxious to bring down to their own degraded level? Doubting and distrustful, they go forth into the world, and practice that hypocrisy and deceit, that narrow-mindedness and selfishness, which they suspect others to be practicing towards them, and instead of making their hearts the sanctuaries of all those higher and ennobling sentiments and affections, which render man worthy of himself and his destiny, these are excluded, to make room for the degrading principles, in the use of which, they expect to meet their fellow men. Instead of contemplating the magnanimous acts, the kindly deeds, and generous returns, which are being performed on every hand, they seek out all that is unbecoming or selfish, vile or vicious, in the behavior of others, that in their faults, they may find an excuse for their own conduct.

We do not say, that all those who speak thus disparagingly of mankind, are as degraded as any of whom they speak; for in saying this, great injustice would be done to many who are unfortunate rather than debased, in the entertainment of their opinions. The promulgation of doctrines teaching the worthlessness and total depravity of man's nature may have been listened to by some who, 'possessed of credulous minds, have received these teachings as the word of truth, and echoing their spirit, they prate of man's unworthiness; but a more frequent cause of distrust, is the betrayal of confidence, by some who have indeed proved themselves unworthy of the trust reposed in them, and thus duped, the unfortunate victims forthwith judge all to be influenced by the same unworthy motives—as wise as to say, because one has stepped aside from the pathway of rectitude and virtue, all men have gone as widely astray.

But whatever may have induced any one to cherish such sentiments, we can invariably discover the pernicious effect which they have upon the mind and feelings. I have known one who, for this last named cause, was led to adopt the misanthrope's creed. Naturally full of generosity, nobleness, and affection, he was in the bosom of his family, all that a friend could respect, a child revere, or a wife love; but upon going out into the world, he seemed a different being. Distrusting all, he unconsciously put on an appearance which as completely covered his better nature, as did his cloak his person, and were a stranger to judge of him, he would deem him cold, and selfishly calculating, or in other words an impersonation of all those degrading principles, which in reality he so heartily and totally despised. And as in this instance, so can the effect of such opinions be traced in others; for it is not in the contemplation of unbecoming behavior, evil deeds, or vicious conduct, that we are led to the exercise of all that is good, and ennobling in our natures; and if we would be generous and magnanimous, or in a word, if we would be Christians, and love the practice of all the Christian virtues, we must look upon the brighter, rather than the darker side of human nature.

But in truth and reality, mankind are not as selfish and debased, as some would have us believe; and if all would examine their own hearts, before pronouncing judgment, more 'righteous judgments' would be the result. We have an instance in point. A friend once travelling in a stage coach, heard one of his fellow passengers remark, that he had heard much of an old gentleman called Disinterested Benevolence, but he had also travelled much, and had never met with him, or witnessed a single act performed by his hand. The subject was discussed some minutes, when my friend turning to the first speaker, asked if he had never performed such a deed. The answer after a little hesitation, was 'I do not trumpet my own fame!'

Aye, it is there—none are willing to trumpet their own fame, but there are those, who are more willing to trumpet their own fame, than allow their neighbor's merit to be spoken. Who is there, that after searching his own heart, would be willing to acknowledge, even to his own conscience, that he was actuated by as unworthy motives as he unhesitatingly ascribes to his neighbors? or who that could bring himself to believe that vanity, avarice, and selfishness, were the mainsprings of his actions? We hope there are but few; and what right then, have any to judge less favorably of others than of themselves? None can tell what gems a locked casket contains; and as few tell, what hidden sympathies, and yearning desires for truth and goodness, are cherished in the hearts of others, and of others too, who, it may be through weakness, have gone astray. It has been said that our best feelings were the most concealed; and if this be true, let none deny that their brother man may be in possession of as kindly impulses and generous sentiments, as they know, dwell deep in their own bosoms.

Confidence is the elixir of social enjoyment, and the great bond of Christian charity—that we may do justice to others, and reap the pleasures or happiness which it will confer, let us strive to cherish it.

Better first all, and be deceived,
And weep that trust, and that deceiving,
Than doubt one heart which, if believed,
Had blessed one's heart with true believing.

Oh! in this mocking world, too fast
The doubting fiend o'ertakes our youth!
Better be cheated to the last,
Than lose the blessed hope of Truth.

RELIGION.

How indefinite the idea which many people have formed in reference to the nature and principles of religion, as well as its object and the proper direction of its power. Were the inquiry to be made of the different members of the many sects in our land, the answers returned would, in all probability, be somewhat singular and many of them contradictory; and the mind in deep search after truth, should the sacred Record be neglected, would be at a stand relative to the choice to be made of the many answers returned by the disciples of the various faiths now engaging the thoughts and attention of mankind. One, if called upon, would inform us that religion is an indefinable something, frequently finding its home in the heart, and changing that heart from a nature totally depraved to one of principles heavenly and divine. Another would say, that the nature of religion was easily determined; the truth in regard to it, coming perfectly within the comprehension of the religionist, the religionist of his own denomination of course, though perhaps hid in a measure, if not wholly, from all other classes of the world. One would say that religion consisted in right views of God and his character; in a knowledge of his designs, and of his purposes respecting the final destiny of the intelligent creation. And in fact, we find almost as many different views of the nature and object of religion, as we find different disciples of the various and many creeds which have been written out for the instruction, peace, happiness, and welfare of the world. But it is an equal truth, that in the main the majority of those who belong to the various churches of the land, and whose education is somewhat limited, agree in reference to the object of religion; and that is, that it is something relating to the future world and having but little, if any reference to this.

We were forcibly reminded of this truth not long since, upon being informed of a remark made by some who have put on Christ; who have become separated from the sinful world around them, and consider themselves as shining ornaments of the religion of our Saviour. A blind orphan who had formerly been in the Asylum at New York, but who had left and gone into the country to reside, was anxious to get back to the Institution once more, but lacked the pecuniary means to carry his plans into execution. A gentleman who is so unfortunate as to be a believer in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind, ascertaining the young man's wants, kindly volunteered to assist him. He accordingly went to one of the agents of the Railway Company and procured him a free passage through, gave him funds to bear what other necessary expenses might accrue, and sent him on, and he arrived safely at his place of destination. But some of the neighbors of the gentleman of whom we are speaking, and who are so fortunate as to be in possession of what they regard as a correct faith—the endless damnation of the greater portion of the human family—admiring that benevolent and charitable deed, said that if the gentleman's religion would not carry him to heaven, yet that charitable act might possibly accomplish that work.

There are by far too many, like those we have mentioned, who consider religion to consist in principles of faith alone; and that its main purpose is to confer some unspeakable blessing upon the soul in a future world, regardless of any influence upon the mind or conduct of the religionist in this state of being, any farther than leading him forth to engage in the duties and services of the sanctuary. This opinion so prevalent, has been mainly produced and strengthened by the labors of the clergy, who have long endeavored to make it appear that a religious experience is the work of a moment, wholly and totally changing the nature of the heart. But were proper attention to be paid to the instruction of the Scriptures, it would be ascertained that religion is of a nature influencing the heart and hand of man, here, in this state of existence, leading him forth to a proper discharge of his duties as a moral, intellectual, and social being. James must be good authority on this point, and he says—'True religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.'

Religion does not consist in matters of faith alone, but also in works such as bespeak the exalted nature of the human mind. It goes to the humble shed of poverty and confers substantial blessings upon the victims of want. It goes to the house of mourning when darkness and distress and sorrow are there, and pours the consoling and healing balm upon the wounded spirit. It goes to the mind bowed by the adversities of the world, sorrowful and desponding because of the trials allotted to man, and whispers the fond words of hope to strengthen and support the weary soul. In a word, the true religionist is one who keeps the commandments of the great Supreme; who lives as directed by the precepts of the everlasting Gospel; and who at all times, and toward all persons, extends that and that only which he would wish to receive in return, and thus secures peace, and happiness; and the respect of the upright and candid man rests upon him and he is viewed, and truly too, as one of the noblest of earth.

UNIVERSALIST QUARTERLY AND GENERAL REVIEW.

The first number of the third volume of this valuable work has at length made its appearance. It was delayed a few weeks for the purpose of receiving returns from patrons and ascertaining whether its subscription list could not be increased beyond the past and beyond a disagreeable contingency or doubt of its continued existence. We are sorry to learn that it is not yet entirely beyond contingency—and that its patronage is far from being such as the work fully merits and ought to receive from our denomination. It is a work that occupies a distinct department in our periodical and denominational literature, and does not at all interfere with any other publication of our order. It can not be given up without disgrace and shame to the denomination in its present upward and onward tendency; and its failure would most seriously check that tendency. We do therefore most earnestly hope and pray that more zeal and energetic action may be manifested on its behalf. Are there not some, yea many, in this region who do not now patronize it, both ministers and laymen, who will send in their names and their $2, for the Quarterly, either to this office or to the publisher, Br. A. Tompkins, of Boston? Its contents are the fruits of earnest, ardent thought and deep investigation.

We think the present number is not exceeded by any of its predecessors, either in elevation of tone or depth and vigor of thought. It contains a larger portion than common from the pen of its able Editor, Rev. H. Ballou, 2d.

The contents of the present number are, Art. I. Divine and Human Agency, by the Editor. II. Scriptural Doctrine concerning the Soul and its continued Existence after Death, by Rev. R. O. Williams. III. Martineau's Endeavors after the Christian Life, by A. D. Mayo. IV. An Evening Landscape, by Miss S. C. Edgerton. V. The Divine Purpose in the Reconciliation of All, by the Editor. VI. Non-Resistance by Rev. O. A. Skinner. VII. Literary Notices.

The first article, on Divine and Human Agency, we regard as one of the best productions we have ever seen from the always instructive pen of the able Editor. Indeed, our memory runneth not back to the time when we ever read from any pen an abler article on that complicated and knotty question. He unravels the kinks, unties the knots, and brushes away much of the mist and fog that for ages have been accumulating in and about the question, and presents the two parallel lines along which run the Divine Sovereignty and omnipotent agency of God, and the subordinate agency and moral accountability of man, showing that both are founded in the principles of eternal truth, and neither can be safely abandoned to give place to the other; and with a freshness and vigor of expression, which we seldom find in the treatment of so hacknied and worn a subject as that of fatal necessity on the one hand and absolute free-will and self-determining power on the other, presents, we believe, the only true and tenable ground on which, at last, in spite of all theological wrangling, all consistent theologians must unite. This article is worth more than the price of the Quarterly for the year.

The second article, from Rev. R. O. Williams, on the Scriptural Doctrine concerning the soul and its continued existence after death, is a patiently labored and critically written article; and we think presents the true and correct view of the subject. It shows that throughout the entire Scriptures of the Old Testament there are scattered such frequent hints and allusions to the soul's identity as distinct from the body and its continued existence beyond death, that it is obvious the sentiment was held by the Scripture writers from the earliest ages, however vague and indefinite their ideas were on the subject—that the sentiment is, as it were, intuitive and springs up naturally in all minds; and that it is still more clearly and distinctly taught in the New Testament. The article fills thirty pages, and exhibits much patient research and careful reading. It is somewhat more diffuse, and covers more ground than a similar treatise from the Editor would have done. But it will well pay the reader for a careful perusal.

The third article, from Br. Mayo, in review of Martineau's Endeavors after the Christian Life, is a most labored, home, practical treatise. It comes home to the bosom, to the heart, the conscience of the true Christian of whatever name or nation. It treats of the great importance of practical preaching, an elevated piety, and pure morality—the kind of preaching and practice now so generally and loudly called for by our denomination. We sincerely rejoice in seeing such articles in the Quarterly.

Miss Edgerton's article is poetic—beautiful English poetry, translated from the German.

Article fifth, from the pen of the Editor, on 'The Divine Purpose in the reconciliation of all,' is plain, forcible and good. On such a subject, of course, Br. Ballou is always at home, and as Dr. Young says,

'finds his inspiration in his theme.'

Article sixth, from Br. O. A. Skinner, is an able and manly review of a 4th of July Oration delivered in Boston by Charles Sumner, and two Peace Sermons, so termed, preached by Revs. E. S. Gannett and F. D. Huntington. He dissents entirely from the ground advocated by these authors, that war in self-defence, or in vindication of important national rights, is never justifiable. He justly condemns that sickly sentimentality that has shown itself recently in some quarters under the title of the doctrine of 'Non-Resistance,' shows that self-defence is the first law of nature—is a duty incumbent both on individuals and communities. While he deprecates war as a great evil, and would have all individuals and nations avoid it where they can without incurring a greater evil, he thinks the Non-Resistants have interpreted certain passages of the New Testament too rigidly, too strictly, and that Christianity does not, when rightly understood, forbid self-defence.

The literary notices in this number are in review of Br. S. Cobb's 'Compend of Christian Divinity,' 'Plato against the Atheists,' Carlisle's 'Oliver Cromwell,' Frothingham's 'History of Charlestown,' Bacon's Oration at Dartmouth College, two recent works of Prof. Bush on the 'Resurrection of Christ,' 'the Soul,' &c., and the 'Second Annual Report of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union.'

We feel justly proud of the 'Universalist Quarterly and General Review,' and wish it in four times as many hands as it ever yet has been. D. S.

DR. BAKER'S APPEAL TO THE PUBLIC,

From the Decision of the Classis of Cayuga, as published in the Christian Intelligencer, Feb. 27th, 1845.

The above is the title of a small pamphlet of 32 pages, which some unknown person has sent us. We have carefully read it through, and must say that, in all our reading and observation of the proceedings of ecclesiastical bodies, of late years, among the Orthodox and predominant sects of our country, we have not seen any thing that to us appeared so perfectly farcical and ridiculous as the proceedings and resolutions of the Cayuga Classis in this case. The parties are both entire strangers to us. We have no special sympathies for either. The one is a Methodist, the other Dutch Reformed; and both, it appears, residents of Owasco, Cayuga county.

It seems from the pamphlet that Dr. Baker, a Methodist practicing physician, got into some difficulty with the Rev. Mr. Evans, pastor of the Dutch Reformed church at Owasco—that Mr. E. had consented to have his church opened and occupied by the Methodists, and afterwards repented of his liberality, and called it a sin that he had done so—spoke against the Methodists in no very measured and guarded terms, and particularly and repeatedly against Dr. Baker, and, as the latter affirms, misrepresented and slandered his character, and tried to injure him in various ways, besides scandalizing the denomination to which he belonged. The Dr. for a long time sought satisfaction in vain at his hands; till at length the matter was brought, by Mr. E.'s request, before the Classis of the Dutch church, (answering, we believe, in that denomination to the Presbytery in the Presbyterian,) for investigation and judicial action. The Classis took some strange and unprecedented action on the subject, and without a trial, proceeded to clear Mr. E. of the charges and condemn the Dr. as a slanderer for preferring them, and published their doings in the New York 'Christian Intelligencer.'

The Dr. then came before the public in a pamphlet reviewing their proceedings, and exhibiting the Classis and Mr. E. in no very enviable light, which review had the effect to bring the latter to terms, and their private difficulties were all amicably and satisfactorily adjusted, or settled. The Dr. was assured that the resolutions passed by the Classis implicating his character should be rescinded: but they never have been, and therefore he still stands upon their records, and published to the world through their organ, as a slanderer. Hence he comes again before the public in this 'Appeal.' We have neither time nor room to notice it at great length; but from the resolutions passed by the Cayuga Classis in this case, we should judge that its members considered that their appropriate business when assembled to hear complaints against any of their number, was, not to try them or examine any evidence in the case, but to clear the accused at all hazards, whether innocent or guilty, and to cover the accuser with infamy, whether right or wrong, and especially to prevent his bringing any evidence to sustain his charges. We shall not notice all the grave resolutions which this very grave body of grave divines passed at the so-called trial. The following contain the gist of their combined wisdom:—

'Resolved, Whereas the Rev. Wm. Evans is solicitous to have certain charges investigated which have been published in a pamphlet form, and laid on the table of Classis, by A. Baker; and whereas the Classis can not under the circumstances of the case, as a Classis, enter upon a judicial process, therefore,

Resolved, That the Classis will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, with open doors, to inquire into the charges and testimonies by which they are rebutted, in order to give Classis an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon said charges.

The Rev. B. Bassler was called to the chair, and the Rev. A. G. Ryerson appointed secretary.

The charges in the pamphlet were read separately, and answered by the Rev. Mr. Evans; after which the Committee of the Whole arose and reported as follows:

Whereas the Classis having resolved themselves in a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of ascertaining whether the rumors injurious to the character of the Rev. Mr. Evans, have any foundation, or were accompanied with strong public presumption of its (their) truth, and after a patient investigation, recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That in the judgment of this Classis, the testimony adduced to substantiate the charges against the Rev. Wm. Evans, as set forth in the pamphlet laid upon the table of Classis, does not in any way support those charges, or militate against the Christian or ministerial character of the said Evans; but, on the contrary, evince a malicious and persecuting spirit on the part of the person by whom they are made.'

'From the above resolution it would seem that Mr. Evans was solicitous the charges preferred against him should be investigated. And having, myself, petitioned Classis to the same end,—also having informed said body that I was present with my 'witnesses and testimony' to sustain said charges, I would ask, why it was, that Classis 'could not enter upon a judicial' investigation? Both parties were present, and anxious for an investigation. What impediment was in the way? The next resolution explicitly states the reasons why a 'judicial' investigation was not entered upon.—Classis desired only 'to inquire into the charges and testimonies by which they (the charges) are rebutted, in order to give Classis an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon said charges.' That is, they wished to hear only one side of the subject! Hence the investigation could not be 'judicial'—legal—fair—equitable—impartial; but ex-party—partial—one-sided. Now the object of such a course must be apparent to every reflecting mind. The investigation not being a 'judicial' one, they could not inflict any punishment upon the defendant, if it should appear that he was guilty. To me it appears that they not only desired to exonerate the defendant, but to condemn the complainant. And this they have done in no very measured terms. If Classis desired only to 'express an opinion' on the merits of said charges, why travel beyond such desire and pronounce the accused innocent? Why at the same time, only having heard 'the testimonies by which those charges were rebutted,' condemn the complainant? Did they expect by such an unheard of course—so perfectly unchristian-like, to allay the excitement that already existed, and to force the public mind into the belief that I was persecuting Mr. Evans? Why were so many of Mr. Evans' own church so dissatisfied with him? Why their anxiety to have the matter investigated, if they believed him a persecuted man? What induced several of the most respectable of Mr. Evans' members, who were personally acquainted with me, and well acquainted with the difficulty, to certify that I had offered every thing that was fair, honorable, and Christian-like, to bring about a settlement?—[See Review, pp. 3, 9, and App. pp. 16, 22.]

The whole proceedings of the Classis appear like a ridiculous farce, and to have had no other aim but to exonerate one of their members from some ugly and disagreeable charges, and heap infamy upon his accuser, in-respect of the right or wrong of either. We recollect being present a few weeks since, at a meeting of another Dutch Reformed Classis in a neighboring county, for a similar purpose, (which we may notice more particularly hereafter,) where the case was somewhat analogous to the above, excepting that the accusers of the clergyman were of his own church, instead of being Methodists; and though the case was managed somewhat differently the result was the same. The clergyman was an adroit manager, and whether he or his accusers were most in fault, we are unable to decide, as the testimony was not taken in the case, though the clergyman was cleared.—Whether such proceedings are characteristic of the Dutch church, we can not say: we believe they are not peculiar, or alone pertain to that church. MR. BUCKINGHAM'S DEFENCE.

It will be seen by an article from the above named gentleman, on the last page of this number, that he seems to feel aggrieved at some manifestations of illiberality imputed to him in an article which appeared in the Magazine of the 6th ult. As the notes appended to portions of Mr. B.'s article by Br. Skinner, do not seem quite sufficient, we would say a few words in relation to the matter. We made the statements in our former article, as having them from what we believed, and still believe, to be direct and authentic sources, and consequently correct.

Mr. B. intends, we suppose, to be understood as denying the charges. We must confess that there seems a great lack of directness in the denial. He is entirely indefinite. He only seems to—not remember—is not aware that such and such occurrences ever took place. Yet he had 'often heard of a flying rumor to the same effect,' &c. (See the closing part of his paragraph relating to the proposed exchange with Br. Grosh.) We are quite well aware that all memories are not alike—some are more retentive than others. Our readers are doubtless able to judge between our statements and his disclaimer.

It is fairly to be inferred from Mr. B.'s remarks with regard to Dr. Channing, that we accused the Dr. of illiberality, because the offer of the Universalists, of their church for his use, in this city, was declined. We surely can not see any thing in our statement to justify such a conclusion. It was stated as plainly as could be, that his Unitarian friends here, applied for the use of the various Orthodox churches, which were refused them, and they would not accept the offer of the Universalists. We have no reason to doubt that the Dr. would just as soon have preached from the Universalist pulpit as any other—or that he would have been ready to exchange pulpits with Universalist clergymen in his own city without the fear that they should use some words, the meaning of which a Unitarian congregation might misconstrue, or that the using of the same words before a Universalist congregation by him, would render their meaning liable to misconception.

In closing, we can not help but remark on the difference between Mr. B. and his esteemed coadjutor, Mr. Emmons, of Vernon, who has in several instances exchanged pulpits with Universalist clergymen, without the fear that the meaning of his or their words would be misconstrued by the different congregations. SIN.

Sin is a great moral disease. It is to the soul what leprosy is to the body. It is a small spot at first, but unless checked and cleansed away, continues to spread and prevail until it has defiled every power, polluted every pure fountain, and covered over the whole heart with its rottenness and corruption. It insinuates itself into every artery and vein—it finds its way into every avenue and corner, increasing all the while in virulence and power, until it completely enwraps its poor victim in the shroud of its living death, and foul and loathsome, lays him down to sleep in his dark grave.

The darkest, foulest form of sin has its beginnings in a single departure from the path of virtue. Like the inidious leprosy, it creeps slowly and silently onward, enervating power after power, consuming the health and strength, until its subject is covered all over with its deformities and its putrefaction, and dies as few would wish to die.

The young man, who for the first time sat down at the gaming table, thought that a single throw could do him no harm. He played—and when he arose and went out, he was not the same man. He had lost a portion of his virtue—and influences had taken hold of his heart that drew him back again, though not without a struggle.—He would play only once more—but he could not resist the temptation when the third opportunity presented itself; and he came finally to seek opportunities to gratify his disposition for gaming. This sealed his fate. Other vices fastened upon him—he became addicted to profanity—Sabbath-breaking—licentiousness, and the lowest and most brutal excesses. His moral sense was gone.—He lost his patrimony at the gaming table—to obtain further supplies, he was led to rob—from robbing he played the assassin—and finally ended his career of infamy, which commenced with one false step, on the scaffold! (Such is the common and natural course of every sinner, though he may not come to the same end. 'One slight deviation from known duty is permitted, and then another. Each step is but short, and the deluded victim is scarcely aware that he is pursuing the road to infamy and wretchedness.'

So deceptive is sin—so insidious are its attacks on the health and life of the soul. And if you go to the sinner when he first commences his downward walk, and tell him that he is danger, and that if he goes forward he will find himself in utter degradation and shame; and he will very likely laugh you in the face, and say that he is not conscious of being so very far out of the way, and though your warning is kind, it is not needed. Look at him again. Corruption has spun its web about his soul, and his heart is all leprous with sin; and from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot there is no health in him. There is all one living mass of disease—of 'wounds, and bruises and putrefying sores,' which 'have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment.'—Human aid and humankind can do nothing for him. And yet he is not lost beyond the hope of redemption. There is a remedy for his disease—there is pity for him in the bosom of Jesus Christ—and the touch that restored the leper can heal him also. The call of the Gospel is unto him, and he is told of a balm in Gilead, and of a Physician whose power is of God, and who has only to say, 'I will, be thou clean;'—and the foul leprosy of sin shall be removed forever.

DEATHS.

In Frankfort, Feb. 19th, of remittent fever, Mr. ROBERT M. SHARER, aged 41. For a number of years Mr. S. had been in feeble health, and was supposed to be consumptive. His feeble frame fell an easy prey to the disease of which he died. His mental faculties remained unimpaired, and he died resigned and happy in the cheering faith of a world's salvation, which he had long cherished. He has left a widow to whom he was endeared by the tenderest ties, and a numerous circle of friends to mourn his early death. But they mourn not as those without hope, but have the blessed assurance that what is their loss is his unspeakable gain. The deceased had for many years been a worthy member of the Masonic Fraternity, and by his particular request was buried in Masonic order, the Frankfort Lodge and many of the members of the Utica Lodge, attending and performing the last sad and solemn rites of burial of a deceased and worthy brother. The funeral was attended on Sunday the 22d by one of the largest assemblies we ever saw in Frankfort, completely filling in every part the large Presbyterian church, to whom the Editor of this paper, by particular request of the deceased, preached a discourse on the subject of the Resurrection.

In Exeter, January 26th, Mrs. ELIZABETH HUBBARD, wife of Delos Hubbard and daughter of Noah and Paulina Wood, of Salina, aged 23 years.

In the death of the above individual, society is bereaved of one of its brightest members, and of one on whose cheek the rose of health but a few days previous to her death, bloomed as gaily as in any that now live to mourn her loss. Having been married to Mr. Hubbard but fourteen months, she fell asleep amid the fairest prospects of life: too soon to say farewell to her parents; who, being informed of her sudden illness, were hastening to her residence; but who arrived only in time to behold her sleeping beautifully in death.

That she was greatly beloved by her friends and acquaintances, was seen in the intense grief, and solemn mourning, manifested when they knew that she was no more. While she lived she was a Universalist in faith and practice. She is gone! but her bright examples of moral excellence and amiableness of character will remain as an everlasting monument in the memories of those who enjoyed the pleasure of her society.

'Farewell! thy life hath left surviving love
A wealth records and sweet feelings given,
From sorrow's heart a faintness to remove;
By whispers breathing 'less of earth than heaven.'
Thus rests thy spirit still on those, with whom Thy step the path of joyous duty trod,
Bidding them make an altar of thy tomb,
Where chastened thought may offer praise to God.'

The funeral was attended on the 28th in the Union church of Exeter, where the consolations of the Gospel were administered to a large circle of mourning friends (assisted by Br. Hathaway) by the writer. Text—Luke viii: 52—'She is not dead, but sleepeth.'

ANECDOTE.

Br. SKINNER.—In the Boston Trumpet for Feb. 21, is published one of the richest anecdotes, that has fallen under my notice for many a day. Its perusal, stirred my organ of mirthfulness to such a degree, that I have had no symptoms of dyspepsia since, and would fain hope that I am completely cured. The story is so well told, and the joke such a rich one, that I am anxious to have the readers of the Magazine enjoy the pleasure of its perusal. The writer informs us, that the circumstance was related to him, by a venerable clergyman of his acquaintance, who was himself one of the parties.

He had been called upon to marry a couple, who could not be called wealthy perhaps—but who were comfortably well off, as to worldly means, and of very worthy connections. After the ceremonies had been performed, and the company had begun to make themselves merry on the occasion, the parson rose to take his leave. The groom stepped to the door with him, and as he passed out slipped into his hand a coin—at the same time wished him much enjoyment in his vocation, and that his ministerial labors might be crowned with success—while the parson stowed the 'fee' snugly in his pocket. The next morning the money was examined, and the parson was not a little surprised to find it of the value of five mills. Well, what was to be done? His first thought was to keep the whole matter to himself—but as he was very fond of a joke, he did not choose to remain quiet with one of this description resting entirely upon his shoulders. He therefore was soon wending his way to see the other parties concerned. The parson on his arrival was greeted with many smiles by the new married couple; and after the usual topics had been disposed of, addressing himself to the bride, he said, 'it had always been his custom, when he married young people of limited means, to present the marriage fee which he had received, to the bride; he had, it was true, some doubts as to his duty in this case; but he had concluded that it would, at least, be of much service to her as to himself, and he had come expressly for the purpose of making the present, and begged her to receive it'—at the same time placing in her hand the 'half cent' which had been given him the previous evening by the groom. It is easier to imagine than to describe the chagrin which came over the happy pair on the development of the affair. The new husband discovered that in his haste to do his duty, he had drawn on the 'wrong bank' for the sum he had intended to present to the parson—that he had given away his 'pocket charm,' a piece that had never before left him since his childhood—and that 'charm' was now in the hands of his bride, instead of the gold which he had intended for the clergyman! The 'pocket piece,' however, was soon redeemed—by the 'exchange being regulated'—and was returned immediately to its proper repository. At the same time he pledged himself that the anniversary of the affair should be remembered—which pledge was kept for years, by presenting a 'marriage fee' at every recurrence of it, to his esteemed rector.

Now it is barely possible Br. Skinner, that some of the readers of your paper, may have been a little negligent in this 'marriage fee' business; either giving the parson an uncomfortably small fee, (uncomfortable for the parson I mean,) or, what is still more despicable, giving him nothing at all. If there is even one of this class, whose eye glances over this article; let me, in a very private manner, whisper one little word of advice into his ear. I will not ask him what induced him to do so mean a thing, for he probably would not answer me a word. But I will simply say to him, 'Sir, if you have sinned in the above manner, and still wish to sleep sound o' nights, untroubled by dreams and spectres of parsons starving in consequence of your penuriousness; go, even at this late hour, and make the 'amende honorable,' by sending in a good round donation, and following it up in the same manner, on each returning anniversary of your wedding day.' That's all.

UNITARIANS AND UNIVERSALISTS—MR. BUCKINGHAM'S DEFENCE.

Trenton, Feb. 16, 1846.

Dear Sir,—A friend has put into my hands a copy of your paper of the sixth instant, in which I find that an attempt is made to bring upon 'Unitarians' the charge of illiberality; and my own name bears a prominent place among those whose conduct is pronounced the most illiberal.

I regret to see this charge, because enough is done on all sides to divide Christians one from another: and, for myself, I am not conscious of one feeling of unkindness towards the members of any denomination. That particular instances of illiberality may be found among Unitarians, is no more a matter of surprise, than that individual Christians should be often false to the general principles of the Christian religion. Quakers have been found, who have feared to confide in their own pacific views, and have assumed arms, and died with them in their hands: and believers in the doctrine of election have, doubtless, often prayed to God for the salvation of all mankind; yet neither inconsistency can be alleged as a general charge against the characters of Quakers or Calvinists. The character of a religious denomination it is very difficult to decide upon, by means of a few instances of conduct in individuals: and the attempt to decide, by means so limited, reminds one of the man, in the school book, who, having a house to sell, carried around with him a brick as a specimen.—Denominations of people must stand upon their general merits. If the charge of illiberality can be substantiated against any large number of Unitarians, I can only regret that they furnish another instance of inconsistency with professions.

But when the name of Dr. Channing is alluded to, the general character of his life, his enlarged philanthropy, and his careful regard for the mental rights of other men, ought, I think, to prove a sufficient defence against any charge of illiberality. He was not afraid of being counted among the humble. His ready sympathy with the Abolitionists, and his countenance given to them, when they were much less numerous and honored than now, and indeed were every where spoken against, is a striking proof of his elevation above the narrow limits of sectarian prejudice. The limits of a denomination were with him of much less account than with most of us. Very likely, as the instance alluded to in Utica, Dr. Channing never heard of the very liberal offer made by the Universalists, and would have rejoiced to accept it, had he known it. (1) I know that such would have been the feeling of one, who has given tone to the Unitarian denomination, as much as any man, Henry Ware, Jr.; for in conversation with him upon a similar subject, he expressed himself pained that it was rejected. (2)

In reference to the expression, which it is professed I used in a lecture, I can only reply that it is difficult, at any time, to defend one's self against the charge of incivility. My discourse was written; and I can find nothing of the kind upon its pages: and, though, as other preachers do, I sometimes enlarge with a word or two upon my written notes, I am not aware of having used the expression; and can only think that, if the reporter did not misunderstand me, the expression must have been applied to some particular point, or made with some qualification. I believe that all the Universalists in my congregation will bear testimony, however little they may agree with my sentiments, that I have been scrupulously careful in my pulpit exercises to avoid trespassing beyond the bounds of the most honorable and gentlemanly discussion. I hope that I am free from charges upon this score; if not, I must fall back upon the humble plea of very earnestly good intentions.

I am charged with having declined to exchange with Mr. Grosh. For this gentleman, it is superfluous for me, in your paper to express any commendation. With little personal intercourse, I have always been taught to entertain unqualified respect for him. I am not aware of having ever made up my mind to decline an exchange with any Universalist clergyman. I am not aware of having ever declined an exchange with any man of any denomination. I am not aware that Mr. Grosh ever made application to me for an exchange: I can not recall it to my mind that he ever made any application in personal intercourse with a view to exchanging, or that he ever addressed me in writing upon the subject; nor am I aware that any person ever applied to me in behalf of him. I have often heard of a flying rumor to the same effect as your language, (3) but its origin I am utterly unable to account for.

But I must add that, before the community, I wish to have my own views distinctly understood. The Unitarians, as a denomination, have enough to endure from prejudice, without the added charge of disbelief in future retribution. I conceive the Universalist denomination to be a Christian denomination, as much as my own, or any one. But in advocating the views, which I hold, of religious truth, I do not wish to be impeded by the continual necessity to prove my own orthodoxy, on a point wherein I am not altogether a heretic. It seems to be asking too much of Unitarians, misunderstood as they are, to require them to take a stand, wherein they will only be more widely misunderstood.

I do not feel that, while I allow the name of Christians to all who believe themselves Christians, an exchange of pulpits is the only mode of attesting the fellowship which I am glad to give. I might, for various reasons, decline exchanges, with ministers, in whose Christian character I had the highest confidence. I might, with the utmost modesty, believe another's doctrines to be unsound, and therefore not to be introduced with my own approbation into a pulpit committed to my charge. A mere want of acquaintance would be a sufficient reason for preferring to address my people myself, rather than to ask a stranger to preach in my place. A great difficulty occurs in exchanges between preachers of different denominations: the very words, which we severally use, are sometimes used in different senses: and the labor of giving explanation, and the fear of giving offence through language well understood at home, but liable to be misconstrued abroad, renders exchanges at times unadvisable to persons between whom the kindest possible feelings are reciprocated. (4)

(3) The language referred to was not ours, but that of Mr. Walker the publisher of this paper, by whom the article referred to was written. Ed.

(4) In this and his preceding paragraph, we think Mr. B. discovers his true position, his ground and motives of policy and action. And without charging him with any thing criminal or blameworthy, we think his policy a mistaken one. His organ of cautiousness is very large; but it looks in the wrong direction. For what good or harm have either Unitarians or Universalists to hope or fear from the Orthodox, as such? Plainly, nothing—nothing to hope from their friendship or fear from their enmity, if we are true to our principles, ourselves, and our Master. Ed.

I hope that my letter will prove a sufficient justification of the principles of Unitarians; and if the conduct of the writer has actually been false to them, allow me to congratulate you that the increasing reputation of the Universalist clergy for learning and piety can not always afford, to those who decline exchanges with them, the reasons which you assign. Very respectfully yours,

E. BUCKINGHAM

(1) We think Mr. B.'s conclusion here is probably correct. If we recollect, we were absent from the city at the time, on we should have done ourself the honor of calling upon the Dr. What makes us think Dr. C. would not have rejected the offer (though his pretended friends did for him) is the characteristic named by Mr. B., 'his elevation above the narrow limits of sectarian prejudice,' and the fact which we have heard (from what source we do not now recollect) that he said to a Universalist minister, a short time before his death, that he regretted he had not informed himself more fully than he had done on the subject of our faith, or the general system of doctrine held by Universalists, and cultivated a more intimate acquaintance with them. (2) This may be true of Rev. Henry Ware, Jr., but had it been said of his Br. Wm. Ware, we should certainly doubt the applicability of the characteristic to him. We once had a specimen of Wm. THE FANATICISM OF PERSONAL INFLICTION.

BY REV. J. R. JOHNSON.

What is Fanaticism? The most satisfactory definition of this word which I have seen, is the following by an English author—'Fanaticism is enthusiasm inflamed by hatred.' The mere enthusiast, is an individual who engages in a work with inflated zeal without virulence: The fanatic is fired with the zeal of the enthusiast, with malignant hatred to opposing powers superadded. The reader will at once see what a dangerous host of influences make up the sum-total of the fanatic's character—what destructive elements rage in his bosom.

Fanaticism then, has two evil currents—(1.) These elements in some cases break forth on the field of human misery in the form of pestilence, war, murder, anguish and torment. And volcanoes, earthquakes, and terrific hurricanes are articles in the fanatic's creed; all of which (in a moral sense) he hurls with infuriated malignity against those who deny the truthfulness of his favorite religious dogmas. He does not lurk about like a serpent in the grass to seize his victim unexpectedly; but soars like a bird of prey in mid-heaven, and looks down with the most deadly hatred upon all whom he deems his opponents, and implores the aid of malignant invisible powers to give efficiency to his efforts of signal vengeance.

(2.) But the fanaticism of which we wish to treat in this article, turns its current in upon the individual in the form of personal infliction.

There is a species of religious fanaticism quite too prevalent in our world, which teaches that heaven belongs by right of merit to those only who humble their pride by continued personal torment. Such a religionist becomes a misanthrope—to him the world is all wrong—he is sullen,—and in his demeanor there is an effort to calm the external appearance of his features and conduct, while in his very soul there is an undercurrent which runs and whirls with the vehemence of a bottomless lake while the surface is calm. He can not get to heaven without praying and fasting often. Hence he is often forced to these antics against his will. He lives only in misery that he may gain happiness hereafter. He courts disappointment, thirst, hunger, cold and heat,—and in every volition aims to meet the severest cross. If this only will subject man to obey God, it is a pitiable triumph! 'Must we not mourn the infatuation of our nature, as we (in imagination) watch the ascent of the soul that climbs the skies only to carry there a sullen defiance of Eternal Justice!' Yes,—such an infatuation is truly lamentable. Yet how pitiable does the religious world talk of God's justice! Such bigots are like a bird of prey who has been wounded by the shepherd's shafts, and his plumage ruffled, now flaps his wings and fronts the sun with his torn breast to boast before heaven of his audacity and his wounds!

In the mother church there are more self-inflicting fanatics than in the Protestant world in proportion to their distinctive numbers. If Protestant histories be correct, the Catholic Monasteries in the Eastern world are but so many hot-beds of vice, and depositories for the means of self-infliction. In the Nunneries the Priests bear rule by their means, and prey upon their followers—make them the sport of their rapacious desires, all of which insults their deluded victims take as self-infliction to keep them humble, and thus secure their future felicity.

Again. This fanaticism frequently drives its deluded votaries to withdraw from all communion with the rest of mankind. The records of the past certify us, that in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, the northern forests of Europe were interspersed with wandering hermits who resisted the most intense cold without shelter or clothing. In France these hermits refused the shelter of caverns in the mountainous regions—strolled about naked, and at night were wont to repose on beds of snow! Others were found dead with tremendous setons in their bodies and limbs! These were some of the fruits of Catholicism in the dark ages,—and among some of the eastern nations, these are but little modified at the present day.

But, has not the fanaticism of self-infliction obtained to some extent in the Protestant church?—Has not this sentiment obtained among the self-styled orthodox? Do not the priests bind heavy burdens on men's shoulders which they carry through life without resistance? Do not these priests 'make the hearts of the righteous sad?' and do they not make war upon the innocent amusements of society? How they oppress and gush the spirits of the young, by falsely making religion a grievous burthen, instead of a pious pleasure! What tales of anguish and grief of soul are rehearsed in class-meetings, prayer-meetings and orthodox conferences! How the followers of Christ are afflicted—how they wrestle with the devil and the most grievous temptations which God sends upon them to try their faith! How they bow down their backs always, and are through life the most pitiable slaves to the workings of their own imaginations, and a false theology!

Now the doctrines of a future wrathful judgment, endless misery, and the revengeful character of God, as held by thousands of Christians, are but so many means of self-infliction, 'rendering society irksome, nourishment insipid, friendship disgusting, and life itself a cruel bitter.' O! how unlike the fruits of that Gospel which gives peace to the soul, and kindles the fire of love to God and man on the consistent Christian heart—that Gospel which breathes peace on earth and good will to men!

That self-examination which the Gospel is calculated to inspire, is not calculated to make us wretched, but happy. When we curb our passions we add to our enjoyments—if we repent of our sins we are promised the oil of joy for mourning, the garments of praise for the spirit of heaviness. Let us follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth; for 'then shall our peace flow as a river, and our righteousness as the waves of the sea.' Amen!

THE LIGHT OF OUR FAITH SHINING IN DARKNESS.

BY REV. N. BROWN.

Every true Christian, of whatsoever sect or name, knows and feels that there is a voice within his heart which pleads for a world's complete blessedness and glory, and that the natural impulses and sympathies of the soul are in harmony with the doctrine which thousands openly profess to abominate and despise. Every true Christian hopes, prays and desires that the grace of God may at last triumph over every sinful heart and reconcile a world to the Father. His soul at times is filled with boundless love for universal man; he is, often times, in spite of his narrow creed, disposed to look upon God as the kind Father of all, and upon man as his brother. His soul is filled with ecstasy; his joy is heavenly and full, but alas! the hand writing of his narrow creed is presented before him and fills his heart with terror and dismay. He trembles to think that Satan himself may be tempting his soul to put too much confidence in the mercy and grace of God. He shrinks and trembles like a miserable slave before the light which 'shineth in darkness,' and fancies it but an ignis fatuus of the evil one, which, if followed in the direction to which it points, will lead to the darkness of eternal night and black despair!

Do I not speak the experience of thousands on this point? It will not be denied. It was once the bitter experience of the writer himself. For many years his heart, his very soul yearned to embrace the glorious Gospel in its beauty and fulness, but alas! he feared that by putting unlimited confidence in the grace of God he should peril his eternal salvation and become a 'cast-away.' Satan he feared was using his wicked arts to ensnare his soul by tempting him to hope and pray for the salvation of the whole world. At length however, he became convinced that God himself implanted these desires and yearnings in the human heart; that the light of his truth was struggling to penetrate the soul and lead him to embrace with confidence the Gospel of a full salvation.

God is now diffusing this light more and more throughout the Christian world. He is inclining the hearts of Christians of every sect and clime to extend the grace and mercy of the Father; to soften down the roughness of human creeds, and to mould them more in accordance with the spirit of Jesus and the benevolent desires and yearnings of the soul.

A great and glorious work indeed has been accomplished in the Christian world during the half century past. In almost every Christian land the changes in human creeds and confessions of faith, have been unparalleled, constant and numerous. And nearly all these changes have been for the better; they have been so many approximations to our own faith; or, if you please, they have been so many assimilations to the spirit and doctrine of universal grace. Grim and hoary-headed errors, once esteemed as essential or saving truths, have been utterly discarded and buried in the grave of oblivion. Other kindred errors are now barely tolerated and suffered to remain in the mouldering records of neglected creeds. Their former zealous admirers and advocates are ashamed to bring them to the light of the present age, and hence, they must soon sink to the same oblivious grave, or be cast to the 'moles and the bats' which infest the ruinous temple of the tyrant superstition.

The light of our holy faith is dawning upon the hearts of all true Christians, though most of them know it not, and comprehend it not. It 'shineth in darkness, but the darkness comprehends it not.' This light, the light of our own faith is remoulding the human mind and expanding the affections of the soul. It is making the age in which we live as emphatically a benevolent age—a peace loving age. The original nobleness and dignity of human nature are beginning to be appreciated and are better understood. Nobler views of God and of the design of human and divine punishments are making progress in the Christian world. This heavenly light is beginning to penetrate all hearts. It is silently though effectually infusing its hallowed influence where once bigotry, fanaticism and narrow views were the predominate characteristics of the professed followers of Christ. It is crumbling down the gloomy monuments of religious error and inclining the hearts of all true Christians to join mutually in the laudable work of building up a common temple of righteousness and truth. It is inclining the hearts of a great portion of the ministers of Christ of every sect throughout the land to foster and inculcate more enlarged views of God, and more extended views of charity and mercy for the sinful and degraded of our race. Less fear and more love is now preached from the sacred desk.

Visit their sanctuaries of worship; listen to their public ministrations, and it will soon be discovered that the doctrines which we would term pure, practical Universalism are preached at least occasionally in almost every pulpit, and in others, they are the principal themes of discourse from Sabbath to Sabbath. The age in which we live, public opinion, the hearts of all benevolent Christians require this course; all demand this more congenial food. In short, these ministers of Christ, though subscribing to narrow creeds, are fast approximating to the spirit and doctrine of our faith. Many of them really preach as near the truth of the Restitution as they actually dare! The nearer they come to our faith in their public ministrations, the more are their congregations edified and instructed; especially if they entertain no very decided suspicions that their spiritual guides are preaching against their own creeds, and feeding them with the spiritual bread of Universalism.

Should this communication meet the eyes of any of a limited faith, I hope they will not take alarm at what we have here said, nor commence a 'labor' with their beloved pastors for departing from the original land-marks of established creeds. We will here venture to recommend an infallible test by which all may know whether their spiritual guides deal out to them the true bread of heaven, or only the dry and bitter crusts of error. If their hearts instinctly receive the doctrines proclaimed from the sacred desk; if they are drawn out in more love for God and man; if they feel that the spirit of love instead of the spirit of wrath has been more effectual in touching the right chord in the yearning soul, be assured they have been listening to the pure Gospel of Christ, and not to heresy or soul endangering errors!

These ministers of a limited faith, many of them at least, are unsuspicious concerning the inevitable tendency of the spirit of the doctrines they now preach. They are gradually verging to the very doctrine which they profess to dread and to denounce as error, and they know it not. 'The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not.' They are gradually, though certainly, approaching the eternal rock of our own blessed faith, and yet their spiritual vision is darkened that they behold not distinctly the path in which they tread.

God grant, that the time may soon arrive, when the full blaze of heaven's eternal truth shall scatter this darkness from their minds and penetrate their hearts, that they may discover that the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation is the true bread of heaven and the perfection and fulness of all revealed truth. Then will they be prepared to shout, 'Glory to God in the highest—peace on earth, good will to men!'

IT IS A POOR RULE, THAT WILL NOT WORK BOTH WAYS.

Br. WALKER—Permit me through the medium of the good old 'Magazine and Advocate,' to offer a few thoughts, for the consideration of all concerned.

There is a class of men in our country, who have been usually called the 'world's people.'—This class of individuals is composed, in part, of what for distinction's sake, we will call Universalists. They have been solicited, in connection with these wicked 'world's people,' (for a series of years,) to aid in furnishing means, for the erection of churches of an opposite faith, to their own—and in many instances, have contributed liberally, of their hard earnings, for this purpose.

Now, I shall venture the assertion, that the class of men referred to, has helped the Methodist denomination alone, to an amount sufficient to pay one quarter of the expenses incurred, in building the numerous churches they have erected in our land—and in addition to this, they have furnished, at least, one eighth of the means for the support of their clergy; besides contributing liberally to the support of most of the other sects.

Under these circumstances, I can see no impropriety in calling on these brethren for the interest on the principal thus advanced. Let then, a judicious brother be appointed in our societies, to wait on the most rational and liberal among them, and ask them, respectfully, to subscribe a reasonable amount to sustain a Universalist ministry in their midst—and although some will undoubtedly demur, and even refuse; yet, if they mean to be consistent, a few will subscribe—for many only affect to despise Universalism, while at the same time, they honestly confess, that they hope it is true. And a great proportion of these brethren are uninformed, as to what the doctrine really is, and have misconceived altogether the means put in requisition by us, and the end in view.

Try it, brethren; go to them in the spirit of our Master—go to all the most liberal among the different sects, and try it—and if at first you do not succeed—do as they do. 'Try again.' It is but a reasonable request—it will in some cases succeed; and they will then feel an interest in your meetings, and occasionally attend—and in this way, some benighted minds may be enlightened and brought to own the truth—yea, to acknowledge that 'the one half hath not been told them;' since they may discover, by this means, that Jesus is indeed the Christ, the Son of God, and Saviour of the world.

THE POWER OF THE GOSPEL TO OVERCOME INJURIES.

That the principle of love is all sufficient for the extermination of sin—all believers in the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ admit; but that it is expedient, in all cases, to leave, so to speak, all difficulties arising in consequence of sin, to be settled by the never failing and ever rightful influence of love; appears not to be so generally conceded by the Christian world, at least, in practical life. But, should expediency, that standing excuse for sin, be permitted, in any case, to usurp the dominion proper of love, and ordain that this, and this, and that sin must be removed by this or that coercive, or retaliatory measure? Is not love exhibited in simple acts of kindness, the strongest disciplinary force that can be brought to bear upon any individual, however obnoxious he may be to the law of right? Take an extreme case.—A poor profligate man, degraded by vicious practices, to that lost condition in which it is said, the conscience is seared and the man rendered utterly impervious to any good influence, is subjected to the rigorous administration of law—he is arraigned—tried—condemned and imprisoned. Chains and manacles are cast about his body. Indignities are heaped upon his mind. He writes beneath the lash, and groans in bitterness of spirit. But his humanity is only crushed—not subdued; his hard heart grows harder, and his unholy passions burn more fiercely, and with a more deadly flame. Reverse the order of warfare against this man. Lay aside the rigors of law—the prison—and all the carnal weapons connected therewith; and bring to bear upon the unhappy man, the softening influences of love—breathe kindly in his ear—address him by the endearing name of friend—brother—instead of culprit—villain—wretch; and the hard heart melts—the seared conscience sends forth a quick pulsation through his whole body. He feels and acknowledges his faults—forsake them and is reformed. Is any proof asked for the truth of the principle involved in this supposition? I need only mention the Washingtonian reform to fill the mind with proofs almost innumerable, from the experiences of reformed inebriates. Proofs, that far transcend, in thrilling reality, my poor attempts at description. Living testimonials of the superior efficacy of love, to subdue the heart, enlighten the mind and reform the life. Instances—where all other means had failed—where the vengeful sword of so called justice had smitten in vain—where the cold scorn of a cold world, and the colder neglect of a colder church, had fallen, to no good purpose—where the abandonment of friends, the maledictions of the pulpit, and the thundering bulls of excommunication of the professed followers of Christ, had served only to sink the victim of intemperance, still lower in the mire of licentiousness and the slime of sensual indulgence; and is it necessary to ask Christians, why they do not lay aside all carnal weapons, and use only the spirit of love in all kindness and truth—and that too in all cases?

My brother, have I offended in word or in deed? And am I not entitled to be treated as a brother? Am I not within the reach of love? Or if thought to be beyond, or unworthy its kindly exercises—is there any use in assailing me with other weapons—since none other can compare with love, in power and efficiency? Am I obnoxious to suspicion? Should not love whisper soothingly and invitingly to the ear of my heart, what a brother's love would fain not believe, instead of the noisy winds of common rumor, being charged with hearsay accusations, and blown disastrously upon my unsuspecting mind? Have I really offended a brother?—And am I not, by every principle of Christianity—every rule of Christian intercourse—entitled to hear first, from the deep fountains of that brother's love—which my sin may have broken up—in gushing accents of affection, what is the length and breadth of my offence? Ought scandal to be busy with my name, at the suggestion of my brother, while he to my face wears the appearance of my best friend? Brethren, place yourselves where, for the sake of illustration, I have supposed myself to be, and answer in your minds the foregoing questions; and see if the Gospel, as manifested in its forgiving, loving spirit, is not all potent to overcome all injuries?

THE DOCTRINE OF ELECTION.

The opinions formerly so prevalent in this country concerning election, but now being fast abandoned, were nurtured in the dark ages, and were finally reduced to a system under the patronage of Calvin, whose name—though the doctrine is much changed—it still bears. This doctrine is so strikingly similar to the opinions of human rights, and the political institutions of those times in which it rose, that its origin, if not design, is easily traced. Rulers were then supposed to have a divine right to do wrong. The common people were supposed to be incapable of doing ought good without compulsion. They were considered a part of a lordlings inheritance, and when a ruler or teacher was elected to any post of dignity, it was for his good; it was a sinecure, and he often was but a legalized plunderer. The people had no acknowledged rights. All authority and rights came, as was supposed, from the sovereign, who it was said could do no wrong. Might was right. The king made all elections, and his subjects held even their lives at his pleasure. He elected his favorites, and they devoured the people.

The old doctrine of election was a perfect counterpart and justification of this 'convenient doctrine for tyrants.' It represented man totally depraved; and, in a state of nature, incapable of even thinking any thing good. A few were elected to favor and this included an endless curse to the non-elect; and this was called just and right because God had power to do it. Power made all right! In fact the contests between the Pope and Henry VIII and some of the other misnamed reformers of those times, was a mere strife for the right to rule—to open or to shut heaven.

It is very singular, however, that in this country, while that kind of election has been long since rejected from the civil, many still cling to it in religious matters, or as belonging to the Divine government. Instead of denying what the Scriptures plainly teach, viz., election, let us see its real principles, and I trust we shall find nothing objectionable. For what are our civil rulers elected? Is it to bring a curse upon the non-elect? No, far from it. The object of elections is to select a few for the benefit of the whole mass of community.—This is the design, though people may err and make a bad election. Not so with Deity; all his elections are wise and are designed to benefit the non-elect. Paul was elected before his conversion.—(Acts ix: 16.) He was a chosen vessel to bear God's name to the Gentiles. Now this election was clearly for the benefit of the non-elect. Christ also was 'God's chosen servant, his elect,' and yet who disputes that this was for the benefit of the non-elect? He alone was elected to save the world.

The old systems of government were founded on a plan of selfishness; taking a narrow and limited view, the powerful attempted to board up all the blessings of life to themselves; not seeing there was enough for all if impartially distributed. The theological system partook of the same spirit. Men called themselves the elect and claimed the whole of divine grace to themselves, to the exclusion of others, and limited God's goodness to the standard of their own selfishness.

Our ancestors broke the chains of the old political system of elections, which were a curse to the people and only a benefit to the favored aristocrats. Let us shake off the religious system, founded on the same false principle of cursing the non-elect, and receive our Saviour's election as he defines it: 'The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised.'

All good elections are not merely to benefit those who receive these favors, but are designed, and those God appoints will be, for the benefit of all.

TWO QUESTIONS.

I. WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY?—Briefly the last (and probably final) revelation God has made of himself and his providence to man. In it, are distinct and full exemplifications of man's destiny and all duties which the problem of life involves. The basis of this divine manifestation is unrestricted benevolence, to which all mysteries of why God could so love, and so do, for man, must be referred. Christianity is less a dogmatic or symbolic system than is usually supposed. It has doctrines, however, which agreeably affect allied faculties in man, and develop them in a God-like manner. The doctrine of God's love develops the love God has implanted in man. Christianity differs from the Law, or all legal systems, in its mode of operations: instead of compelling a conformity to, it assimilates the soul to God, in the right. The former is weak through the flesh: the latter is the power of God, because of love; the one hammers and seeks to make smooth the outside, but makes nothing perfect as pertains to the conscience; the other melts down the whole material and separates the dross. The one is based upon commandments contained in ordinances, the other upon truth in love. Christianity in its aims and ends, has the highest good and perfection of man in view. 'Peace on earth and good will to man,' pretty fully expresses what this religion is in its mission to the world. The devoted labors of Christ, its author and testator, go very far to show its intentions. If ever love and good will received sure testimonies, the Son of God gave them: he hated none—he loved all, lived for all, died for all, and, by the appointment of God, is the Saviour of all. We may, then, consider Christ, whose name gave name to Christianity, as the central sun in this new moral world, whose light is to enlighten every one that shall have existence. His light is still but the light of God, as he is the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person. So much for the first question.

II. WHAT IS A CHRISTIAN?—The true answer to this oft asked question must, in some degree, be drawn from the preceding remarks, in which case the answer may be thus given: a conscious human being who has embodied in his character, or internal life, the principles of Christianity; so that every act shall be tinctured with the spirit it breathes. When Christianity is embraced (in the sense of encircling the soul of its affections) we are of course governed, and to be governed, by its teachings; and our conduct, thus directed, will make us characteristically Christians, and in no other sense can we be such. As Christianity does not present a code of rules, some may ask, how are we to know in all cases in what way to conform our acts to it? It is admitted that its teachings are given in a general sense, but in such a way as to cover every particular in a sufficiently intelligible form; as, for instance, what shall we do when we find a man's cattle in his corn field? It does not say in such a case that we should drive them out, nor inform him; but 'Do to others as you would have them do to you.' It says do as you would for yourself: that is, if we are to love, or do love our neighbor as ourselves. Things that are alike are classed together. If therefore Christ is a true pattern of a Christian life, the exact imitators him of are true Christians; all, short of this, is in degree only, and coming short of that perfection he evinced. A man is a Christian in so far as he follows Christ. Some questions of matters of common occurrence arise. As all are agreed in the impropriety of the epithets; Christian thief, Christian robber, Christian murderer, or more general, Christian devil, or sinner, yet men who sustain any or all these characters are thus recognised. Hence the powerful sanction, which trainings, wars, slavery, in short every brutality, receive by an unholy alliance. The Saviour associated with sinners, not their sins, with the intent to call them away (not drive) from them. Universal benevolence is a true Christian trait; God loves all men, so should we; else we are not 'followers of him as dear children.' This is an elementary process as well as the highest development of the Christian life. We never injure them we love. 'Let us love one another for love is of God.'

LIVING IN GLASS HOUSES.

The Baptist Register of the 13th ult. has an article copied from the Methodist paper at Auburn, headed, 'Universalism shown up,' in which Universalists are represented as encouraging sin by teaching that the 'moral world will be as happy without piety, as with it, and that all mankind irrespective of the threatenings of God, will be made holy and happy hereafter,' a charge which the writer, E. P. Burriel, knows, or ought to know, is wholly false. In the same number of the Register notice is given that the Rev. Alvah Whitman, pastor of the Baptist church of Parma was, on the 22d of January, deposed from the office of the Christian ministry for the crime of adultery! We will venture to say that he too was in the habit of declaiming against Universalism on account of its immoral tendency.

This reminds me of an incident that occurred recently within my own knowledge. I was 'doing up' some articles which an old lady had purchased of me in some of the old numbers of the Magazine and Advocate, which I had procured for wrapping paper, when an individual who is very bitter against Universalism, remarked that the name Evangelical was a wrong one for the paper—that it ought to be named the False Prophet or Soul Destroyer. This manner of speaking of the paper he commenced twice during the time I was doing up the articles. After he had left, a person who had been seated by the stove informed me that he had, when he was, as he thought, unobserved by others, taken a handful of articles of mine and slipped them into his side pocket! The above mentioned true transaction is not given for the purpose of injuring or mortifying our friends of other denominations. Far from it. It is only mentioned for the purpose of showing them that people who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones. I have always observed that the most bitter opponents of Universalism, those who were the most cruel and malignant in their treatment of its believers, and who have had more than all others to say about its immoral tendency, have generally, in the long run, proved themselves to be the most worthless and rotten-hearted among our Partialist friends. This experience, both in Utica and out of it, has fully proved to be true. Will then our Partialist opponents who have so many painful 'causes of humility' staring them in the face, never cease their hue and cry about the immoral tendency of Universalism? W. R.

Br. WALKER—The following is from the pen of Mr. John Decker, a man who possesses, (so far as I have been able to learn) the confidence of his neighbors in the integrity of his character. He has discoursed upon the great salvation to those in his neighborhood, and is anxious to do something in the vineyard of his Master. I hope you will send him the Magazine and Advocate, relying upon his exertions to procure subscribers or to contribute to its columns to compensate you. J. S.

A BRIEF SKETCH OF MY EXPERIENCE.

At the age of nineteen I espoused the cause of religion, and united with the Methodists; then a pious, godly people. With them I continued twenty-three years; eighteen of which I was an official member of that body—six years a class leader; six years an exhorter, and six years a preacher among them. But a change in my views caused a separation between us. I found, by perusing the Scriptures of divine truth, that I had all this while embraced sentiments that were erroneous, and attended with pernicious consequences. I found that God was love, and that 'his tender mercies were over all his works,' and that, 'if we sin, we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous, who is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness.'—That he was 'the propitiation for our sins and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world.' For about eight years I have been entirely silent; but feeling my responsibility to my heavenly Father and to my fellow men, I have recently commenced advocating in public the cheering doctrine of the Restitution; and that under the most unfavorable circumstances; being poor and destitute of the means of instruction, (except the Bible.) I would, Br. Walker, earnestly solicit your assistance. If you are willing to send me the Advocate, I will endeavor to forward to you the necessary compensation in the course of the year. Your brother, JOHN DECKER.

THE TWENTY-THIRD PSALM.

This Psalm has always been considered a beautiful pastoral. The versions of Addison, and Merrick, and Watts, are much admired for their poetical beauties, which originate in the inherent loveliness of the Psalm. None of them, however, retains the literal language and phraseology of our English translation of the Bible; the absence of which must necessarily detract from the beauty and directness of the composition. The following version is an attempt to preserve the literal expression as far as the limits of versification will admit; and is the second effort of a youthful aspirant to versify the beauties of the 'sweet singer of Israel.'

The Lord is my shepherd,
I never shall want;
My constant supporter,
I never shall faint.

He leadeth me kindly
While on him I lean,
Beside the still waters,
Through pastures of green.

My soul he restoreth,
And guideth my youth,
For his holy name's sake,
In the pathway of truth.

Though I walk through the valley
And shadow of death,
I will fear for no evil
That darkens my path;

For thou, Lord, art with me,
A lamp on my way;
Thy rod and thy staff
Are my comfort and stay.

Thou preparest a table
Before me, to shine
(A token of triumph)
With fatness and wine.

My head thou anointed
With the oil of thy love;
My cup runneth over
Thy blessings to prove.

Surely goodness and mercy
Shall follow my days,
And the Lord in his house
I will evermore praise.

THE TWO THIEVES.

BY PIXLEY FIGGLETRAP, ESQ.

During a beautiful morning, as I and my friend Swackhammer were leisurely walking down the main street in the pleasant little village of Puckerville, we observed a man walking slowly across the public square, directly before us. Swackhammer, as was his custom, for he had an itching desire of knowing every body, inquired who it was; and as a matter of course I gave him his name, and at the same time related an anecdote respecting the gentleman, and as it may be as new to you as to him, I will record the same for your perusal.

That man has long held the office of Deacon in the old church in Puckerville; an office for which nature surely designed him. Deacon, now-a-days, though we hope that there are some honorable exceptions, is but another name for a tight, stingy, unfeeling, and narrow-minded lump of mortality; and such, is surely characteristic of Deacon Longface now before us. His cognomen is not out of place, for it is now in the middle of the week, and yet his face is of no ordinary length, and upon the Sabbath day, in the sanctuary of public worship, his visage is as lank and long as a poet's purse. His very walk, even, shows that his mind is bent upon but one object, and that object the attainment of perfection in matters of faith; and though beset with numerous temptations, yet he has it in his creed that by perseverance he will finally triumph. It is seldom that a smile is beheld upon his countenance. His thoughts are upon the solemn realities of eternity; or at least they are so, to all appearance, yet he has contrived by various twists and turns to amass something of a fortune. But out upon the presumptuous man who would dare to breathe the thought that the Deacon's treasure, or heart, is upon the earth! Better, far better, beard a lion in his den, or have a millstone hanged about his neck and be thrown into the depths of the sea, than to rouse the holy ire of this pious saint. And then listen to that voice in the sanctuary. It is the voice of religious perfection. Again and again we have harkened to its solemn tones, while with becoming reverence he was offering up the humble petition to the throne of grace.—While a patient listener, there was but one thought in my mind, when the Deacon was engaged in this service, and that was,

'Hark! from the tombs a doleful sound!
Mine ear, attend the cry!'

A charm has been thrown around his name, and his presence is a guaranty of silence and a becoming mien.

Such, in brief, is Deacon Longface, and he has a faithful colleague. You observe him coming up the way; old Mr. Hardfist. He too has been a member of the church for near half a century, and for thirty long years, together with Deacon Longface and the pastor, has watched, ay faithfully watched over the spiritual concerns and temporal affairs of the church. In rotundity of bulk, he is far superior to most of men, for he has used the things of this world, and they in turn have not abused him. As he stands forth there now, it may be observed that he has lost nothing by the way side in his journey through the world. His name is appropriate too, for surely a shilling never went through his hand without paying toll. Behold him now, as he goes up to deposite a trifle in the box for the poor. What gravity in his movements. Every eye is upon him. He holds up his hand—stands away back and reaches so carefully—the shilling is between his thumb and finger—there! he has dropped it in, as true as the life! But let the man who makes a bargain with him to-morrow—when! this treacherous pen come near uttering a foul slander upon the Deacon's name, and had it succeeded, it never should have been wielded again! But these two men, who have long been looked upon as lights in Zion, have yet a strange name, a name that they have carried for twenty years, and probably will carry from henceforth until they depart for the spirit-land.—Long indeed have they been known by the name of 'the two thieves.' Not because they have stolen 'the livly of heaven to serve the devil in,' no; but the appellation was thrown upon them in this wise—

Something more than twenty years ago there abode in the village of Puckerville, an outlandish, luckless wight, by the name of Jacobus, or as he was familiarly called, long Jake; a name given him because of his uncommon altitude of person. In his more youthful days, he had fallen most shockingly in love with a coquettish jade, who after getting him full fast in the net of affection, suddenly 'set her cap' in an opposite direction, and left poor Jake to mourn over the inconstancy of woman's plighted vows. This so wrought upon his feelings, that in the end, his mind became completely crazed, and he wandered forth, a jilted, crack-brained wight; again proving that 'the course of true love never did run smooth.' Uncaring and uncared for, he became a lounge about our village, doing an errand for this man and another for that man, and thus 'by hook and by crook,' a turn here and a turn there, he was enabled to get on in that journey which mankind are travelling—from the cradle to the grave! Upon the Sabbath he would often wander in to church, and it was not an uncommon circumstance for him upon such occasions, to put in a word or two now and then, by way of helping the speaker along with his discourse, and the better to enable the hearer to comprehend the subject; but all knowing Jake, it was seldom minded, and a look or a nod from the pastor was enough to ensure silence. Soon after the present pastor was called to take charge of the flock, that is to say, some twenty years ago, while he was delivering a flaming discourse upon the 'perseverance of the saints,' in came Jake, and seated himself with becoming gravity, for Jake could be grave, or gay, to suit the circumstances of the case; but at this time he hardly knew whether gravity or hilarity should reign, because it was difficult to discover whether the sermon was intended as a kind of burlesque, or as a real dissertation upon a cherished point of religious faith. But Jake was soon deeply engaged with the speaker, and at the end of every period he would signify his acquiescence by speaking out in a loud and strong voice, 'correct.' After thus speaking four or five times, the pastor stopped short in his discourse, for it was evident that he was not a little discomfited, and discovering by the stare of the congregation that Jake was not one of the elect, addressed him on this wise:—'Keep still there my friend; listen to the word of God; make your peace before it is everlastingly too late; if you leave the world in your present state of mind, hell is your portion to all eternity!' 'Correct!' shouted Jake in a voice that fairly startled the congregation. The minister sat right down. Up rose the two deacons, and each taking Jake by an arm, started for the door. When about half way down the aisle, Jake's wit became absolutely ungovernable, and he burst out in a kind of laughing tone—'here I go, my brethren, as the Saviour went out of the world—between two thieves!'

There was a general twitter in all parts of the house. Deacon Longface's upper lip gave a kind of spasmodic twitch, as much as to say, 'vengeance rest upon the crack-brained fool;' while Deacon Hardfist's nose turned up a few, as if in utter contempt of all the Jacobus tribe! But that name stuck like a lump of shoemaker's wax, and they have not been able to shake it off to this day.

A PRAYING PEOPLE.

COMPARATIVE INFLUENCE OF UNIVERSALISM AND ORTHODOXY, SO CALLED.

In Br. Rogers' 'Memoranda,' he gives the following interesting conversation and remarks:—

'I was concerned in an incident and conversation about this time, an account whereof may be interesting, as throwing some light on the question of the practical influences of my faith, as contrasted with that of endless misery. I was journeying toward the mouth of Tunkhannock creek, which is the most considerable stream in Susquehanna county; being overtaken by night, I obtained accommodations for myself at a farm-house on the road. The family and myself were entire strangers to each other. With the man of the house, Esquire M., I was soon engaged in a free conversation on various topics, which lasted till bed time; but nothing transpired to elicit a discovery of my religious sentiments. Previous to my departure in the morning, however, I perceived that my host had a curiosity on that head, and without waiting for him to overcome his delicacy so far as to question me thereupon—which in a yankee usually requires no great while—I informed him that I was the pastor of the Universalist societies of Brooklyn and Harford. I perceived at once that he was pained at the announcement; a shade of pity passed over his countenance as he said, in a dejected tone, 'I am sorry to hear that, my young friend. I had conceived an unusual liking for you, and was led from your conversation to believe you a Christian. And so, you are really a Universalist preacher! So young too! I well knew your predecessor, Mr. Marsh, he also was very young, and of a most lovely character. Dear me! how does it happen that Satan succeeds in enlisting in his service so many persons, who by their amiable personal qualities are so well fitted to captivate and deceive!'

'Is it not possible, sir,' I asked, 'that those amiable persons are in the employ of a different master?'

'I would willingly admit this to be possible,' he replied, 'if I could stretch my charity so far, but I can not.—Universalists, whatever else they may be, are not men of prayer. This young man, you must allow, Universalists are not a praying people.'

'But the Pharisees were, sir; yet it did not prevent them being hypocrites and persecutors. Much, however, depends on the sense you attach to the phrase, praying people, whether we are to be considered such or not. But let that pass. We will, if you please, institute a comparison between those who, in your sense of the title, are praying people, and those who are not so, with regard to their respective characters, moral and social. For, you must allow, sir, that if prayer is of no advantage, in improving the character of a people, they may as well dispense with it.*

He assented to this, and we proceeded to the investigation. We confined ourselves to the parts with which we both were acquainted, beginning at the embouchure of the creek on which he lived.

'That spot by nature,' said I, 'is a most delightful one; the stranger as he passes over is apt to think it must needs be a desirable place of abode, and he is tempted to envy its inhabitants who, being surrounded by so much that invites to the pursuit of peace and virtue, must of course be a contented and happy people. But tell me, sir, truly and unreservedly, how stands the fact?'

'Truly and unreservedly then,' he answered, 'I must own that it is a very corrupt community, and it is also true, nevertheless, that nearly all the persons composing it belong to one or another of the different churches there.'

'And,' added I, 'are what you term praying people, of course? Would it not be better, if they could be termed an amiable and upright people?'

I next inquired his opinion of a neighborhood about ten miles up the same creek, the principal members of which were of, or at least favored, the Universalist faith. He confessed that in moral respects, and for the virtues of charity and hospitality, he could not wish it other than what it was. Only, said I, facetiously, you, perhaps, would wish them to be a praying people.

His own neighborhood came next in turn; as a magistrate he had the fairest possible opportunity of knowing intimately the characters of those who composed it, and they were nearly all of them praying people—members of one church. He shook his head sadly, and owned the advantage there to be altogether on my side. We then, and hastily, compared the Presbyterians and Universalists of Harford—where I then lived—for between these two sects the community was divided; he was well acquainted with the individuals on both sides, and he admitted without reserve that, however estimable those of the former sect might be, those of the latter were, at the least, quite equally so.

Well, said Esquire M., after we had got through the comparison, this is surely a novel mode of testing the worth of people's professions, and numerous prayings! I never before thought of weighing them in such a balance. It is, however, I must own, a very just and satisfactory one.

It is strange that the readers of the Gospel do not see, that Jesus was not, in the cant sense of the phrase, a praying man—although he undoubtedly was so in its nobler sense—so far from it, indeed, that his disciples were under the necessity of asking him for instruction in this branch of devotion, which would not have been the case had they as often heard him exercised therein as modern teachers of religion usually are. But the most virulent and unprincipled persecutors Jesus had, were as praying a people as the world has ever contained. The priest and Levite passed unheeding by their countryman, who lay wounded and bleeding by the road-side; yet they were bending their steps toward the house of God to pray!—The Saviour has thus strikingly shown us, how little influence for good people's prayers sometimes have upon their humane feelings. Christ's kingdom is composed of such as do the will of his Father in heaven, and not of such as say, Lord! Lord!

* With the present inhabitants of the place, the above has nothing to do; fourteen years have since transpired, during which great changes for good may have taken place: it is hoped so at least. About that time, a gang of counterfeiterers had been detected there, nearly all of whom were church members.

A WICKED BOY.—A mischievous boy was seen the other day walking behind a lady, and tossing pebble stones, unperceived by her, towards her person. He did not desist until nearly a peck of them had been lodged upon the shelf formed by her bustle, that projected some 15 inches.

TOPICS FOR REFLECTION.

There are a few subjects, to which we wish to direct the attention of the reader. They are worthy of careful observation, of deep reflection, of patient thought, and of strong examination.

I. The first point we bring up for this purpose, is the notion that nature has no intelligent Creator—that the Being we call God, the good Father, has no existence, no reality; but is a fiction of the fancy; a mere dream of man's desire; without any foundation. Sit down, and reflect on this sweeping conclusion, which boldly denies the existence of any intelligent power, save that which burns feebly and for a few hours in the human soul. By the power of knowledge, bring around you the wonderful works, including man, displayed on the earth, and consider their curious and complicated mechanism, and their perfect adaptation to the object for which they evidently were created—a fact which all wise men see and the ignorant alone deny it. Go out in the still, clear evening—rise on the wings of astronomy among the heavenly bodies—in your minds, stand upon the sun, the inexhaustible fountain of light and heat to our planetary system—ascend to the individual cluster of worlds, of which our planetary system is so insignificant a part, together with millions more hidden from sight by immeasurable distances—leap from cluster to cluster, as they crowd universal space, until you stand at the centre of creation, the capitol of the universe, from whence creative powers go forth in resistless energy. Sit there and muse—reflect well on the absorbing theme, that asks the thrilling question, have all these wonderful works no inventive Creator, and is there no intelligent Power guided by goodness and love, whose strong grasp holds all things in order for wise and benevolent purposes? I am sure, that as your souls feel the warmth of such sublime reflections, the fire of truth will burst from creation, showing you, as the burning bush did Moses, that God exists—while the music which peals from the vast organ of nature, will sing to you the divine song, that all visible things are but so many tokens of the invisible God. And as your souls glow with this irresistible conviction, your reflections will dwell upon the fact, which the Scriptures uphold, that if God is sublime and awful in the productions of his creative energy, he is also a Friend, before whom we can bow with the confidence of children, and say, 'our Father who art in heaven.'

II. Another topic of reflection, is of great interest, viz., the opinion that myriads of intelligent beings will suffer endless agony. Let us here muse carefully—reflect understandingly, throwing away prejudices, prepossessions, and fears. Bring to mind what endless agony is—endeavor to conceive the results which it involves. Think, that if all the misery which has been or ever shall be endured on earth, was concentrated into one bitter hour of suffering, that it would be mildness compared with the exquisite torment which shall overwhelm the soul in the future world. Think, that this torment shall never be alleviated in the least degree, but shall continue to increase in pungent horror without the possibility of cessation; shall be sealed by eternity itself. Then think that children, parents, friends, myriads of intelligent beings, will be separated from the rest of the race, and consigned to this doom, without the remotest possibility of having one prayer for mercy answered or a cry for release heard.

Bring well to mind, what man is—think that he is the inhabitant of a world where there are many and strong temptations to lead him astray; that his life is brief, and in comparison with eternity, is less than a drop to the ocean; that a life full of sin has no possible balancing with endless suffering; and that if a man, for stealing one pin, were punished in the severest manner for one hundred years, it would be mildness and mercy compared with ceaseless woe for the sins of a thousand years, could a man live so long.

Take into the account the character of God, as it is vividly displayed in nature and revelation; and then think, of any rational reason, if you can, why infinite love should prompt infinite power to create finite beings, when infinite wisdom foresaw that their end would be unending woe.

Reflect on these points thoroughly, and there can be no doubt but that your souls will be warm with the benevolent thought, that there is no truth in the notion; that it is fiction, having no higher origin than human passion and revenge; and that it must be destroyed. And as you thus reflect, you will see the fire of truth glowing in all the Scriptures, showing you the divine purpose of ultimately redeeming the world; thus proving that God has no child destined to endless ruin.

III. Another topic of reflection, is the notion that death is the end of our race—that the grave swallows up mind and body forever—and that there is no existence beyond the present life. That as the tree decays, so man dies; while the same perishing which awaits his body, awaits his mind also. This opinion is calculated to make one think and reflect deeply and thoroughly—for there is an interest attached to it and circumstances connected with it, which irresistibly invite consideration.

Think of men as possessed of intellect and moral power—bring before your minds all the wonders which mind has accomplished—look into the knowledge which the sciences have made accessible to the most common capacity; look at the various works which the ingenuity of man has wrought out; behold how his mind has guided him to subdue the surface of the earth, to reach the treasures hidden beneath its crust, to cover the ocean with ships, and to open communication with far distant lands—muse thoroughly on this point.

Think of the universal hope of all souls for another life—a hope which animates alike the savage in his wild woods and the philosopher in his study. Reflect how crowds of human beings are every hour dropping into the grave, with this hope burning brightly in their minds until the last moment. Think of the fact, that God has abundantly satisfied every rational desire which grows out of man's connection with the earth, and that this hope can not be satisfied without immortality, which God can as readily give as he can give temporal bounties. Then deeply reflect on this question, will God suffer the mind, thus gifted with varied powers, thus animated by a brilliant and consistent hope, to be annihilated; to be swept from all life, like a star suddenly quenched in its glory. And as you muse, the warm thoughts will gush into your souls, that immortality is a probable doctrine—and as the Scriptures come in to give strength and clearness to your reflections, your thoughts will burn into the steady flame of Christian faith which embraces the fact, that this corruptible must put on incorruption.

IV. Now put together the last two conclusions to which you have arrived; viz., that no soul will be either made endlessly miserable or made to suffer annihilation—reflect well upon them, and look at the truth in which they unite. Concentrate all your thoughts upon the irresistible conviction, that all men must enter upon immortal existence, and that there will be no endless agony, and are you not led to the brilliant flame of the Restitution, which teaches the reformation of all sinners and the reconciliation of all souls? And that conviction will become as strong as the mountains, as we see it sustained and proved in that holy Book which is the fountain of our civilization and of all Christian instruction.

In my own meditations, I love to reflect upon the proofs of the Restitution under the figure of a golden chain commencing at the throne of divine Love. I see it faintly in the mysterious promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent—sin. I see its brilliancy more apparent in the promises made to the patriarchs and in the teachings of the prophets. I behold it in all its glory manifested in the mission and instruction of the Saviour and the teachings of the apostles. I see it stretching far into the future, drawing men from their sins, their wars, their errors, and their oppression, that they may cling to its truth, its virtue, and its consolation. At last, I see it again reaching the throne of God, binding the entire world to immortality and felicity. Deep reflection upon this view of it, is calculated, I feel sure, to make earthly affliction appear as a passing cloud before the sun of heaven and death but as a discord preceding the burst of harmony which shall fill the spiritual presence of God with the jubilee of the redeemed world.

G. W. MONTGOMERY.

GOD'S WILL vs. SATAN'S WILL.

That the Supreme Being has a will in reference to the final destiny of the human race, is a truth which must be admitted as such, by every man capable of reflection, or of reasoning upon any subject brought forward for the contemplation of man. By all classes of Christian people; by all believers in the existence of a God, this must be acknowledged. His wisdom is as boundless as eternity. And this truth borne in mind, it is at once a conviction swaying the reasoning powers, that in all of his works he must have a definite object, end, or aim in view; and consequently, he must have a will in reference to the final destiny of the human race, and that destiny supported by his will, is, and must be, a future life; a life after the present shall have been concluded. This follows as a matter of firm conviction, from the nature of that constitution which has been given to the human mind, for this aside from Revelation, is of sufficient weight to induce a firm and unshaken faith in the doctrine of a future state of being, as the inheritance of the great family of humanity, and that that being, will be one of holiness and consequent happiness.

But mankind are not now left to Reason alone, by which to obtain a knowledge of the future; and thus, through the blessing of God, our advantages, privileges, and blessings, are far superior to those of the ancient nations, and far beyond those of many nations of the present day, many such, living without a sufficient knowledge of the doctrines of Christianity. The glorious and hallowed light of Revelation has dawned upon the world, and that darkness heretofore resting upon the human mind is broken and dispelled; and man now looks to heaven as his everlasting home, where rest, and peace, and joy shall be his inheritance throughout unnumbered ages. The mission of Jesus is for the accomplishment of this work. For that voice speaks to mankind, declaring that he came into the world to do the will of his father, God. And what is that will? The very object, for the accomplishment of which, our Saviour came into the earth. What is that object? 'This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.' It is the will of God then, that sinners should be saved, and all mankind being sinners, it follows of course, that the will of the Supreme Being is, that all mankind should finally become in possession of salvation. Perhaps this conclusion will not be admitted to be truly logical, yet this is the natural inference drawn from this scripture. But the truth is yet more plainly spoken by him who was commissioned to carry the Gospel to the Gentile nations. In his instruction to Timothy, while saying that prayer should be made for all people, he says: 'For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and come unto a knowledge of the truth.' This is sufficient, for no believer in the truth of Revelation, dare say, in contradiction to this portion of divine testimony, that it is not God's will that all men should be saved. And truly this alone, is a will worthy of a being possessing powers like those of the Deity; alone worthy of a being whose benevolence is as vast and boundless as eternity itself; alone worthy of a being whose love for mankind is unlimited; who is 'good unto all and whose tender mercies are over all of his works.'

Now for the will of Satan; the Satan of the church, of course, and not the various adversaries spoken of in the Scriptures. We readily confess our acquaintance with old Sootie, and indeed all that we know of this gent whose skirts savor so much of brimstone, we have learned from the glowing descriptions given of him by our brethren who are believers in the doctrine of a limited salvation; believers in a blissful reward for the pious and holy few, and an endless and heartrending punishment for the vicious and doomed many? That a man is known by the company which he keeps, is an old and true proverb; and though we would make no insinuations against our brethren who believe in the doctrine of endless misery, yet we must be allowed the privilege of saying, that they are singularly intimate with the character of his Satanic Majesty; singularly conversant with all his former peregrinations, beside being able to tell to an iota what is to be his course of action for all future time and also for eternity. And surely, we do not now recollect of ever hearing a modern revivalist hold forth to a wondering crowd, but whose right hand man was him who is king of the bottomless pit. If a backslider is to be reclaimed from his wanderings, into the pale of the church once more, it is done by the fear of the master of Infernus. If a sinner is to be aroused from his slumbers, old Satan is sent forth to howl a dismal and dreadful yell in his ears; and indeed, a revivalist of modern times, without the aid of old Clovenfoot would be like a cooper without his adze—nonplussed! We were going on to say then, that from our brethren who are believers in the doctrine of endless misery, we obtain a knowledge of Satan's will, which is, that all mankind should finally be lost. That the woes of everlasting despair should rest upon them throughout unnumbered ages; a deep and horrid anguish ever and eternally to prey upon the soul, and not a solitary gleam of hope ever dawn upon the distressed and anxious mind! This, and this alone, is the will of Satan.

The question comes up: Whose will shall be accomplished? God's or Satan's? Reason answers, and by her instruction informs us that the will of the Supreme Being shall be done, and that too, to the very letter. For were the will of God to be defeated, it would be because of opposition from some other being of more power than the Deity whose is almighty, i. e., a greater power than infinite power—a perfect absurdity! Revelation answers the question, Eph. i: 11, that God worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. His will being that all men should be saved and come unto a knowledge of the truth, and working all things after the counsel of his own will, of course all men will be saved. Consequently Satan's will must and shall be defeated; nay more; Satan himself is destined to meet with destruction. Heb. ii: 14, 15,—Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver those who through the fear of death, were their whole life-time subject to bondage.¹

In the above truth, Universalism is found to acquiesce, perfectly; in truth, it is the doctrine of Universalism so far as the perfect accomplishment of God's will is at question. This faith reposes the utmost confidence in the perfect and complete fulfilment of every decree of the great Eternal; the final finishing of every purpose which his wisdom has formed and every plan determined by his all-creative hand. His wisdom being infinite, every difficulty is foreseen; his power being almighty, every obstacle will be overcome; and his benevolence being unbounded, the end of his works must witness a halo of happiness and glory thrown around the whole intelligent world. But to this, the popular doctrine of the day utters a protest, declaring that God's will relative to the final destiny of mankind will not be accomplished. Neither does it allow Satan's will to be accomplished. But that doctrine settles the question, not unlike the yankee mode of traffic—it divides the difference, allowing a part of God's will to be accomplished, and a part of Satan's, i. e., a part of the human family saved, and a part damned. And we leave it to be determined by the good judgment of the reader, what is, and what is not the truth, ordained by the Deity.

PLEASING EVERY BODY.

We have long been satisfied that the idea of an Editor's pleasing every body by any course he can take is perfectly utopian,—a mere figment of the imagination. Let an Editor, by forsaking the dictates of his own judgment and following that of others, who may condescend to become his advisers, seek to please all, and he is sure to offend nearly or quite all, is far from pleasing himself, and not certain of pleasing a single reader. We are never offended by, but always thankful for, the advice of any and all our friends. We would not have them withhold it, if they think we need or it is their duty to give it—let it be done freely: but still we must use our own judgment about following it.

We have been not a little amused, and possibly instructed, of late, by numerous pieces of advice, caution, counsel, &c., on several topics, but on one in particular; and we would like to have the problem solved how we should proceed, allowing we were disposed to follow the advice given. For instance, one advises us to publish the Protest and all articles written in favor of it; another, that we should refuse it a place in our columns, or any thing on that side of the question; a third, that we should publish every thing that is said and written on both sides; a fourth, that we ought not to publish a syllable on either side; a fifth, that we did wrong in admitting an article, a few weeks since, on Mesmerism; a sixth, that he was very much gratified with the article, and should be much pleased to see more and frequent articles on the same subject; a seventh that as there are now so many publications and lectures on Temperance, he does not think it worth while for us to occupy our columns with communications on that subject; an eighth, that he would be glad to see one or more articles every week on that same subject, as none can be of more importance; a ninth, that the subject of ordinances ought to be more insisted on and strenuously urged in our columns; a tenth, that he hopes that subject will be kept out of our paper; and so on up to the ninety ninth complaint and adviser. Now we thank all these friends and brethren very kindly, and shall follow just as much of their advice as our own judgment tells us is right.

We are frequently reminded of the man who was so much afraid these 'Washingtonian Te-totalers' would overthrow the government and destroy all the wholesome institutions of the land, that he went to the groggery every night to declaim against them to all the jolly and cautious companions he could assemble to hear him. Now, reader, you know 'the critter' has different effects on differently constituted individuals, making some excessively good natured and loving, and others extremely pugnacious and quarrelsome. The hero of our story was one of the latter class. As he issued one night from the rendezvous of these boon companions, about 'half seas over,' and began his homeward march, he felt what was to him not an uncommon spiritual power about him, and yielding to his distinguishing propensity, was full of fight. 'Now,' said he, introducing his threat with an oath, 'I am determined to have a quarrel with my wife as soon as I get home—I'll ask her if she has given the old mare her oats. If she says she has, I'll scold her for her improvident waste of grain: for the old jade has been doing nothing to-day and did not need any. If she says she has not, then I'll quarrel and scold her for neglecting the poor old brute which has been half starved to death for want of provender. So I'll have a pretext for a quarrel any way, and a quarrel I'll have!'

Our readers can make their own application of the story; and if they can, may decide in which way the unfortunate wife could have best succeeded in pleasing her 'said husband'—whether by giving or not giving the old mare her oats.

Changes in Universalist Papers.

The 'Star of Bethlehem,' of Lowell, heretofore published by Br. Jacques, has just past into the hands of Br. Wm. Bell, who has already taken charge of the paper, both as publisher and editor. He will commence a new volume in a few weeks. We have long known Br. Bell as a preacher and writer. He is ready and prompt, and we trust will do good justice in his new field of labor.—He was a number of years ago editor and publisher of the Universalist Watchman of Vermont. We wish him abundant success and hope the Star will continue to shine with increasing brightness.

The Gospel Messenger, lately published at Wetumpka, Ala., by Br. S. J. McMorris, has, for want of sufficient patronage at the South, been merged in the 'Star in the West' published at Cincinnati, O. This is a good arrangement under existing circumstances. The Star in the West is to be enlarged to about the size of the Trumpet at the commencement of a new volume, a few weeks hence, and edited and published as heretofore by Br. Gurley, an excellent editor, to whom and his paper we wish unbounded prosperity.

Indulgence to Debtors—One more Call.

It is now nearly four years since a number of accounts, some for larger and some for smaller amounts, were assigned to me, by O. Hutchinson, and by Grosh & Hutchinson, against sundry individuals, clerical and lay. They were immediately notified of the fact, and assured that the whole was immediately wanted and much needed to enable me to meet heavy pecuniary liabilities that I had incurred on account of the Assignors. Some of the debtors promptly and honorably met and discharged their obligations. Others most humbly begged that I would grant a little indulgence—if I would, they would soon pay me all. The 'little indulgence' was granted, or for as long a time as was first asked; at the end of which a considerable number of them asked a still longer indulgence, or an extension of time. That was also granted, and in most instances expired one or two years since. But I find them no more ready to pay after this long indulgence than they were after the short one first asked, or even at the first. Indeed, it would seem that a number of them consider that my long and patient waiting and indulgence has fully absolved them from all obligations ever to pay the debts they owe, and they have ceased to make any further efforts, or say any thing more about the matter. But if such are their conclusions, I beg leave to assure them they are mistaken. I have not forgotten either their promises or obligations. I granted their request for indulgence, or delay, as a personal favor to them, though very inconvenient to me. That indulgence some of them at least incline to abuse. I now think I have waited quite long enough; and take this method to inform them that those accounts must forthwith be settled and paid without further delay. The law, as a last resort, must do its office. Though unpleasant, yet when all other means fail, it must be resorted to. Those debtors above described, as well as a few who owe me on other accounts, for books, papers, &c., which were long since due, who read this notice, will, I hope, be both wise, to avoid expense, and just, to pay their debts. D. SKINNER.

Ensebius Hoag.—Inquiry.

Can any one inform us where the above named individual is? A number of years since he collected money belonging to us, appropriated it to his own use without leave, and has never refunded it. Though often written to and requested to do it, he has of late never answered our letters, and we know not where to address him.

(If Some other individuals in the same category we shall inquire after soon.) D. S.

Br. COBB—I have never seen a copy of the Christian Freeman in this section of country. If you would like to have it known here, please send an occasional number to my address, and I will take pleasure in exhibiting it to brethren. Whatever contains matters relating to the Protest, would probably be the most interesting.

The Spring Term of this Institution will commence on the 8th of April next, and continue fourteen weeks. It is desired that such as intend to enter during the Term would do so at its commencement or as early as possible after. The March No. of the FARMER'S LIBRARY is issued and filled with interesting and useful matter, for Agriculturalists, as usual. It contains a somewhat lengthy treatise on milch cows, with illustrations. Criteria by which to judge of the good or bad qualities of cows with regard to the quantity of milk obtained from them, are given, which are said to be infallible. Plowing, clearing and draining of land, fences, enclosures, irrigation, &c., &c., are considered. The Nos. may be had of G. N. Beesley of this city.

Part XII of Dr. Lardner's Lectures on SCIENCE AND ART has been issued by the same publishers (Greeley & McElrath, Tribune Buildings, N. Y.) This No. of this truly excellent work contains the conclusion of the lecture on the subject, 'How to observe the heavens,' 'The stellar universe,' two lectures—'The steam engine,' first lecture. Each subject is illustrated with cuts. The numbers may be had of G. N. Beesley, this city, or of the publishers. 25 cents per number.

A LECTURE BEFORE THE ALPHA PHI SOCIETY of Wilson Collegiate Institute, on February 16th, 1846. By Rev. U. Clark, Lockport.

Such is the title of a neat pamphlet of 17 pages which we have just received from the esteemed author, and read with sincere pleasure and gratification. It exhibits an originality, a depth and vigor of thought, a facility of illustration, and a noble ambition of usefulness, soaring above the petty and arbitrary conventionalisms and fashions of the age, that does honor alike to the head and the heart of the author. Were our columns less crowded with original matter than at present we should be glad to give place to a few extracts; and we may yet do so when we find room.

The article headed 'Nota Bene,' sent us a few days since for publication, would have been capital had we received it a week before. But its point and bearing would be complained of should we give it publicity now.

DEATHS.

Mrs. CARYL (consort of Capt. B. Caryl,) whose demise was announced in the city papers of yesterday, was one of the few to whose favored lot it falls to be generally known, and universally respected and esteemed. She was originally from Peterboro', N. H., and has been a resident of Buffalo, with the exception of a few years during, and immediately subsequent, to the last war with England—about 38 years. As family after family drew around her and sought her acquaintance and friendship, she of course sympathised largely in all their joys and sorrows. The wayward found in her a counsellor, and the poor a benefactor. Her habits were eminently domestic; and it was at her own home and fireside, and in the midst of her family, that her true character was best seen and understood. There, as a wife and mother, she presided with the true dignity of woman; and here the mild virtues of her heart were exercised with intelligence and never-failing kindness. Mrs. C. was a Christian, alike free from the littleness of bigotry or the prejudices of a sectarian—a liberal Christian, who regarded the true and the good of every creed and profession as the members of the common family of the redeemed—a practical Christian, who carried into every relation and duty of life, both the principles of the Gospel which she professed, and their efficient illustration. She had no enemies—she lived without reproach, and died to be long and deeply mourned.—[Buffalo Pilot of March 3.

In Scriba, Oswego county, N. Y., on the 23d ult., Mrs. PERCIVAL, relict of Dr. Percival, in the 70th year of her age. A fairer exhibition of the doctrine of God's impartial grace and goodness, is not often seen. Her faith taught her to reverence, worship and adore one God, who is perfect in all his attributes, and to trust in one Saviour who will not fail nor be discouraged until he has sought out every wandering son and daughter of Adam, and borne them in the arms of unbounded love, to the fold of God. This was her faith—which weaned her affections from the world—reconciled her to her Father and her God—consolated, supported and sustained her during a long and distressing illness (consumption)—enabled her to bear all her afflictions with Christian resignation, and landed her soul into the heaven of eternal bliss; yea, it even lit up a smile upon her countenance in view of the glories of immortality, in the last agonies of expiring nature. I verily believe that no person with an unprejudiced mind, could have listened to her communications of peace, without acknowledging that her faith was a living and heavenly principle. As I have sat by her bedside, and beheld that serenity, composure, and resignation which it was her happy lot to enjoy, even when the monster, 'death,' was staring her in the face, my heart's desire and prayer to God has been, that I too might 'die the death of the righteous,' and my 'last end might be like his.' Her funeral was attended by the writer on Sunday the 25th, and a discourse delivered to a large congregation of attentive and sympathising friends and neighbors.

'Sweet is the scene where virtue dies,
When sinks a righteous soul to rest;
How mildly beam the closing eyes!
How gently heaves the dying breast!'

W. D. BRADFORD.

In Otsego, Jan. 13th, Mrs. LUCY TAYLOR, wife of Thomas Taylor 2d, aged 42 years. In the death of sister Taylor, society has lost a valuable member—children an affectionate mother, and husband a kind and devoted wife. She bore her illness, which was short, with patience and Christian resignation, putting the utmost confidence in the goodness of her heavenly Father. Before she died, she called her brother to her bedside, (who was a believer in a partial salvation,) and entreated him to say no more against the doctrine of Universalism, as she had found it good to live and die by. She died loved and respected by all that knew her, and in the full belief of a world's salvation. A discourse was delivered by the writer. May the blessings of the Gospel and the hope of immortality and joy, console the husband and children, and comfort all that mourn.

In Pompey, Feb. 27th, Widow DEBORAH GOWDY, wife of the late James Gowdy, in the 77th year of her age. Her complaint was consumption. Sister Gowdy was formerly a member of the Close Communion Baptists, 'but the bed was too short, that she might stretch herself upon it; and the covering too narrow' for her illimitable views of the goodness of God to the whole human family. She has left a family of six children, and many sympathising friends to mourn her loss. May the great Shepherd who gave himself a ransom for the world comfort the bereaved family, and teach us all so to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Sermon by Eld. Barnum, Methodist, from Dan. xii, last verse.

LINES

INSCRIBED TO MISS LAURA EGGLESTON.

BY L. D. JOHNSON.

Sweet Poetess! Bard of the happy hour!
 My soul goes forth to mingle with thy hymn;
 Which floats like slumber o'er each closing flower;
 And weaves bright visions round my pathway dim.
 My weary bosom gathers in thy song,
 Till human cares and passions die away;
 And all my soul is wrapt in one sweet throng
 Of heavenly peace, and seraph melody.

Oh! quenchless, quenchless, is the soul of song;
 Although the gentle hand that wakes its tone
 May trembling falter as it sweeps along,
 Until its gushing sweetness all be flown;
 Yet deep within the soul its echoes ring,
 With thrills of joy the vulgar never know;
 And bid the waves of pathos ever spring,
 And sweetly through life's long desert flow.

The poet has his grief. He can not speak
 The unearthly glory of his vision, save
 In broken tones of song, as wild and weak
 As dying murmurs of a summer wave.
 He has his joy. The sunshine of his soul—
 The streams of light that ever o'er him gleam—
 As strains that sweetly from his lute-string roll,
 Are fraught with bliss the world can never dream.

Sweet Poetess! High o'er yon starry steep
 Thy soul does bathe its wings in seas of light;
 While down below, clouds o'er the welkin sweep,
 And shroud in solemn gloom the sunshine bright.
 But soon, too soon! mid heaven's bright shining choir
 Thy notes shall softly, deeply, roll along;
 While angel hands enwreathe thy trembling lyre
 With the brightest, fairest flowers of song.

ANOTHER DISCUSSION.

Br. SKINNER—It seems to be my good or ill fortune to be frequently engaged in spiritual warfare. I have held a number of debates with the opponents of Universalism, one of which continued eight days, and another thirteen days. Those who are unacquainted with me might infer from this fact that, either my combativeness is uncommonly large, or that I must be exceedingly provoking in my intercourse with preachers of other denominations. Now, in regard to the first inference, as I never was ambitious to acquire the reputation of being a pugilistic theologian, it is due to myself to say that all but one of the discussions in which I have been engaged, were not in a direct sense, of my own seeking. I never directly challenged but one man in my life; and then I was provoked to do so by his overbearing and ungentlemanly conduct. I have always held myself in readiness, however, and think I always shall, to embrace every opportunity to defend what I think to be the Gospel against the attacks of its enemies. As to the latter inference, I have only to say that I trust no man has a greater regard for the feelings of his fellow men than myself. I cautiously avoid wounding the feelings of any man, or any set of men, unnecessarily. At the same time, I confess I can spare no man's feelings at the expense of truth. And furthermore, I frankly confess that pharisees never did, and I hope that, as pharisees they never will, like my kind of preaching.

Waiving all further introductory remarks, I now proceed to give you an account of a discussion which has recently been held in this place. Some time in December last, Rev. J. J. Slocum made application for the use of our church for the purpose of delivering therein a course of evening lectures against Universalism. This request was granted on condition that I should occupy the house on each alternate evening, and reply to the lectures in the order in which they were delivered. Accordingly, about the first of January, Mr. S. commenced his lectures and gave a course of nine, to each of which I replied. The discussion therefore occupied eight evenings, the speakers occupying from an hour and a half to two hours and a half, each evening. Mr. Slocum is the same who delivered a course of lectures against Universalism in Br. T. J. Sawyer's church some ten years ago, to which Br. S. replied at the time. Of the character of his lectures in this place, I can give no better idea than simply to state that they embraced the sum and substance of Hatfield's 'Universalism as it is,' and M. H. Smith's book against Universalism. His objections to Universalism were precisely the same as those urged by Mr. Hatfield, and all his quotations from Universalist authors are contained verbatim in Mr. Hatfield's book. Of these facts I reminded Mr. Slocum. He denied taking his lectures from Hatfield's book, and said he delivered the same lectures in New York before Mr. Hatfield's book was written. I suggested that perhaps he furnished Mr. Hatfield with his objections to Universalism, and quotations from Universalist books. To this he made no reply. The weapons relied on by Mr. S., were, 1. Misrepresentation, and, 2. Taking advantage of the preconceived opinions of his hearers. My course in reply was, 1. To correct his misrepresentations of our faith, and 2. where there was a real difference of opinion between us and our opponents, to state that difference fairly, then expose the falsity of the so-called Orthodox views, and lastly, substantiate the correctness of the opinions of Universalists on those points by an appeal to the Scriptures.

The discussion excited great interest among the people here and in the adjoining towns. It was well attended throughout. Including the speakers ten clergymen were in attendance. Three Presbyterian, two Methodist, one Lutheran, one Episcopalian, and three Universalist.

In regard to the spirit manifested by the speakers, I shall only say, that many of Mr. Slocum's friends were disgusted with the course pursued by him. Rev. Mr. Rowland, of Honesdale, came to me and personally apologised for the spirit manifested by Mr. S., and attributed it to the fact of his being in ill health. I replied that no apology was necessary, that I cared nothing about it, so far as I was personally concerned, and that if Mr. S. saw fit to expose himself and the influence of his doctrine before the audience, he had perfect liberty to do so for all me. Even the opposers of Universalism acknowledged that I treated my opponent respectfully throughout the debate. I indulged in no ridicule or sarcasm, only when I conscientiously thought Mr. S. deserved that kind of chastisement.

As to the results of the discussion, I will only say, that no shouts of victory have arisen from the ranks of our enemies. They seem inclined to say but very little about it. Some of the most prominent men in the ranks of the Partialists acknowledge that the ideas and arguments advanced on the Universalist side of the question were entirely new to them, such as they never thought of, and such as they did not know were ever entertained among men. Rev. Mr. Rowland remarked that his education had been such that he had had no opportunity to acquaint himself with certain facts which he heard stated in the discussion.

That you may know in what light our friends viewed it, I state the following fact. A few days after the discussion, I was presented with the following paper:

'The undersigned agree to pay the sum set opposite their respective names, to Rev. E. E. Guild, as a token of gratitude for the able and efficient manner in which he defended the Gospel against the late attack of Rev. J. J. Slocum.'

To the above paper there was attached twenty-eight names, and the amount signed was thirty dollars, which was paid me in cash.

From this place Mr. Slocum went to Canaan, six miles distant, and gave a Sunday evening lecture against Universalism, in the Methodist church. Our friends here got notice of it before hand, and Br. Phineas Arnold went up, made application for the use of the church, which was granted, attended Mr. Slocum's lecture, and at the close gave notice that I would reply the next Sunday evening. At the time appointed, I had the satisfaction of speaking about three hours in defence of the Gospel, to a large and attentive audience.

From Canaan, Mr. S. went by invitation from Br. Hoag, to Gibson, where he gave a course of lectures, to which Br. H. replied, as I am informed, much to the satisfaction of our friends in that place.

In the course of my debate with Mr. S., he remarked that I might produce any amount of proof from the Bible of the existence of a God, and a place of happiness in a future state of existence, and he would produce an equal amount of proof of the existence of a personal evil spirit, called the devil, and a place of misery after death. In reply, I remarked that I considered this a challenge from him to me to meet him on that question, and as such, I accepted it; and that I should be prepared to meet him on it when the discussion in which we were then engaged should come to a close. Accordingly at the close of the debate, an arrangement was made to discuss that subject. Subsequently, however, Mr. S. declined having any discussion about the devil, and we agreed on the following question:—'Do the Scriptures furnish an amount, and a kind of proof of the existence of a place of happiness in a future state of existence, which they do not furnish in favor of the existence of a place of misery after death?' The discussion of this question is to commence on Tuesday evening of next week, at the church in this place. No well informed Universalist need be at any loss to foresee the result of a discussion of a question of this nature. Every man who owns a Bible and has read it, knows, or ought to know, that, whereas the Bible plainly and unequivocally teaches the existence of a place of blessedness in a future state, it contains but one single allusion to a place of misery after death, and that in a parable, and the allusion is not to a hell revealed in the Bible, but to the hell of the Pagans, which never had any existence except in the imaginations of men.

In conclusion, let me say, success to investigation and discussion. Good will come from it. My motto is, 'prove all things; hold fast that which is good.' Yours, &c., E. E. GUILD.

[Original.] CAUSES FOR REJOICING. A SERMON.

BY REV. E. W. REYNOLDS.

'Rejoice evermore.'—PAUL.

Such is the injunction of St. Paul to his brethren at Thessalonica. There is a deep meaning in this simple and brief sentence. It is not probable that the apostle would have given this command to the Thessalonians, unless there had been some cause for rejoicing evermore, and how numerous and powerful must other causes have been to have called forth the strong words of our text! If the people to whom the apostle addressed these words had sufficient cause of gratitude, to be able to rejoice continually and forever, how much greater cause have we to do the same!

The Thessalopian Christians were daily subject to the insults and persecutions of the unbelieving Jews—were continually made the subjects of derision, because they were 'counted worthy of the kingdom of God,' for which they suffered, by those of whom Paul says, they knew not God, and obeyed not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. They heard the teachings of the crucified and risen Saviour derided and scoffed at—heard those sacred precepts, which had become so firmly rooted in their minds, and which gave birth to so much joy and peace in their souls—heard these called doctrines of the devil; were themselves often subjected to the pain and disgrace of the scourge; and, in fine, were obliged to endure almost every privation imaginable; and yet, under the weight of their bitter and heartless persecution, they were commanded to rejoice—to rejoice not only at seasons, but to rejoice evermore!

What cause, then, had those Christians for continual rejoicing? Perhaps the bigot will answer that they rejoiced in the contemplation of the speedy destruction of their enemies, by the power of the Romans, in the sack and ruin of the Holy City and Temple; but this could not have been the cause, for Christ had commanded them to love their enemies, to bless those who cursed them, to do good to those who hated them, &c., that they might be the children of their Father in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

But the believer—he who has experienced 'the soul's calm sunshine, and the heartfelt joy,' which ever attends the true Christian, will not inquire as to the cause of the rejoicing of the early followers of Jesus. Oh! no. He who has ever felt a spark of the divine nature burning within him—who has had the kingdom of righteousness and bliss set up in his soul, knows well that in keeping the commandments there is great reward—a reward which he is not obliged to seek for in the immortal world, but a present reward which enables him to shout victory over all foes, and rejoice evermore in the God of his salvation.

Christian reader, it is not with us as it was with the early followers and disciples of the Nazarene. Then Christianity was acknowledged only by a few—then its promulgators were humble fishermen and tradesmen. But now the noble, the gifted and the powerful, have arisen and followed the Branch of David, and yielded obedience to the judgments of his law. Then the inquiry was made, Can any thing good come out of Nazareth?—now voices are heard on every hand, saying, 'Come thou with us, and we will do thee good.' Then the believer perished before the fury of the multitude, and slept in an unhonored sepulchre—now he dies with the prayer of thousands resting upon him, and his grave is watered by the tears of the noble and the great. And in proportion as Christianity has gained advocates, and extended its empire over the universe of mind, its friends and followers have cause for rejoicing.

To state a few of the causes which Christians—and especially that class who believe in the blissful immortality of all our race—have for continual rejoicing, and to state a few prerequisites, is the object of the present discourse.

All men have cause to rejoice continually, for having been made intelligent and intellectual beings. He who has a mind to conceive and contemplate the perfections of his own being, as it proceeded from the forming hand of Jehovah, and his adaptation to the clime in which he was reared; or if he has a soul that warms with the fires of devotion, gratitude and love, he must rejoice scarcely less than did man at that glorious period when 'the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' With a mind that can soar away into the flowery regions of imagination, bathe itself in the pure waters of science, and revel in ecstasy while contemplating the beauties of creation, and the divine Being who fashioned and formed it, man can, and ought to, rejoice evermore.

We, who live in a land of civil and religious freedom, should rejoice in the privilege of paying our devotions to the Supreme Being, after the dictates of our own consciences, unawed by a tyrant's frown, and unscathed by kingly vengeance. Here no torrents of blood flow from beneath the throne of a Mary; no St. Bartholomew tragedies blacken our annals; we fear not the tormentor of the auto-da-Fé, nor the cruelty of the bigoted inquisitor. No. But from every hamlet and 'sequestered vale,' cheerful and happy multitudes are seen wending their way, on the Sabbath, to the house wherein they mingle their prayers, and offer up their thanks to the Immaculate and Eternal. Here no one is obliged to pay for the promulgation of a doctrine which his soul abhors, for all are free in the broadest sense of the term. While, across the Atlantic, millions drag out a miserable existence in the most abject poverty—while the groans of the slave are heard amid the deep mines of Siberia—while civil war breathes its devastating breath over the fairest portions of Spain—while the clarion blast of strife resounds over the deserts of Barbary—while Poland weeps over her slaughtered sons and divided empire—and while the land of the Tsars sends forth her legions to bind a brave and hardy race in chains as ignominious as her own, we are enjoying the blessings of free institutions, free opinions, and free communications. Oh! what cause for rejoicing have we! And shall we not rejoice evermore in that Being, who crowns every day of our existence with the blessings which, were they justly appreciated, would cause us to shout volumes of hosannas to his name?

But Universalists have a greater cause still for rejoicing—they can rejoice in the prospect of meeting all the nations, families, and kindreds of earth in the land of immortality and bliss. Go to the true believer in unlimited grace, and, though you find him in adverse circumstances—though the dark waves of misfortune beat upon him, like briney surges against a storm-tossed barque—tho' friends prove false, and enemies frown upon him—though stern death stalks around him, and snatches from his embrace the flowers and sweets of earth—tho' his mortal frame be racked with pain, yet he will not complain of his lot, for he knows that his destiny is in the hands of a being who doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men, but that our present afflictions which are but for a moment, will work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Oh! there is joy in a faith like this! It is no momentary emotion—but one that will live—not only while we tread the vales of earth—but as long as the throne of Deity shall endure—as long as arch-angels shall tune the lyre by the banks of the spiritual Jordan. Yes, there are causes for rejoicing in our glorious faith, which no other believers under the heavens can appreciate. Others may indeed rejoice at times, but their joy must ever be mingled with sorrow; for, in spite of themselves, the chilling thought will ever and anon come up in their bosoms, that perchance some dear departed, whom they love as their own souls, is even now writhing in awful agony in the pit of endless torture, where devils reign with unlimited sway, and damned spirits weep and groan evermore! No: God knows that believers in such a theology can not rejoice continually. Even its ablest advocates have confessed that they could not, and Reason is imperative in giving in her evidence to the same effect. They are filled with that fear which hath torment. They 'do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God;' and they will not believe that 'in the resurrection, they are as the angels of God in heaven.' Therefore, they can not rejoice evermore.

This brings us to a consideration of some of the requisite qualifications which that people must possess, who would obey the command given in the text.

There is no greater pre-requisite to continual rejoicing than confidence in God. When we see millions of blinded, creed bound mortals, disregarding the rich promises unfolded in the divine Record, and running, blindfold as it were, in the highway of error, superstition and ignorance, and bringing upon their own heads the just retribution which is certain to follow such a course, our hearts are pained, and we involuntarily exclaim with the Poet:

'Oh! for a firm and lasting faith
To credit what Jehovah saith.'

In the recent Miller excitement, who can estimate the amount of misery produced in this enlightened land? It is not in the power of man to estimate and record it, in half its horror and loathsomeness! Reason forsook her throne in the minds of the credulous—tears of untold agony were shed over the suicide's grave—the parent lifted the bloody steel above his own offspring, and became their executioner, lest, by coming to maturity and accountability, they might fall under the awful displeasure of an incensed Deity, and be eternally lost—and the once happy home became desolate and cold as the grave. Here stood the half-crazed enthusiast, waiting for the awful arch-angel's trump to sound, for the heaven's to open, and for the Son of Man to descend with flaming fire, taking vengeance on all the reprobates, and gathering his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other; while there raged the maniac, with nought save a haggard and bleeding body, and a crazed and ruined intellect! Strange that man can repose more confidence in the words of a frail, erring, finite being, than in those of the omnipotent Ruler of the universe, whose name and whose nature is LOVE, and who is GOOD UNTO ALL, AND WHOSE TENDER MERCIES ARE OVER ALL THE WORKS OF HIS HANDS! Strange that he should distrust the goodness of that Being who condescends to feed the fowls of the air, and dress the lilies of the field in more gaudy colors than Solomon in all his glory was ever arrayed in! Strange that they should disbelieve the glorious truths of our Saviour—truths that diffuse joy throughout our souls, and cleave to the traditions of designing men—traditions which becloud the glories of the future, and cause us to weep as those without hope!

But so it is with many. It ought not to be. Ere men can rejoice evermore, they must discountenance such vain and inglorious traditions, and believe with the Samaritans of old that Christ is indeed the Saviour of the world, and of all that God has given him, he will lose nothing, but raise it up again at the last day—that he came into the world to save mankind from their sins; that he gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time; and that, as all power was given him in heaven and in earth, he shall finally see of the travail of his soul, and SHALL BE SATISFIED. And, in order for mankind to believe this, they have only to lay aside long cherished opinions of heathen origin, and believe the record that God gave of his Son—have only to abandon Jacob's well, which is deep, and whose waters are unsatisfying, and drink that living water offered by Jesus, which will be in them a well of water, springing up into everlasting life. Oh! when will men cease to repose confidence in their own works of righteousness, as their only hope of immortal happiness, and repose more in the grace of God, 'which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began?' When will they have just conception of the Divine character?—when believe the promises and purpose of their Father in heaven, in regard to the future destiny of our race, as revealed through the prophets and fathers?—when believe that God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing unto them their trespasses?—and when rejoice evermore in the belief that God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto a knowledge of the truth? May God speed the day!

Another important pre-requisite is an independent mind. Without this, we shall be in danger of being borne away with every wind of doctrine which may assail us; we shall feel ourselves standing in continual jeopardy; and, like those who worship the beast and his image, shall 'have no peace day nor night.' It is imperative upon us that we 'search the Scriptures' with a full determination to know the truth—the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Nor is this difficult to be ascertained, if we tear away the seal of prejudice, with which the sacred volume is sealed to many, and remove the seals which superstition has placed upon our eyes. It was, no doubt, the intention of the Deity to make a plain revelation of his will, to his children; and we believe he has accomplished that design. This revelation, we believe, also, is calculated to impart complete joy to those who receive and believe it. But we now see millions who will not receive this revelation as it was given by God; they say it is too good to be genuine; and so they rob it of all its goodness, and narrow it down in accordance with their own selfish and disgraceful feelings, and then receive it! But still they are not satisfied, but are constantly changing their views, and following after those of some popular teacher. They have no independence of mind. They 'call evil good, and good evil; put darkness for light, and light for darkness; call bitter sweet, and sweet bitter.' They are in the 'gall of bitterness,' and in the 'bonds of iniquity;' they fear God, but still worship their graven images; and they can not rejoice evermore. No people can rejoice, in the fullest sense of the word, until they cherish a perfectly independent mind—until they cease to believe in doctrines because others say they are true, or because their forefathers believed them to be true. They must search the divine record with prayerful hearts, and establish their belief on the firm conviction of their own unbiased minds. The Samaritans did not believe in Jesus upon the mere testimony of the woman. 'Now we believe,' said they, 'not because of the saying;' but we have seen him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world.' When, therefore, we shall have placed more confidence in the Almighty, and less in the creeds of men—when we shall have searched ourselves for the 'truth as it is in Jesus,' instead of resigning the task to others—then, and not until then, can we rejoice evermore with joy that is 'unspeakable and full of glory.'

To conclude: We must not only receive and believe the Gospel, but we must obey its requirements—obey from the heart that form of doctrine which has been delivered unto us, if we would rejoice with fullness of joy. We must be born again if we would enter the kingdom of God—must turn from error to truth, from darkness to light, and from Satan to God. The kingdom of righteousness must be set up in our souls—holiness must sway the sceptre of universal empire there, ere we can fully obey the command of our text. Said the Divine Teacher, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy might, mind, and strength, and thy neighbor as thyself.' 'Be ye, therefore, perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.' These are heavenly requirements. Shall we not bow to them? We must, if we would rejoice evermore. Jesus made the divine character the pattern of human rectitude. He showed that God is good unto all—even unto the unthankful and the evil; and we are commanded, as the followers of him, who was the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person, to exercise the spirit of love and charity toward the whole kindred humanity—not merely to our friends, but also to our enemies. The necessity of forgiving those who trespass against us, was most forcibly shown in the parable of the unforgiving servant. There is too much of a pharisaic disposition abroad in the land. We are apt to say to our neighbor, as did the Pharisee to the Publican: 'Stand by, I am holier than thou.' Than this disposition there is nothing more opposed to the spread of the Gospel of Christ—nothing which prevents us more from rejoicing. While man looks upon himself as holier than his neighbor, he will fancy that God looks upon him in the same light; and that he has prepared a greater amount of happiness for him to enjoy in the immortal world, than for his erring brother. Yea more! He will believe that brother's acts to be an utter abomination in the sight of the great Judge, and that he will be utterly cast off, ere long, and consigned to unending torment. And thus, believing that God will delight to torment the sinner in eternity, he doubts not that he is doing the service of his Father in heaven when he commences that punishment on earth. But he can not rejoice evermore in such a course. And if he is a Christian, he can not rejoice at all in it. He must obey the golden rule laid down by our divine Master, or joy will be a stranger in his bosom.

Reader, we dismiss the subject. If you would rejoice with the Christians of old, you must have their faith, and do their works. You must forsake those sins and heavy weights that do so easily beset you, and press on for the prize of the high calling in Christ Jesus. You must copy the example of him who spake as never man spake—who, when reviled, reviled not again, and who, though tempted in all parts like as we are, was yet without sin. In the language of the Poet,

'Go to the pillow of disease
Where night gives no repose;
And on the cheek were sickness preys,
Bid health to plant a rose.
'Go, where the friendless stranger lies,
To perish in his doom;
Snatch from the grave his closing eyes,
And bid him think of home.'

Then will you rejoice while you live, and when death comes to summon you hence, you will be wafted calmly to the haven of immortal rest, to rejoice evermore in the society of seraphic multitudes and to tread 'the quiet starry shore where storms are ever lulled by the soft breath of love; where flowers of high immortal beauty deck the blissful bowers with living bloom; and streams of crystal brightness murmur softly on over diamond sands, and gleam forever in the unclouded radiance of eternal day.' AMEN.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER TO A SON.

* * * * * Wishing to enjoy social worship, I sometimes go to the First Presbyterian church for that pleasing purpose. I have heard there a few excellent sermons; but the last was most deplorable. The preacher descanted on the prevalence of wickedness; and to prove how great a principle it is, avowed that if Omnipotence did not restrain it, for his own wise ends, it would (so greatly sinful is the heart of man) mar the fair works of creation, demolish all social order, uproot all moral virtue, and benevolent designs, and soon introduce a moral pestilence. But in the next state of being, all these restraints would be removed forever. The Deity would then and there, suffer the effects to rage without abatement or control forever. It would then, with a whirlwind rage, be its own tormentor, and forever increase the elements of which it is composed, by a dreadful contrast and strife of the various depraved passions, striving for the mastery; the wild uproar going on to all eternity!

Presuming the preacher, any more than myself, has never been there, he must, either from conjecture, reason, or revelation, draw his inferences.

Impossibilities can never be proved, or believed by rational beings; but they may be asserted and listened to. And I pronounce the above assertions, physically and morally impossible. In fact it is hard to conceive how crime of any sort can be committed after the death of the body. A Bonaparte, or an Alexander, can not produce, much less perpetuate the evils of war, in a place they call hell. There are no muskets, cannon, or swords there; and no territories to conquer there; or widows or orphans to suffer through that scourge there; or cities to be laid waste. The drunkard will have no alcoholic drinks to produce mad frolics there; the murderer can not indulge in cool or angry strife; there are no lives to lose, or blood to spill. The adulterer will have no organs or desires to wallow in lust, to seduce the innocent virgin, or raise a spurious progeny. Your own good sense will say they are impossible, in a physical view. Now look at the moral impossibilities.

Suppose a person should, to answer his own selfish views and ends, dam up, or cause to be dammed up, a large lake of water, and when his own ends were satisfied, suddenly let it flow with unrestrained velocity on the district below, causing damage and fearful inundations: would not the morality of the act be seriously and justly questioned? And will the Most High, the fountain and source of all excellence, permit, or cause such a flood of misery and wickedness, even if it were possible? To suppose his acquiescence to such a fact, and to suppose he will exert his own omnipotence to lengthen out the effects to eternity, would be to chill the best affections of the soul, which we are commanded to indulge towards the Deity.

The Deity has presented to our astonished view, two Books to peruse for our instruction; the book of nature, and that of revelation. He is the author of both volumes; and how strange to suppose either to contain any discrepancies or contradictions to the other? We may say both are inscribed by the pen of eternal truth; and what is dark or mysterious in one, may be elucidated by the other.

The book of nature is confessedly the oldest record; and it is a law of documentary evidence, that the most ancient is the most authentic, as being least subject to the errors of transcribers, or to forgery.

The world we live in has such marks of benevolent design, that we must suppose the Creator to be benevolent. We examine the present scene of things, and find beautiful adaptations every where; and often discover marks of a former state of things which have preceded this period. The crust of the earth is full of past events; and we seek (very laudably) to read its history. We read the inscriptions on the rocks, and the alluvial remains; but the granite series of rocks bounds our inquiries; they are as a veil cast by Omniscience over our view, to bound and limit our knowledge of the earth's history. And a progressive improvement in animals and vegetables is discernible up to the present fair, and perfect state of things.

And foresight, and adaptation to one series of creation, to benefit a succeeding, yet in perspective, is apparent. The Almighty plan, comprehensive, and good, appears to have embraced the plan of the creation of an intelligent being, called man.

He foreknew that the physical wants of that species, when ages had elapsed, and produced a certain state of civilization, would require more fuel, for comfort, and carrying on the various operations of the arts, than the woods, and groves could supply, and leave space enough for agricultural purposes. He accordingly sunk vast reservoirs, or granaries, and filled them with vegetable combustibles, the produce and deposit of gigantic vegetables, the luxuriant growth of incalculable ages, and periods gone past, for the use of the present generation of mankind; and hence the inexhaustible coal fields, the absolute need of which is beginning to be manifest.

This is but one short page, or leaf of nature's book; but it is instructive, full of determined design to confer happiness. And does the book of revelation contradict these cheering views, when it declares this state of being is probationary, and introductory to another of superior excellence; and that the tender mercies of the great Author endure for ever; and that this present scene is a specimen of future regards, and higher enjoyments yet in anticipation?

The granite rocks cast a veil over all below them, and forbid the scrutinising eye of inquiry to pry into the records of creation below that barrier.

Death also spreads an impenetrable veil over future scenes, and forbids all knowledge of what passes 'when we have shuffled off this mortal coil.'

Let theologians then cease to unfold the secrets of the prison house, by assertions so utterly at variance with the records of the past, as to hint at such a fixed evil in the universe of Deity, as endless, but ever increasing misery. There are no indications of it in the past, from which all deductions of facts can alone be adduced. Why do not they proclaim the following cheering sentiments, that the Deity, 'from seeming evil, still produces good; and better thence again, and better still in infinite progression.' Is it because they are hirelings, and are paid to teach us as they do? Or is it their ignorance caused by a bad education?

These tenets have been publicly taught for 1000 years, but the light of science will soon modify and finally destroy every vestige of error.

To me it is a great question, on the solution of which much mental happiness depends; for the bare supposition of endless misery, is the bug-bear, which superstition brings, to make the fear of dying tenfold more terrible. But it is false; the author of eternal good can not be the producer, or permitter of eternal evil.

The mutations to which we may be subject, are most certainly calculated for our progressive improvement. And death, it is confessed by all, is a benefit to the good; and revelation says it can not separate any from the love of God. It is also calculated to advantage the wicked; as it removes them from the farther commission of crime for ever; thus rendering their improvement possible, and certain.

This is perhaps all we can know about a future state of being.

The application is easy, and fruitful of instruction, namely to love God, and keep his commandments. NEMO.

INSANITY PRODUCED BY RELIGIOUS ERROR.

BR. SKINNER.—From the article in the last Magazine and Advocate, headed 'Insanity produced by Religious Error,' it appears that 'the total number of admissions into the Ohio Lunatic Asylum during the last seven years is 691, and that of this number 70 were made insane from religious causes. This makes the number of the religious insane to be nearly one tenth of the whole, and averages, for the seven years the institution has been in operation, 10 per year. Large as this number is, it does not equal the number that has been made insane from the same cause in our own State.—From the annual report of the N. Y. State Lunatic Asylum, made a few weeks since, we are made acquainted with some startling facts in reference to this subject.

The Asylum went into operation January 16, 1843, something over three years ago, 'since which time 844 patients have been received, and 559 discharged; of which 320 were recovered, 139 improved, 56 unimproved, 44 died.' Among the various causes that are mentioned as having caused insanity, it is stated that out of the 844 patients who have been received into the Asylum during the brief three years of its existence, 102 have been brought to insanity by 'religious anxiety,' and 19 by 'Millerism,' making in all from 'religious causes' 121! or one seventh of the whole number, and averaging at the rate of forty per year! Now this is horrible. To think that the religion of Jesus which was instituted to bless mankind, to bring peace on earth and good will to men, to give them the spirit of love and of a sound mind, should be so perverted from its legitimate object and intention as to shatter the intellects, as to dethrone the reason of poor human beings, is awful, is lamentable indeed. And who are they who thus exert this tremendously deleterious effect upon our fellow creatures? They are Partialist preachers. They are what Dr. Ananias Brigham, author of the 'Influence of Religion upon Health,' and the present superintendent of the State Lunatic Asylum denominates 'denouncing preachers'—preachers who 'delight,' as he says, 'to dwell on the terrors of the world to come, and on the power and vengeance of the Almighty,' who preach, as he further says, 'exciting and alarming discourses respecting 'sinning away the day of grace,' 'committing the unpardonable sin,' 'dropping into hell immediately,' and who discourse as he says in another place 'on the certainty of eternal damnation!' It is by hearing such preaching, says the Dr., that men become religious melancholics, and not only often attempt to destroy themselves, but also their friends and dearest kindred. 'I have,' he says, in speaking of his own knowledge of the effects of such preaching, 'the particulars of above ninety cases of suicide from religious melancholy, which have occurred in six of the Northern States (the New England States and New York,) within the last twenty years, and most of them have occurred within a very few years; and also, of thirty cases in the same States, of this disease leading the unhappy sufferers to kill or to attempt to kill their children or dearest relatives, believing they should thereby ensure the future happiness of those they destroyed. I have heard of many more cases of a like character, and have seen accounts of others in public papers, and have no doubt that if all which have occurred in the Northern States within the last twenty years, could be known, together with those cases of insanity from similar causes, but not attended with the propensity to self-destruction, or to the destruction of others, the great number would as much surprise and grieve the friends of humanity, as did the first published accounts of the ravages of intemperance in this country. Now whoever will carefully, and without prejudice, examine this subject, and call to mind the immense amount of machinery in operation in this country, to excite the minds of men, women and children, and to keep them excited by numerous meetings, &c., &c., will not be surprised at the number of the insane being so great, but rather that it should be so small.' Yes, Partialist divines, the heralds of damnation, are the ones who have produced all these results, the author of the 'Influence of Religion upon Health' himself being witness. We would ask Dr. Brigham one question. Did he ever know, did he ever hear of an individual who was made insane by Universalism, by the preaching of the great doctrine of the Restoration? In this work before referred to he has not even intimated such a thing—nor can he! We challenge him with all his experience in matters of insanity to produce the first instance. And yet, strange to tell! none others than Partialist clergymen have ever been permitted to officiate in the chapel of the State Lunatic Asylum. The Rev. Ira Pettibone, who officiates as the present Chaplain, however worthy he may be, in many respects, is well known to have been an active conductor of revival protracted meetings, those 'machines' by which so many have been made mad and others melancholy, and for which Dr. Brigham has such a profound horror. And at the time the Chapel of the Asylum was dedicated, the resident Universalist clergymen of Utica, who in common with all Universalist ministers 'love to speak (the Dr.'s language) of the merciful character of the Deity, whom they represent as a father who welcomes without reproaches the returning prodigal; as a shepherd who seeks, and in a kindly voice, calls back the wandering sheep,' did not receive, if I have been correctly informed, the common civility, in common with the other clergymen of the city, of an invitation to attend, much less to participate in the services. Flaming, 'denouncing' revivalist preachers, some of whom have acted as aids and supernumeraries to the notorious Knapp, were called upon to officiate on that occasion! Well let it be so. Let Partialist preachers, if it must be so, make maniacs and fill our Asylums, and let Dr. Brigham cure them. Universalists have a better part to perform—they will do their best to prevent maniacs being made—and I am sure that 'an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure!' W. R.

THE UNITARIANS.

Our Unitarian friends are organizing a N. York State Association for the better promotion of their cause, and they are also about establishing a weekly paper in this city. We rejoice in every evidence of their increased zeal, and hope they may arouse from that inactivity which has of late seemed to pervade their ranks, especially in this city. With only two societies in this great city, and scarcely a dozen in the State, there is certainly abundant cause for their most zealous and persevering efforts.

B.

We can not avoid pending one query to our friend 'B.'s remarks above. Why is it that the Unitarian denomination has made so little progress in this city and State? Manifestly, in our opinion, on account of their exclusiveness. They have studiously kept aloof of all liberal Christians—the Universalists and the Christians—till quite recently they have made advances to the latter. They have seemingly felt afraid of contamination, by associating with Universalists, particularly—afraid that popular prejudice would make against them on account of Universalism, when it is undoubtedly a fact that popular, or orthodox prejudice, (so called,) has set stronger against them, on account of their very indefiniteness, than against Universalism, notwithstanding all its openness and direct preaching.

If Unitarianism expects to prosper to any great extent in this country, it must give some clear and audible Idea to the world of its faith. It must either preach Endless Punishment or reject that doctrine—settle upon some generally fixed principle, and then it may hope to increase in numbers. In its present undefinable position it can hardly obtain public confidence to any extent. It may be a fashionable church, and that will make it exclusive—aristocratic—qualities not at all favorable to any great enlargement of its borders.—[N. Y. Christian Messenger.

That honesty is the best policy was illustrated some years since under the following circumstances detailed by the Rochester Democrat. A lad was proceeding to an uncle's to petition him for aid for a sick sister and her children when he found a wallet containing fifty dollars. The aid was refused and the distressed family were pinched for want. The boy revealed the fortune to his mother but expressed a doubt about using any portion of the money. His mother confirmed the good resolution—the pocket book was advertised and the owner found. Being a man of wealth upon learning the history of the family he presented the fifty dollars to his sick mother and took the boy into his service and he is now one of the most successful merchants in Ohio. Honesty always brings its reward—to the minds, if not to the pocket.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

I.

'OUR FATHER.'

Eternal Essence, uncreated Love,
 Who wast, who art, and ever shalt endure,
 The same as when, commissioned from above,
 Thy spirit came, all radiantly pure,
 To warm the bosoms of the sons of men,
 And turn their thoughts to reverence of thee!
Our Father, we adore thy holy name,
 And trust thy truth, whose might shall make us free!
 Grant that, ere long, this love-fraught phrase may be
 The light, the love, the watchword of mankind,
 Turning the souls of millions unto thee,
 Who now in darkness wander, fully blind;
 Oh, may each bosom, kindled from above,
 Behold in thee a 'Father's' gracious love!

II.

'WHICH ART IN HEAVEN.'

Thou God, the Father and Friend of man,
 Whose dwelling is a spiritual dome,
 Not visible to outward sense, nor can
 The 'flesh' nor 'blood' e'er find within a home!
 Thy residence is found within the life
 That nature lives, untrammelled by the wrong
 Which jars the Universe, nor is it rife
 With errors that have cursed the world so long!
 Thy temple is where happiness is found;
 Thy presence where the true and good are seen;
 Thy blessing is the basis, deep, profound,
 Upon which Heaven is built—has ever been!
 Oh, may we all unto that Heaven attain,
 Then were earth's crosses, and e'en death, our gain.

III.

'HALLOWED BE THY NAME.'

Unto thee, Father, would we lowly bow,
 Filled with reverence devoid of fear—
 That fear with torment fraught—and even now,
 While thousands dread thy venging arm, we hear
 Seraphic voices tuned to praise and song!
 Forever 'hallowed be thy name,' oh, God!
 And may each darkened soul awake ere long,
 Freed from the scourgings of thy righteous rod!
 Oh, may the sinful learn to hush thy name;
 May each most humbly bow before thy throne;
 May the purged bosom, fired with holiest flame,
 Be blessed with raptures he ne'er yet has known!
 And above all, thy 'hallowed' name be praised,
 Till every soul shall be to thee upraised.

BISHOP OF VERMONT—STATE RELIGION.

The following article we copy from the (Vt.) Watchman and Repository. It contains some palpable hits at the ridiculous assumptions of Episcopacy not in Vermont only, but throughout Republican America.

BR. BALLOU.—As you have resided in Vermont nearly as long as I have been absent, as a citizen, from that truly 'free state,' You may be in possession of all the facts which will enable you to answer correctly the question I desire to ask, viz., has Vermont so far changed her constitution, or so blended church and state as to have created, and by law recognized, the office of Bishop? I have known from my boyhood, that Vermont has had her Governor, her Lt. Governor, her Legislature, her Supreme Court, her Marshall, &c., and I have known that she also had many other good things, and some perhaps not so good, with all sorts of religionists, with their respective church organizations and ecclesiastical officers of various ranks—all formerly, if not now, enjoying equal protection from the laws and government of the state; but I did not know that Vermont had appointed any one to the office of Bishop. Nor indeed, should I have suspected anything of the kind had I not seen a notice in our city papers a few days since, that on a certain evening 'Rev. Dr. Hopkins, Bishop of Vermont,' would deliver a lecture before the 'Young Men's Association'—and when on that evening, the President of the Association announced the lecturer he said, 'he had the pleasure of introducing to the audience the Rev. Dr. Hopkins, Bishop of Vermont.'

What! said I to a friend near me, has Vermont a Bishop? O no, was his reply, 'he is the Bishop of the Episcopal church up in Vermont.' Ah, that may be—I knew that church recognised the office, but the President said the 'Bishop of Vermont,' and so said the papers in giving notice of the lecture. 'But they mean that he is Bishop not of Vermont, but of a class of Christians in Vermont.'—Very well, with this commentary on the declarations, it is all very easily understood; but without it, any one not conversant with the facts in the case, would understand that Vermont had established a law religion with her Bishop at the head of her church—for 'as there can be no Bishop without a church'—having a Bishop, it is a logical deduction that Vermont has her church—and as we have seen the Bishop, so we MAY be favored with a visit from some lay member of 'the church' of Vermont. I fear, Br. Ballou, that the young Vermonters are losing that good old republican spirit which characterised her hardy and generous sons in times past, if they have consented to the establishment of a religious Hierarchy as a state institution. Such a measure I hope will be the last which shall be adopted by the free born sons of my native state. May that noble little sister, in the great and increasing family of states, be the last, whose civil institutions shall be so changed as to show any partiality to either of the existing religious sects, but protecting all, show partiality to none. But on the supposition that the above explanation is correct, that when it was announced that 'the Bishop of Vermont would speak before the Young Men's Association,' the idea to be received was that the speaker did not claim to be what the announcement plainly indicated, but only the Bishop of that part of the Episcopal church which is located 'up in Vermont'—admitting this to be the meaning, why not so? Then even a stranger in our country would not be deceived in reading our papers, or on having the name and title of our citizens announced.

One thing further, Br. Ballou, as you are an editor, and therefore bound to answer all questions of this sort, who gave the lead, or set the example of speaking of Episcopal Bishops, as Bishops of the different states in which they reside? Can it be possible that any of those functionaries have thus represented themselves? Thus leading the people unconsciously to accustom themselves to the use of such language as is indicating of what those claiming to be 'the church' desire to bring to pass? Or is that desire, viz., the establishment of a state religion, so strong and ardent as to body itself forth in words unconsciously? And yet another inquiry—if each sect in Vermont should appoint its Bishop, which I suppose each has a right to do, how many Bishops would she have?

MONEY WELL EXPENDED.

Capt. S. C. S., of Portland, was one day passing thro' one of the streets of Boston, when he saw a poor sailor lying upon the side walk, with his feet in such a position as to endanger his limbs if not his life. Capt. S. pulled him out of the gutter, and aroused him, and by degrees got his history,

He was from a good family, who resided in the eastern part of Maine, had been well educated, and exhibited even now the wreck of a brilliant intellect and an amiable disposition. He had been sick, he said, and staid his time out in the Charlestown Hospital, and had that morning been discharged without a cent, and in so feeble a state as to disqualify him to go to sea again at present.

'Then why don't you go home?' said Captain S.

'I can not pay my passage; I have no money,' answered the desponding sailor.

'Have you found any body who would give you any breakfast?' said the Captain.

'No,' was the reply, 'but I found a man who gave me something to drink, and as I was very weak and hungry, the liquor overcame me; but I am not so much intoxicated as I seem to be, I have my senses perfectly well.'

'How much will take you home,' inquired the Captain.

'There is,' said the tar, 'a vessel lying at the wharf, which will take me within two miles of my home for one dollar, and I would go, if I only had the money.'

'Now, shipmate,' continued the Captain, 'give us your hand. Look me straight in the eye. Now promise me, upon the honor of a sailor, that you will never drink any more of that poison stuff, and I'll give you some breakfast and pay your passage home.'

The sailor clasped his emaciated fingers around the rough hand of the Captain, and pronounced the pledge. Captain S. handed him a bill, and saw him safe in the nearest public house, and went on his way.

Some three years after, as Capt. S. was passing through Exchange street, Portland, some one behind him called out—

'Cap'n: I say Cap'n: Hallo, Cap'n.'

Captain S. turned round and a well dressed stranger grasped him heartily by the hand, and inquired if he knew him. He confessed he did not recollect ever to have met him before. The stranger after several ineffectual attempts to refresh his memory, finally, brought to his recollection the scene narrated above, and confessed that he was the sailor to whom he had thus acted the part of the Samaritan, and insisted on restoring him four-fold for the money which had been bestowed on that occasion. 'All remuneration was refused, and the young man was exhorted to go and do likewise.

'I will with all my heart,' said he, as the tears gathered in his eyes: 'but I owe you a debt I can never discharge. I have never broken my pledge, and by the help of God I never will. I went home after you left me, and by the entreaty of my friends, I commenced trading, and am now here to purchase goods. I have been prospered in business, and have been lately united to the woman of my choice. You saved my soul and body, for I trust I have lately been made acquainted with the blessed Saviour of sinners. O if my poor old father could get hold of your hand, he would almost wring it from your body for gratitude. The generous heart of the Captain was melted, for he loved the Saviour too. The flood-gates of soul were opened, and they wept together like two children, shook hands again, exchanged a hearty 'God bless you,' and parted.'—[Morning Star.

A PLEASANT SURPRISE.

A young man, of eighteen or twenty, a student in a University, took a walk one day with a professor, who was commonly called the student's friend, such was his kindness to the young men whose office it was to instruct.

While they were walking together, and the professor was seeking to lead the conversation to grave subjects, they saw an old pair of shoes lying in their path, which they supposed belonged to a poor man who was at work in the field close by, and who had finished his day's work.

The young student turned to the professor, saying, 'let us play the man a trick: we will hide his shoes, and conceal ourselves behind those bushes, and watch to see his perplexity when he can not find them.'

'My dear friend,' answered the professor, 'we must never amuse ourselves at the expense of the poor. But you are rich, and you may give yourself a much greater pleasure by means of this poor man. Put a dollar into each shoe, and then we will hide ourselves.'

The student did so, and then placed himself with the professor behind the bushes close by, through which they could easily watch the laborer, and see whatever wonder or joy he might express.

The poor man had soon finished his work, and came across the field to the path, where he had left his coat and shoes. While he put on the coat, he slipped one foot into one of his shoes; but feeling something hard, he stooped down and found the dollar. Astonishment and wonder were seen upon his countenance; he gazed upon the dollar, turned it round and looked again and again; then he looked around him on all sides, but could see no one.—Now he put the money in his pocket and proceeded to put on the other shoe; but how great was his astonishment when he found in the other a dollar! His feelings overcame him; he fell upon his knees, looked up to heaven and uttered a loud, a fervent thanksgiving, in which he spoke of his wife, sick and helpless, and his children without bread, whom this timely bounty from some unknown hand would save from perishing.

The young man stood there deeply affected, and tears filled his eyes.

'Now,' said the professor, 'are you not much better pleased than if you had played your intended trick?'

'O, dearest sir,' answered the youth, 'you have taught me a lesson that I will never forget. I feel now the truth of the words which I never before understood, it is better to give than to receive.'

A BLIND AND DEAF GIRL AND HER BIBLE.—Would you know the value of the Bible, let me introduce you to a scene of deep and thrilling interest, as related by a minister, an eye witness. A young woman, completely blind and deaf was brought before a number of eminent surgeons to see if any thing could be done for her. Her sad condition had been produced by a violent pain in the head.

The only method of communicating with her was by tapping her hand, which signified no, and by squeezing it, which signified yes. The surgeon concluded that her case was incurable, and in reply to her earnest inquiries, she received the unwelcome tap. She immediately burst into tears and wept aloud in all the bitterness of anguish. 'What,' said she, 'shall I never see the light of day, or hear a human voice? Must I remain shut up in darkness and silence as long as I live?' and again she wept. It was an affecting sight. If she had been able to see, she might have been pointed to the promises of the Bible, if to hear, they might have been cited for her comfort.—At length a friend who was present took up the Bible and placed it to her breast. It was a touching and beautiful act. She placed her hands on it and asked, Is this the Bible? Her hand was squeezed in reply. She immediately clasped the Bible in her hands, and held it up to her bosom and exclaimed—'This is the only comfort I have left, I shall never be able to look upon its blessed pages, but I can think of the blessed promises I have learnt from it,' and then began to repeat some of the promises: 'Cast thy burden upon the Lord and he will sustain thee.'—'Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee. My grace is sufficient for thee,' &c. She dried her tears, became submissive to the will of God, and was happy.

'HE TALKS VERY RATIONAL.'—Speaking of temperance, by-the-by, calls to mind this little circumstance, mentioned to us the other night by a pleasant friend. A man residing in a New England town, at some distance from a near relative, received a message one cold evening in November, to hasten to his residence as he was in a dying state. When he arrived, he was a little better, but his reason had entirely left him. The sick man presently turned his head, saying, in a faint voice, 'Who is that?' was informed that it was his relative who had been sent for. 'Oh! ah!' said he, 'yes—oh, yes! He must be a-cold. Make him a good warm toddy—yes, a toddy, toddy.'

'I guess he an't crazy,' said his visitor to the friends standing around, 'he talks very rational.'

THE BEADLE AND THE COUNTRYMAN.—A short time since one of the beadles of N—, took a quantity of butter from a countryman because it was deficient in weight; and meeting him a few days after in a public house, said to him—

'You are the man I took twenty pounds of butter from the other day.'

'No I bean't,' replied Hodge.

'I am sure you are,' says the beadle.

'I tell you I bean't,' replied the countryman, 'and if thou likes, I'll lay thee a guinea on't.'

'Done!' replied the beadle, and the money was quickly posted.

'Now,' said the countryman, 'thou did take lumps of butter from me, but if they had been twenty pounds, you'd have no right to take 'em; and this,' continued he, very coolly pocketing the money, 'will just pay me for the loss of the butter.'

WISE SAYINGS.—Solomon said, many centuries ago, 'Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure and whether it be right.'

Some people seem to think that children have no character at all. On the contrary, an observing eye sees in these young creatures the signs of what they are likely to be for life.

When I see a little boy slow to go to school and glad of an excuse to neglect his book, I think it a sign that he will be a dunce.

When I see a boy in haste to spend every penny as soon as he gets it, I think it a sign that he will be a spend-thrift.

When I see a boy hoarding up his pennies, and unwilling to part with them for any good purpose, I think it a sign that he will be a miser.

When I see a boy or girl always looking out for themselves, and dislike to share good things with others, I think it a sign that the child will grow up a very selfish person.

When I see boys and girls often quarrelling, I think it a sign that they will be violent and hateful men and women.

When I see a little boy willing to taste strong drink, I think it a sign that he will be a drunkard.

When I see a boy that never prays, I think it a sign that he will be a profligate man.

When I see a child obedient to its parents, I think it a sign of great future blessings from Almighty God.

When I see a boy fond of the Bible, and well acquainted with it, I think it a sign that he will be a pious and happy man.

And though great changes sometimes take place in the character, yet as a general rule, these signs do not fail.—[Christian Mirror.]

THE PHARISEE AND THE PUBLICAN.

The fortunes of mankind are cast in different moulds; those fortunes bear complexions differing in many respects, and secure different blessings for their possessors. One has talents which secure him the praise of the intelligent and gifted; another has wealth at his command; one is in possession of this privilege, and another of that; and how prone are we to be lifted up in our own estimation, by those blessings, gifts, talents, and powers, which the God of Heaven has bestowed upon us! But we seem to forget that such pride as this, and the pure religion of our Saviour, can never dwell, at one and the same time, in the human heart. There is no harmony between the two. Their natures are entirely different; in direct opposition to each other, and though the world may accord to one the praise of being devotedly pious, and deeply religious; yet, if wealth or talent lifts him in his own opinion above his less fortunate and gifted fellow beings, but little religion is there. What an excellent lesson such an one has, in the parable of the Pharisee and Publican.—And it would be well for all to turn their attention to that portion of the instruction of him who spoke as never did man before, and from that, learn how unworthy of the name of man, are all feelings of an ignoble and selfish pride.

'Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a Publican. The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself; God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I fast twice in the week, and give tithes of all that I possess.'

This Pharisee belonged to a sect, which in the days of our Saviour, was acknowledged to be more popular than any other. And he goes up to the temple with all that pompous and selfish pride, which is so apt to find a place in the minds of those who regard themselves as the especial recipients of the gifts and blessings of Heaven; and his prayer partakes of the nature of the feelings which were within his heart. Where was that acknowledgment, due to the Supreme Being as the author of his existence, and the giver of every blessing which he was permitted to enjoy? Where was that desire, that God would give him strength to withstand the temptations of the world, and to enable him to obey the precepts and commandments of his Maker? Where was his anxiety for those by whom he was surrounded? for their happiness and welfare? The truth is, that his self-righteous pride had rendered him blind to all of these things; had driven humanity from his bosom, and steeled his heart against the consciousness of his entire dependence upon the author of all good, and also rendered him unmindful of his duty toward his fellow beings. And what a contrast is formed to his course, by the conduct of the publican.

The publican stood there with deep solemnity impressed upon his mind; and he could not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven. With his soul awed with reverence, and a knowledge of his own frailty, he stood there in the presence of God, smote upon his breast, and prayed—'God be merciful to me, a sinner.' He spoke of no deeds which he had performed; he said nothing of what he possessed; he expressed no contempt for the humble situation of others, but only a simple acknowledgement of his sinfulness, with a deep and fervent supplication that the mercy of God might rest upon him. Such was his proceeding, and now how were the two men looked upon by the eye of Heaven? The Saviour answers: 'I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other; for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.'

Here is a lesson for the proud and arrogant man; for him whose self-righteous spirit prompts him to look with disdain upon the humble and unassuming individual, and whose mind is governed by sentiments of a nature calculated to render him lost to his actual situation, unmindful of his duty to himself, to his brother man, and to his God. And it should be the study of every sensible man, to gain wisdom from this instruction of the great Teacher, and thereafter to act in agreement with the knowledge thus possessed. And while all feelings of a selfish pride are driven from our minds, there is one thing of which we may and should be proud—well doing. A pride arising from the consciousness of well doing, and judiciously governed; a pride of having accomplished the duty which we owe to others; of having acted worthy of the name and nature of man; of having followed the pure principles of religion—when one has lived in this manner, he may be proud within himself, that his labor has not been in vain but such as to bring down upon his head the approbation of God.

FATAL DUEL IN RICHMOND.—A fatal duel—a barbarous and bloody fight—occurred on the 25th ult., opposite to Richmond, on the Manchester side of James River, between John Hampden Pleasants, Esq., for many years the talented Editor of the Richmond Whig, and Thomas Ritchie, Jr., which resulted in sadly mangle and fatally wounding the former, so that he died two days after the rencounter. Thus another son of genius, one of the most gifted of his State, has fallen by that horrid and murderous relic of barbarism—duelling—to rise no more!—When, O when shall professing Christians and Christian communities learn to repudiate and put down for ever so murderous, so horrid a practice? Is not that community that tolerates and encourages duelling—that upholds and sanctions it, and allows it to be honorable, accountable for the many valuable lives that are sacrificed to this false code of honor? We think so. It must be so. A very deep and general sensation has been produced in Richmond by the death of so eminent a citizen as Mr. Pleasants was. We pray God the sensation may grow deeper, more general and solemn, till the whole community, as one man, shall rise in utter and everlasting condemnation of duelling.

THE MISSIONARY CAUSE.

We are glad to see by a notice, in this day's paper, from Mrs. Smith and Hunt of the Buffalo Association, that a meeting is to be held in Buffalo on the 31st inst., for the purpose of forming a Missionary Society, for the more effectual advancement of liberal Christianity in that region. This, in our opinion, is the right way to go to work, the true policy and obvious duty of Universalists for the wider and more rapid spread of the great truths of the Gospel of a world's salvation—the policy which we ought to have adopted, the duty which we ought to have performed, years ago.

It is true, obstacles existed in past years to this enterprise, and still do exist, though in a less degree than formerly; but none have existed nor do exist, but what may be and will be overcome by time, patience and perseverance—by firm resolution and energetic action. There is not a single Universalist Association in our State, and perhaps not in the United States, but what might sustain well and constantly at least one Missionary within its bounds. And we hope to see the time, and that soon too, when every Association shall have its missionary, and some of them several missionaries constantly employed. Who can estimate the amount of good that would result to our cause from this single auxiliary, the missionary enterprise? Who can tell how many hundreds, and thousands even, of captive souls, may, by the judicious and well directed labors of the missionary, be emancipated from the bondage of sin and the thralldom of fear and superstition, into the glorious liberty of the children of God?

The success of the experiment wherever it has been tried, judiciously tried, and persevered in, demonstrates both the practicability and advantages of missionary efforts among Universalists. The Chenango Mission, set on foot about two years since, has more than realized the expectations of the brethren who first started it. It has carried light to many a benighted dwelling, joy to many a disconsolate heart, and borne the tidings of the great salvation to many neighborhoods and towns where hitherto the people had sat, and otherwise would have continued to sit, in darkness and the shadow of death: and we believe it is destined to accomplish still greater good and develop still more glorious results in coming years. The New York Association has also employed a Missionary for a year or two past, and with the greatest advantage and best results to the cause of truth. The Cayuga and other Associations have just formed or are about forming Missionary societies and embarking in the cause of missions: and if they but persevere, and judiciously organize and conduct their affairs, they can hardly fail to give a new impulse to the cause of truth and impart renewed zeal and confidence every where to its friends.

It is understood there are several places within the bounds of the Buffalo Association—and is it not so with every other Association in the State?—where societies might be raised if they could only make a beginning among them, and where a preacher would be regularly employed and sustained some part of the time, if they could only raise the means to pay one for a few Sundays till an organization could be effected. Now the Missionary, employed by the Association, is the very man to go into such places, wake up the sleepers, organize societies, put the machinery in motion—for the machinery every where exists and only needs to be started and put in order, to run well—and he can do this, when few others can, and perhaps none others will. He is employed and paid for his time and labors—and may feel that his bread is sure—his waters shall not fail. And whether he gets any pecuniary compensation or not, at this, that or the other place, for the first, second or third time he may visit it, he can arouse public attention to the subject, learn the state of feeling in the place, whether there is any desire for occasional or stated ministrations of the word, how much pecuniary means can be raised for the purpose, and, by judicious advice and assistance, organize a new society, a band of brothers in the faith, who will take hold of the work and do what they can to propagate the truth among men, and exemplify its power in their own lives.

We believe it is to the Missionary spirit, and the Missionary character of their ministry, more than to any other one cause, if not more than to all other causes combined that the Methodists are indebted for their remarkable success as a denomination. Without this they never could have succeeded. With this, in spite of the absurdities and monstrosities in their theory and many of their practices, in spite of the iron tyranny of their priestly authority, and the perfect popery of their bishoprics, they have succeeded in greatly multiplying their numbers. And though they are now waning in their glory and their numbers annually diminishing, yet by the Missionary spirit and practices still continued, they will continue much longer and exert a much wider influence than they possibly could without it.

And now, our word for it, let Universalists, who have a doctrine so far superior, in beauty, sublimity and glory, in the evidences furnished in its favor by reason and revelation, in its social, moral, and religious influences, but adopt the Missionary spirit and employ this powerful auxiliary in its behalf, our doctrine would run and be glorified—would extend its influence and power far more rapidly than Methodism ever did in its palmy days.—The state of society, the spirit of the age, the many philanthropic undertakings and enterprises now going forward in this country and throughout the civilized world, are all favorable to the progress of Universalism—all point out the present as the time for it to make rapid strides and mighty conquests. Let then, the Missionary enterprise be espoused and persevered in with a zeal and fidelity worthy of the name we profess. We have the men competent to the labors of the Missionary; we have the means necessary to sustain them, if we will but call them into requisition and employ them. Public opinion in general, and in our denomination in particular, is now favorable to the undertaking. What then shall prevent us from going forward immediately, and that too with the most certain prospect of complete and triumphant success?

D. S.

THE QUESTION.

The great question at issue between the Universalist and Partialist is not, Will God punish?—but, Will he punish endlessly?—will he inflict interminable torment? That he visits the iniquity of man with stripes, and his transgressions with a rod, can not be denied. Man is so constituted, and the divine economy is such, that he can not sin without bringing upon himself wretchedness and pain. 'There is no peace to the wicked,' and the sin of man will assuredly find him out. But all this is very different from endless misery. Punishments may be—under the government of God it is, for the good of the punished; but endless sorrow and suffering could benefit no being in God's universe, and hence could be considered nothing less than a species of revenge.

Now, none can believe that God is in possession of a disposition that can be gratified only by the infinite torture and endless agonies of a considerable portion of his own offspring. None can contemplate the character of God as it is revealed to us in Nature and in his written Word, and still believe from the heart that he has created millions for no other purpose than to crush them to endless ruin. None can believe sincerely that he is a Father, in whose strong and universal love there is no change, and still cherish the idea that he has prepared woes and tortures for countless multitudes of his own children, and that he will feast his soul on the shrieks and groans of beings whom his own hand has created, and whom his own dear Son was sent to save. It is only when we strip him of his paternity, and make him Hatred instead of Love, that we can imagine this. O, what sin is here! To doubt that God will be as kind as an earthly parent—to believe that he will cast off his own children forever—that he will hear their melting cries and heed them not, their pleadings for mercy and grant them no reprieve—to believe this when he has told us that he is more kind and faithful than a mother, and when surrounded by living and abiding proofs of his infinite regard, is a species of the blackest ingratitude—if there be any unpardonable sin this is it—if there be any one sin more heaven-daring than all others, more blasphemous, this is it! And if we go to our Lunatic Asylums, our Insane Hospitals, we will find living proof of the tremendous forfeiture than men and women have paid, for believing that God was a monster and not a Father—that he would fail them at last, and heap upon them the eternity of torment!

O, my readers!—if you have one spark of reverence or love for God glowing in your hearts—if you have any regard for the interests or welfare of your kind—if you have any care for your own peace, or would wish for comfort in the hour of sorrow, and in your dying moments; cast entirely and forever from you a belief which makes the present gloomy and the future dark—which makes some melancholy and others mad, and opens a fountain of woe in every heart where it is cherished!

CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

We have, perhaps, thousands of men, who are afraid of church government, and averse to joining a church; who are, nevertheless earnest in endeavors to teach the world the necessity of self-discipline, and mutual relief work.—Why then, will not these thousands come into associated disciplinary measures, in their religious capacity? Can they expect that their teachings will influence others, when it is seen that themselves, professing a mutuality of faith, will not work together in the covenanted discipline of the church—will not acknowledge by church relation, their determination to take heed to the interests of brotherhood? Again, these thousands of which we speak, are those who, notwithstanding their aversion to church organization, will go away from the house of Christ, and bind themselves in the most solemn pledges of the Odd Fellow, or other relief associations; thereby consenting to recognise the duty of the Christian, without giving the credit where it belongs; to Christianity. Why leave home all gloomy and desolate, under pretence that we do not like home regulations? Why not keep believers, and the fruits of faith, and the covenanted obligations of believers, together; so that when the fruit is seen, we may also evince that we are not ashamed of the faith. If these thousands of odd fellows and others, would respect their faith, might they not make the church what it ought to be, an association of relief and mutual counsel?

REMOVAL.—Our esteemed and venerable Br. Job Potter has removed from Cooperstown, where he has resided for many years, to Waterville, Oneida county, and desires all letters and communications designed for him to be directed accordingly. By a private letter from Br. P., we learn that his son, and an only child has located at Waterville and he desires to be located near him—that he thinks this a more favorable location also as agent of the Liberal Institute in collecting and remitting funds for that institution. He will hold himself in readiness to preach occasionally as opportunity shall offer, or occasion require.

A fire broke out in the building occupied by Br. A. Tompkins, 33 Cornhill, Boston, a few days since, and did considerable damage. We understand by the Trumpet that Br. T. was insured; but as the Ladies Repository for March was mostly destroyed, the subscribers will have to wait a few days till it can be reprinted.

NEW MEETING-HOUSES.—We learn by the 'Star in the West' that the Universalists of Dayton, Ohio, are making preparations to build a new church the coming season; also that a subscription is in circulation for the same purpose in Bellbrook, O. And Br. Gurley adds, that besides the above, 'we learn that the Universalists of Columbus (the Capitol of the State) will certainly build the coming season. They expect to erect a very beautiful edifice—handsome without and pleasant within.

Our brethren in Memphis, Tenn., have purchased a lot and are about building a new church. Br. Gaylord now ministers to them.

A new society has just been organized in Truro, Mass., as we learn by the Freeman, and preparations are being made to erect a new meeting-house forthwith.

DEDICATION.—The new and beautiful church recently built by the Universalists of Glens Falls, was dedicated, as we learn by the N. Y. Ch. Messenger, on the 18th ult. Dedication sermon by Br. John Moore, assisted in the services by Brs. A. A. Davis, Aspinwall, and others. The house is 56 by 36 feet, is very neatly finished, has a bell and town clock, a chandelier presented by the Universalists of Troy, and every thing promises fair for the cause in that thriving Village. A two days Conference was holden there at the time of the dedication.

Rev. S. H. Lloyd was installed pastor of a Unitarian congregation at Hubbardstown, Mass., a few weeks since. Universalist societies sometimes settle Unitarian ministers, and Unitarian societies quite as often settle Universalist ministers in Massachusetts.

¶ We are informed by Br. Abel Tompkins that the sheets of the Ladies Repository for March, were destroyed by the late fire, and that in consequence, he intends issuing a double number early in April, constituting the March and April numbers.

Br. G. S. DEATHS.

In Delta, Feb. 5th, aged 72 years, Mrs. MARY PEASE, relict of Capt. Barzilla Pease.

Sister Pease had lived to a good old age, beloved and respected by all who knew her, and died lamented. She was a firm believer in the doctrine of the 'final restitution of all things.' Sustained by this belief, she looked calmly upon the approach of death, and although it came unexpectedly, I trust it found her ready to bid it welcome. A sermon was delivered at her funeral to a numerous and attentive audience, from Phil. i: 23, by the writer. S. J.

In Lee, Jan. 23d, infant son of John and Lucinda Sager, aged 10 months.

In Lee, Feb. 17th, AUGUSTUS SACKETT, infant son of Charles and Pamela Hinkley, aged 8 months and 11 days.

'Short shall this half-extinguish'd spirit burn,
And soon these limbs to kindred dust return!
But not, my child, with life's precarious fire,
The immortal ties of nature shall expire;
There shall resist the triumph of decay
When time is o'er, and worlds have passed away!
Cold in the dust this perish'd heart may lie,
But that which warm'd it once shall never die!
That spark unburied in its mortal frame,
With living light, eternal, and the same,
Shall beam on joy's interminable years,
Unveil'd by darkness—unassuaged by tears.'—CAMPBELL. S. J.

In the town of Rutland, at the residence of her father, on the 31st of December last, Miss ELVIRA MURRAY, aged 21 years. Miss Murray was a young lady of excellent mind and feelings, and her greatest desire ever seemed to be, to make others around her comfortable and happy. Her life was adorned with modesty, and mildness, and true Christian piety. She loved the Gospel of her Saviour, and delighted to hear it proclaimed. She was a firm believer in the ultimate salvation of the whole world—and her faith proved an unfailing support in sickness, and in the hour of death. From the commencement of her illness, which was protracted, she was convinced that she should not recover—and the prospect of so soon entering into the possession of eternal peace, gave her the most perfect confidence and resignation. She never expressed a desire to live—but often spoke of the advantage of dying, and going to an everlasting home; and when her friends were weeping around her dying bed, she exhorted them to be comforted; assuring them that she had no fears; that the prospect was a glorious one; that she should soon be separated from the cares and troubles of earth, and her spirit be perfected in immortal purity and enjoyment. Thus died one of the most perfect of human kind. Her funeral was attended on the 2d of January, and the impartial love of God presented to the mourners, by the writer. H. BOUGHTON.

In Watertown, Feb. 21st, Mrs. BETSEY ANDRUS, wife of Mr. Elisha Andrus, aged 51 years.

Sister Andrus was beloved by all who knew her. She was a devoted friend, an affectionate wife, and a pattern of Christian morality and virtue. She died in the faith of the Restitution—happy in the assurance that Christ 'shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied.' Her funeral was attended at the Universalist church, on the 23d, and a sermon delivered by the writer, assisted in the services by Br. P. Morse. H. BOUGHTON.

UNIVERSALIST PROFESSION OF FAITH.

One of our agents and subscribers living in a neighborhood where Universalism is but little known, and often misrepresented, urgently solicits us to publish the Articles of Faith of the General Convention of Universalists of the United States; also the general Profession of Faith adopted by our Churches and the rules and regulations pertaining thereto, for the information of the public generally and especially of his neighborhood. As it is a number of years since those articles were published in this paper, and many new subscribers would doubtless like to see and preserve them, as well as the brother who makes this request, we cheerfully comply. The only Confession of Faith ever adopted by the General Convention was the one adopted in New England under its old and first organization, at its session in Winchester, N. H., in 1803; and is as follows.

'1. We believe that the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest, and final destination of mankind.

'2. We believe there is one God, whose nature is love; revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of Grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

'3. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected; and that believers ought to maintain order, and practice good works, for these things are good and profitable unto men.'

The above profession has never been altered since first adopted. But no particular form of profession is authoritatively prescribed by our denomination to its members. All believers, however, are expected to embrace as much, and substantially what is therein expressed. Individuals are at liberty to adopt that, or take the Bible alone as their profession, or to write out a more extensive and particular profession, not inconsistent with the Bible teachings. The following is the form adopted and published by the Church in this city at its organization in 1831; and it has been adopted by many of our churches in this State since that time.

GENERAL PROFESSION OF FAITH, OF THE UNIVERSALIST CHURCH IN UTICA.

ARTICLE I.—CONCERNING GOD.—We believe in one, only, living, and true God; that he is a pure spirit, self-existent, immutable, eternal, infinite in wisdom, power, and goodness, and possesses every natural and moral perfection which can render his character amiable, lovely, reverend, and adorable. That he is the Creator, Upholder, Benefactor, and moral Governor of the universe; that he stands in the relation of Father to all mankind; that, as he hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the earth, we are his offspring; all have one Father, one God hath created us; that though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,) yet to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; that God is love, good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works; that he loveth all the things that are, and abhorreth nothing that his hands have made, for he never would have created any thing to have hated it; that he is a just God and a Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth; that he worketh all things after the counsel of his own will; that all his attributes harmonize; that in him, mercy and truth have met together, righteousness and peace have embraced each other.—1 Cor. viii: 4-6. Deut. vi: 4. Mark xii: 29. John iv: 24. Mal. ii: 10, and iii: 6. Gen. xvii: 1. Ps. cxlviii: 5, xlv: 9, lxxxv: 10. Wisdom xi: 24. Isa. xlv: 21. Acts xvii: 24-28. 1 Tim. ii: 4, 5. Eph. i: 11. 1 John iv: 8, 16.

ARTICLE II.—CONCERNING CHRIST.—We believe in one Lord, Jesus Christ. That Jesus of Nazareth is the promised Messiah, the one Mediator between God and men; the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world, the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person; that to him the Divine Spirit was given without measure, and hence, God hath made him both Lord and Christ; given all things into his hand—even power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father hath given him; that all that the Father giveth him, shall so come to him as not to be cast out; that he was sent to reveal the true character of God to the world, and save mankind from sin, misery, darkness, and death; that, to this end, he gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time; is a propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world; that having been crucified on the cross, he arose from the dead on the third day, ascended up on high, leading captivity captive, and giving gifts, unto men; and having brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel, he shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied; shall reconcile all things unto God, by the blood of his cross; that as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive; that he shall reign in his mediatorial kingdom till all things shall be subdued unto him; till death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed; till every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess him Lord, to the glory of God the Father, and that he will then deliver up the kingdom to God, the Father, that God may be all in all. 1 Cor. viii: 6, xv: 3, 4, 22, 24-28. 1 Tim. ii: 5, 6. 1 John ii: 2, iv: 14. John i: 45, iii: 34, 35. vi: 37, xvii: 2, 3. Matt. i: 21. Heb. i: 3. Rom. xiv: 9. Eph. iv: 8. 2 Tim. i: 10. Isa. liii: 11. Col. i: 20. Phil. ii: 10, 11.

ARTICLE III.—CONCERNING THE SCRIPTURES. We believe in the Divine authenticity of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments—that they contain a true and faithful record of the revelation of God to men, and are a perfect and infallible rule of faith and practice; that the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the holy spirit; and that all Scripture given by inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness, that the servants of God may be thoroughly furnished unto all good works, and become wise unto salvation. 2 Peter i: 21. 2 Tim. iii: 15-17.

ARTICLE IV.—CONCERNING THE MOTIVE TO OBEDIENCE.—We believe that, as God hath commended his love to us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us, it is our duty to love him because he first loved us; that if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another; that the goodness of God leadeth to repentance; that the grace of God which bringeth salvation to all men, hath appeared, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; and that those who believe in God, ought to be careful to maintain good works; for these things are good and profitable unto men; that Christ should be our pattern, and his love should constrain us to walk in his footsteps. Rom. ii: 4, v: 8. 2 Cor. v: 14, 15. Tit. ii: 11, 12, iii: 8. 1 John iv: 11, 19.

ARTICLE V.—CONCERNING THE REWARD OF OBEDIENCE.—We believe that great peace have they who love God's law, and nothing shall offend them; they are like trees planted by the rivers of water, that bring forth their fruit in season; their leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever they do shall prosper; that Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace; that she is a tree of life to them that lay hold of her, and happy is every one that retaineth her; that the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace; that Christ's yoke is easy and his burden light, and all who come to him will find rest to their souls; that we who have believed do enter into rest; that, though God is the Saviour of all men, he is especially so of the believer, and that whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, and is not a forgetful hearer but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed. Ps. i: 3, cxix: 165. Prov. iii: 17, 18. Matt. xi: 28-30. Heb. iv: 3. 1 Tim. iv: 10. James i: 25, iii: 18.

ARTICLE VI.—CONCERNING THE PUNISHMENT OF DISOBEDIENCE.—We believe that God, as the righteous and moral Governor of the universe, will render to every man according to his deeds; tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first and also of the Gentile; that he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons; that the way of transgressors is hard; that the wicked are like the troubled sea when it can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt; for there is no peace, saith our God, to the wicked. Rom. ii: 6, 9. Col. iii: 25. Prov. xiii: 15. Matt. xvi: 27. Isa. lvii: 20, 21.

ARTICLE VII.—CONCERNING THE REMEDIAL DESIGN AND LIMITATION OF PUNISHMENT.—We believe the Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies; that he will not contend forever nor be always wroth, lest the spirit should fail before him, and the souls he has made; that although he may apparently forsake his children for a small moment, yet with great mercies he will gather them; in a little wrath he may hide his face from them a moment, but with everlasting kindness will he have mercy on them, and heal them, and lead them also, and restore comforts unto them; that whom he loveth he chasteneth (and he loveth and chasteneth all) for their profit, that they may be partakers of his holiness, and be enabled afterwards to say, 'before I was afflicted I went away, but now have I kept thy word.' Lam. iii: 31, 32. Isa. liv: 7, 8, lvii: 16-18. Heb. xii: 7-11. Ps. lxxxix: 30-35, cxix: 67.

ARTICLE VIII.—CONCERNING BAPTISM.—As there is a difference of opinion among the sincere followers of Christ, in regard to this ordinance, and this difference ought not to separate true disciples one from another, we believe it is the duty of every one to follow the dictates of his or her conscience, leaving each to judge, both of the subject and mode of Baptism, as shall seem most consistent with Scripture and reason. Matt. xxviii: 19. John iv: 2. Acts ii: 41. Rom. vi: 3, 4, 5, xiv: 1-6. 1 Cor. i: 14-17. 1 Pet. iii: 21.

ARTICLE IX.—CONCERNING REPENTANCE, FAITH, AND LOVE.—We believe, according to the divine doctrine and preaching of Christ and his apostles, that repentance toward God for sin, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and love to God and our fellow creatures, are means of grace appointed by God, and essential to our salvation and glory.—Matt. iv: 16, xxii: 37-40. Mark i: 15. Acts iii: 19, v: 31, xx: 21. Heb. xi: 6. 1 John iii: 23, 24.

ARTICLE X.—CONCERNING THE EXTENT OF SALVATION.—We believe that God, who is rich in mercy, who turneth the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, whose people shall be willing in the day of his power, will, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, gather together in one all things, in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him; and that every (intelligent) creature in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, shall at last unite in the song of Moses and the Lamb, saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever. Eph. i: 9-11, ii: 4. Prov. xxi: 1. Ps. cx: 3. Rev. v: 13.

CHRIST'S MISSION.

Since the clear light of life hath shone upon the world through Jesus Christ, there has existed a great variety of opinions, religiously speaking, among mankind, respecting the design of his coming, and of his finally accomplishing the work which was the great object of his mission.

Those who have embraced what is called the Calvinistic faith, tell us without hesitation, that Christ came to save a part, and only a part, of the human race. That this number is so certain and definite, that it can not be increased or diminished. And to place the accomplishment of this great work beyond the possibility of failure, all power in heaven and earth was given to him; so that the most stubborn, sinful and depraved among those he came to save, forms no objection; for there can be no effectual resistance against the infinite power of God; and with this power Christ was furnished, in the fullest sense of the word. This power was the power of God: and St. Paul tells us that 'there is no power but of God'—consequently there can be no power in the whole universe to prevent Christ from accomplishing what he came to perform.—This is so evident, that no serious Calvinist can see a single loop to hang a doubt upon.

If this theory be correct in its great and leading assertion, that Christ came to save a part, and but a part of mankind, their reasoning upon the subject must be strictly consistent. For if God has elected some of the human family to unending glory, and sent his Son, clothed with unlimited power to save them, they cannot be finally lost, because the power of Christ must be all-sufficient to overcome every obstacle to their ultimate and endless well-being. So far, then, as the Calvinist goes, his views are in perfect harmony with the adorable attributes of God: Yes, and with the plainest declarations of the great Redeemer of men. To evince this fact, read the following declarations of Christ. 'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me.' 'And this is the will of him that sent me, that of all that he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day.' 'The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands.'—'All that the Father giveth to me shall come unto me; and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out.'

We hope the Calvinist, therefore, is not built upon the foundation of human merit, but upon Christ, the sure and appointed means of God, for the salvation of the soul: And Christ is 'the only name given under heaven among men, whereby we must be saved.' 'Neither is there salvation in any other.' This, therefore, is a complete, entire and perfect salvation, as far as the Deity designed salvation to extend.

This view differs essentially from the scheme of grace as maintained by the Arminians. They insist that God loved all the human race, and really willed their salvation: That he sent his well-beloved Son 'to seek and save that which was lost.' That Christ came, and that he, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man; and thereby rendered it possible for all the human family to be saved. That men are free agents, and if they are not saved, it is their own fault; and not owing to any partiality in the divine Being.

Now this theory, it is true, gives God the honor of providing equally for the well-being of all his intelligent creation, but it gives to man a great part of the honor of his salvation, provided he ever possesses that inestimable boon. Nor can we see how the apostle can be justified in the assertion—'By grace ye are saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works lest any man should boast.'

Let us look at this theory a little more critically. Who gave to man this agency, by means of which he can frustrate the will of God? Did God know for certainty that man would abuse this agency, and so urge his way to endless torture? If so, is it possible for man to disappoint the positive and infinite knowledge of his Maker? And if he can not, was not the endless ruin of all them who persevere in the abuse of their agency as certain with God, who gave them this agency, as if he had solemnly decreed that doom? How then can man be justly rendered the subject of endless pain for doing what, according to the absolute foreknowledge of God, he could not avoid accomplishing? A perfect foreknowledge of the endless wretchedness of any part of the human race, renders their doom as certain as though the Deity had passed ten thousand decrees to make it so. Perhaps I shall now be told that man is a free agent, and that he has brought his doom upon himself by the abuse of his agency. But who gave man this agency? Why, God. Did he know when he gave this agency, what it would produce? No man can deny this. Then God gave to man an agency which he knew, without the possibility of disappointment, would produce the endless misery of its possessor! And in what does this differ, in substance, from a decree to make this agent the subject of unending wretchedness?

In closing, let us attempt to put what is true in the foregoing theories together. In doing this, we shall be careful to use the language of Scripture.

We believe with the Calvinist, that God had a perfect plan or design in creating man, as an inhabitant of this world; and that 'every purpose of the Lord shall be performed.' With the Arminian, that he loved them all alike, and willed their eternal salvation. 'God our Saviour will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth.' That 'God is no respecter of persons.' That 'the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.' That the Son will accomplish the object of his mission, as declared in Acts, 13th chapter. 'He shall fulfil all my will.' 'He shall make an end of sin, and finish transgression, and bring in everlasting righteousness.' Yes, 'and reconcile all things to God.' 'And there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain.' In consequence of his perfect and universal success; 'every creature in heaven, on earth, and under the earth; and all that are in them, shall be heard saying; blessing and honor, and glory and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever.'

Consider these systems well, and choose ye that which is good. Amen. D. PICKERING.

FREE AGENCY AGAIN.

Br. J. B., in current volume, No. 6, asks for information in regard to the means by which man is made morally accountable to God, or by which being, if he is governed by motives or circumstances, which he can not control, and is free to do as he wills—how he is blame-worthy for willing as he does, and doing as he wills, on the same hypothesis.

These questions are raised in reference to an article from my pen to which he refers. In answering these queries I may be unintelligible, but shall endeavor to show the true situation of the case according to my feeble ability. I need present no farther evidence of the fact that man in his will is governed by circumstances than is found in the illustrations given in my former article, under the remark which surprises J. B.

God is a sovereign. 'He doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth.' He not only doeth, but he 'declareth the end from the beginning.' If he declareth the end, he must the intermediate circumstances also, among which is sin. It will not suffice to say that God never willed that sin should enter the world, and death by sin. If we take this ground we declare the will of God, in regard to this matter, was frustrated. Neither will it suffice to say that God permitted it for good and wise purposes; for this permission involves the idea of a decree, else a permission in direct opposition to his purposes, which we can not admit without charging God with folly. The very fact of his preparing a Saviour from before the foundation of the world thro' whose mission he would finish sin, shows beyond the power of successful contradiction, that sin is a part of the divine economy. It seems to be a necessary result of the present state of things, without which God could never have made himself known to man. It is through sin that man is placed in a situation to need help, and were he not placed in such situation, God could never have exercised by his grace, mercy, or favor in restoring him. Here it is that we learn the great love of God.

I will illustrate the foregoing remarks by a reference to certain circumstances which have transpired in the world. J. B. will recognize the fact that a great accountability rested on the Jews for the crucifixion of Christ, and upon Judas for the betrayal of him. He will also recognize the idea that it was ordained from all eternity that he should be betrayed and crucified, as he was the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world, and without the will on the part of Judas, and the Jews, this could never have been accomplished; also if they had not been free to do as they willed, the work could not have been accomplished, unless they had been compelled to act. Here it will be seen that the sin of Judas and the Jews was a part of the divine economy, by which he would save the world. On this hypothesis, I ask how were they made morally accountable to God, or responsible for their acts? and were they in fault for the course which they pursued? If J. B. can settle these things he will answer his own queries.

The matter is perfectly plain when we reverse the case. God, it is acknowledged, designed and purposed that man should do good; and that man wills to do so from a preponderance of motive; and when the balance of inducement is brought to act, he can not will differently from what he does, and in reference to this is free to do as he wills. The same rule by which he is made morally accountable in the last instance will make him so in the first, and by the same rule by which his act is right in the last case, it is wrong in the first.

From the foregoing, it will be seen that man's accountability lies in the motive. Judas committed sin, not in merely betraying his Master, but in seeking the gratification of an avaricious disposition, at the expense of the life of his Master. The Jews sin lay in seeking the gratification of a spirit of intolerance and persecution, with innumerable evidences before them of his Messiahship. On the other hand a man's virtue consists, not in the act, but in the object had in view by him. See Matt. v: 28.

Taking this view of the subject, the theology which I teach is not, in the mind of one at least, a renunciation of moral accountability, but the reverse. Neither does it identify vice and virtue; making them one, thus ushering in the atheistic millennium with all its ridiculous and worse than contemptible absurdity.

Am I right? If not, will J. B. be so good as to point out the true ground of accountability, and much oblige

THOSE SNAKES IN THE GRASS.

BY J. M. DAY.

I was not a little amused in reading about those numerous reptiles, that infest the region where 'A Country Pastor,' labors so zealously. It is too bad. Such poisonous serpents, as 'Combe on the Constitution of Man,' 'Austin's Voice to Youth,' 'Causes of Infidelity Removed,' &c., to infest the region, that is blessed with the sanctity and charity and holy aspirations of 'A Country Pastor!' O tempora! Really, the golden age of wonders is returning. What lofty ideas of humanity the writer of the snake article, must entertain! What a capacious soul does he possess! What an enlarged and enlightened charity, does he cherish! How willing to look beyond the boundaries of the creed of his fathers! How lovely and admirable does such a character appear!

I was highly pleased, as well as amused, with the article on snakes. For, if it was written, as it purports to have been, by a clergyman, of the popular faith, and if he speaks the honest sentiments of his heart, it makes him acknowledge some very important things. It is an admission that those works, which he so beautifully and poetically styles 'Snakes in the Grass,' are widely circulating, and exerting a great and growing influence. To him, this is a source of regret and alarm. And well it may be; for they are works that commend themselves, by their intrinsic merits, to the hearts and consciences of all honest and intelligent men, who read them. But to us, it is a source of joy and congratulation. The influence of those works is good, and good continually. They present cheering and comforting views of God, of man, and of human destiny. They dwell largely on the duties that appertain to every day life, and set forth the only proper and worthy motives of human conduct—thus leading the reader to love God supremely, and to show that love by doing good to his fellow men. It would be as impossible for these books to exert an evil influence, as for love to produce hate, or charity to commend the principle of revenge.

It is not surprising that 'A Country Pastor,' should vent his spite against 'Combe on the Constitution of Man.' That work, in company with the science on which it is founded, has wrought a revolution in the religious world. It has struck a death blow to the doctrine of total depravity. It has taught men that they are worthy of the source whence they sprang—that they are capable, by a proper development, and improvement of their powers, of high and ennobling attainments, and thus by inspiring men with worthy views of themselves, it has given them better and more enlarged views of their Creator. It has taught men, that instead of attributing the miseries and ills of the social state to a mysterious Providence, they are the results of our follies, and indiscretions, and violations of laws, which can not be lightly regarded with impunity. It has therefore inspired men with the desire to acquaint themselves with nature and the principles of the divine government; and the knowledge they thus acquire, is found to be of far greater practical utility, than the denunciations of the ministers of wrath. We rejoice therefore in the circulation of these works, although they give so much offence to that pious and liberal soul, 'A Country Pastor.'

I have framed these thoughts on the supposition that the article, entitled 'Snakes in the Grass,' was written by an orthodox clergyman, as it purports to have been. The Editors of the Union and Advocate, took it rather seriously; but when I read it, the thought occurred to me, that the Editor of the New York Observer, had been hoaxed, and that the article in question is purely ironical—written by some lover of fun; for the purpose of seeing how much honor the conductors of the Observer were possessed of, and how low they would stoop to pander to the base selfishness of religious bigots. It may be indeed that, in some part of the State of New York, where the sun never shines, there may be a 'Pastor,' whose destitution of religious decency is great enough to prompt him to write such an article in a serious frame of mind; but it is hard to believe. The strongest argument, I have ever found, against the truth of Universalism, is that some men have no souls to save, or at least, none worth saving. Among this number, I should place 'A Country Pastor;' for certainly he shows not the least evidence of the possession of a soul, and consequently, he forms one of the strongest arguments I have ever known, against universal salvation. It is true there are many such. They are like the man who was presented with a sixpence to buy him a soul with; but finding that he could get a gizzard for three cents, he bought the latter, and kept the remaining three cents for future speculation! They may well be called gizzard men, and such our 'Country Pastor' must be, I think, if he has spoken the sentiments of his heart, in the snake article under consideration. But, as above intimated, I suspect that article was written in a strain of irony, and my principle object in writing this, is to suggest to the author, to cultivate his talent in the same way in future; for, in no way, can he succeed better in introducing those 'snakes,' to public notice, and attention. Men will read them, if for no other object, than to see whether they are so very poisonous.

EXTRACTS.

Day of Judgment, process of weighing souls—the devil a sea monster—hell's fireman—the damned kicking about in the flames—Catholic superstition and debasement—sculpture, painting, &c.

Br. SKINNER—The following grotesque and extravagant sculptures at the church of St. Nicholas, Freysburgh, are the most remarkable of the many debasements of Catholicism. This extract is from Sergeant Talfourd's Rambles, 1845: 'The church of St. Nicholas is a gothic structure, swelling with the organ of European repute, with a portal illustrated by such strange figures as I can scarcely believe were ever assembled in a dream. They represent the day of judgment: adorable attributes are caricatured, and in a manner one dares scarcely think of. The opening of hell is signified by a pig's mouth, vomiting flames; angels flutter, all wings; devils are adorned with pig's heads; and a process of weighing souls is represented, not individually, but in masses, a number being placed at once in the scale of Eternal Justice; while a devil hangs on slyly to weigh them down; how assorted, Sir Thomas Browne himself could scarcely guess..... This is not the work of a gloomy fanatic,—but a work elaborately carved in marble, in the vestibule of a noble church, under the control of a learned body, and bespeaks a debasement of the clerical mind I can scarcely understand under any form of the Christian faith. I can conceive some half-crazed enthusiast, so haunted by terrors of 'judgment to come' as to find relief in expressing them in grotesque and fanciful extravagance; but the deliberate sanction of such work as that at St. Nicholas is scarcely to be explained, except by that which one would not impute even to the Jesuits,—a disbelief in the realities it debases.'

The following description of the paintings in a Greek Convent in the Holy Land, I quote from the second volume, 218 page, of Stevens Travels:—'At the top of the picture sat the Father, surrounded by angels, and patriarchs, and good men; and on his right hand was a range of two-story houses—

St. Peter standing before them with the keys in his hand. Below the Father was a large, powerful man, with a huge pair of scales in his hand, weighing sinners as they come up, and billoting on each the weight of their sins; below him were a number of naked figures, in a sitting posture, with their arms spread out, and their legs enclosed in long boxes horizontally. On the left a stream of fire was coming down from the Father, and collecting in the mouth of a huge nondescript sea monster, while in the front stood a great half-naked figure, pitching in the sinners just as the firemen on board a steamboat pitches in the long sticks of wood, and the damned were kicking about in the flames! On the right was Elias doing battle with Antichrist; and below was represented the last day, and the graves giving up their dead, in almost every variety of form and situation conceivable.'

The above process of disposing of sinners is certainly a wholesale business. The Catholics excel all other pretended Christians in extravagance.—But their doctrine of Purgatory is less cruel than the common views of hell punishment as held by Orthodox.

To the Rev. Dolphus Skinner Editor of the Magazine and Advocate, dear Sir,—If you deem the following effusion worthy a place in your Magazine and Advocate, the writer will be gratified, in being permitted to cast the widow's mite into a treasury, from whence emanates so much light and joy.

'JESUS WEPT.'

What thrilling emotions gush from the viewless springs within, while contemplating the scene at the tomb of Lazarus! We behold the brief, but fearful triumph of that dark Despot, who had wielded his sceptre over the sons of men, during so many ages; in the anguished tears of that sad group—the bursting hearts of those gentle beings, whose earthly shield, lies powerless in his chains. That Being of Light, whose every word and deed declares his greatness, shares their grief! He weeps! O, blessed proof of his deep love for guilty man!—of the tender, deathless ties, which link with him our being. That glorious brow and eye are raised in deep reverence to Him who gives him power; and his deep-toned voice is heard in humble thankfulness. Now, a spirit of majesty not of earth, seems mantling o'er him; as he commands Death, to yield up his victim. 'Tis done! he flees at the command of that great Conqueror, and the influence of his chilling breath is superceded by astonishment and joy. Adorable Saviour! Well may the children of earth rejoice in thee, and strew garlands in the path way of thy 'victorious chariot wheels;' for thou hast 'abolished death; and brought life and immortality to light,' and now, thou art reigning gloriously in Zion. Thousands are bending before thee, and offering up the incense of purified hearts. Thy banner is waving from conquest to conquest; and science, with her brow of light, is dispelling the foot-prints of superstition. Humbly she gathers her laurels, and lays them at thy feet. Youthful maiden, have tears of grateful love for him who died for you ever moistened those soft joyous eyes? Has the tale of his love and sufferings for your apostate race, ever thrilled through your young heart; and given a deeper glow to that rose-tinted cheek? If not, thy gentle spirit knows not its resting place; its beautiful energies will wither, in the chilling breath of a heartless world. Come then, while the fragrant breeze of hope is floating around you, and clasp those mystic tendrils of your being around the living vine—pillow that 'bright head' upon the bosom of that love, whose depths are fathomless; and be joyful, even when death approaches, 'fear not.' He is your strength and shield; pass joyfully to your own bright home. Aspiring youth, do you wish to mount the summit of earthly grandeur, and receive the plaudits of an admiring world? If so, pause, and reflect on the utter nothingness of human greatness; yet remain not inactive. 'Know after having deluged Europe with tears and blood, and clothed the world with sackcloth, closed his days in lonely banishment, almost literally exiled from the world, yet where he could sometimes see his country's banner waving o'er the deep, but which did not or could not bring him aid.

Thus these four men, who from the peculiar situations of their portraits, seemed to stand the representation of all those whom the world calls great—these four, who, each in turn, made the earth tremble to its very centre, by their simple thread, severally died—one by intoxication, or as some suppose, by poison mingled in his wine—one a suicide—one murdered by his own friends—and one in lonely exile!

'How are the mighty fallen!'—[Presbyterian.]

PRINTING OFFICE JOKES.—It is customary in some printing offices, when a particular green youth commences learning the trade, to make him the object of various jokes. He is often sent on an errand to a neighboring office for some article which is imaginary, and wholly original in the minds of those who perpetrate the joke.—Once upon a time a boy was sent to K—'s office for a quart of editorial. He was sent back with the picture of a jackass. This was severe upon the jokers—but they immediately told the boy to go to K—, and tell him 'it was the editorial which they wanted, and not the editor.'

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1846.

REV. JOSEPH HARTWELL'S HANDBILL,
IN REPLY TO BR. D. S. MOREY.

Our readers will recollect a letter published in this paper of the 6th of February, from Br. Morey to Rev. J. Hartwell, a Methodist preacher, of Madison county, relative to the course he saw fit to take at the funeral of Mr. Lewis of Morrisville. The publication of this letter, like the contact of alkali with acid, produced a wonderful effervescence in the neighborhood of Morrisville; and Mr. Hartwell forthwith addressed us the following very urgent appeal, which we publish verbatim et literatim et punctatim, so that he may have no occasion to complain of mutilation or garbling:

Stockbridge, Feb. 10th, 1846.

To Mr. SKINNER, Editor of the 'Evangelical Magazine, &c.'

As Mr. D. S. Morey of Clinton has written such an article as he was disposed to, and has published me through your paper and through hand-bills, I wish to enquire of you, 1st. Whether you will publish such a reply as I may be disposed to make, without garbling or mutilation, but extending to me all the Editorial Courtesies which you have extended to Mr. Morey?

2d. Will you leave the controversy entirely in the hands of Mr. M. and myself?

3d. What will be your price for 200 hand-bills of the size of Mr. M.'s, or for 400.

Will you please answer this immediately by a private letter addressed to Stockbridge, Madison county, N. Y.

Yours respectfully, JOSEPH HARTWELL.

P. S. I wish you to be perfectly definite in your answers as much so as yes, or no. Otherwise I do not intend to send you my manuscript. You brethren he assure me you will grant my requests. J. H.

To the above letter we immediately replied as follows:

Utica, Feb. 12, 1846.

Rev. J. Hartwell—Dear Sir, yours of the 10th inst. is received. In answer to it I remark that I would not agree to publish unreservedly and without comment a personal controversial article for any man living with whom I am unacquainted, before I first saw and knew what the article was. For if I did, I should violate my own judgment and sense of duty, and insult my readers. Should your article be such, when received, as will do honor to the writer, however widely he may differ from me, and be couched in proper language, and of a length not exceeding that of Mr. M.'s it will be cheerfully published in the Magazine and Advocate.

Should it be of a character inadmissible for the paper, the publisher Mr. Walker, will print it for you in a hand-bill, if you choose, let its character be what it may. He says the expense of printing it in hand-bill, if of the same length of Mr. M.'s article would be about $5 for 200, or $7, to $7.50 for 400 copies. Very sincerely yours,

D. SKINNER.

P. S. If I should publish in the Mag. and Adv., I should be willing to leave the controversy between you and Mr. M.*

We heard no more from Mr. H. till Saturday the 28th ult., when he called on us just as we had stepped on board the cars for the East, and about three minutes before we were off, in very pressing and earnest mood, to know whether we would publish his reply to Mr. Morey in the Magazine and Advocate. We told him we could not decide the question without reading it, and we had not time to read it then before the cars would be off—that if he would leave it till we returned on Monday, we would immediately examine and decide on it—would either publish it entire, if it came within the description of composition deemed admissible, or return the MS. to him immediately by mail—that we did not fear the truth, nor the publication of any facts—that we presumed the article would be admissible; for we could not believe he would write and ask us to publish any thing indecent, insulting or repulsive, &c. He was very anxious to know before leaving, whether it would be inserted or not. We told him that possibly Mr. Walker the publisher, might be able to judge, on reading his article, whether it would be admitted or not. The cars started, and we were off. He called on Mr. W. and read over his MS. Mr. W. suggested that several expressions contained in it were objectionable, containing general, insulting and sweeping charges against all Universalists, as for instance where he says, 'How vain to look for courteous modesty in a Universalist priest!' and other similar expressions, and intimated that these should be either omitted or modified; but saying he had better leave it for the Editor to see and decide upon for himself. But Mr. H. declined leaving it; took it away without our seeing it at all, and here we now read it for the first time in hand-bill form.

His reply is considerably longer than Mr. Morey's letter to him, and would make about seven columns in this paper. Respecting its tone, spirit, and style of composition, we need say nothing to those who have read the hand-bill; but for the information of those who have not seen it, and that the public may not be deprived of the great advantages derivable from the dignified style of composition and the elevated tone of the article, we will just present a few specimens of Mr. H.'s letter. The following extracts contain some of the beauties and sublimities of his style:

'But how vain to look for courteous modesty in a Universalist priest. On the contrary, what pride and swaggerish self-importance. What a pugnacious spirit—quarrelling over a prayer! To say nothing of your sentiment, so crude and vulgar are your notions of even the sacred subject of religion, that you wonder why I can not regard you as a Christian minister.'

'From the above, we learn that had you been in my place, with so many Methodist mourners before you, you would have been upon them pell-mell, at once. Ah! we see too why you were so anxious to pray at us!

Again, speaking of the idea that the deceased was a Universalist, he says,

'Why, in his last week, did he twice send 8 miles for a Methodist minister? and twice to the Village, for one of our lay members to pray with him, when daily tortured with Universalist priests—and yourself one of them?—Such awkward and awful work as I have seen among Universalists, trying to make a man die to their notion! But, in spite of you, Mr. L. escaped your dreaded coil, and was experimentally converted to God—a subject on which you are doubtless as ignorant as the 'wild ass's colt.'

How exceedingly modest and respectful the above looks! How gentlemanly and Christian the following language sounds!

'You would have us believe, that Universalism is just

* The P. S. I did not copy at the time of answering Mr. H., but put it down now from memory. Ed.

one of the prettiest little things that ever glimmered on Creation. You galvanize your mighty powers into a spasmodic effort, as though keenly sensible of the demands of your waning cause. O, if men would but appreciate the beauties of Universalism! especially liars, thieves, drunkards, blasphemers, atheists, blacklegs, debauchees, robbers, duellists, pirates, and other cold-blooded murderers. How foolish are all murderers, that they do not call on the community to thank them for the many they have sent to heaven: and that they themselves are not joyful and happy in view of soon meeting their murdered victims, to shout by their side the loud hallelujahs of heaven.'

The following we suppose Mr. H. regards as very sharp shooting, at the same time exhibiting proper spunk.

'You represent me as a sinner in certain respects, and exhort me to repent. Now, I declare that in those respects I will not repent; and our Lord says, 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' What now shall be done with such a naughty man? Why, GO TO HEAVEN, I suppose! Ah! and if by some unforeseen accident you should happen to straggle that way, and find me there in all my impotence, what then would come to pass?—Would you fall on me as you do here, and whistle away mantic-like? or do you expect to have your pugilistic spirit changed a little?

I rejoice, however, to hear you preach repentance, whether angry or pleased. The people may hereafter know how to get you into it:—'spring you a bit,' by mentioning the last days and funeral services of Mr. L., and doubtless you will talk of sin and repentance as though the world was on fire.'

Now to those possessing acuteness of intellect sufficient to discover the real point of the above wonderful logic, and all the heads and points of this marvelous production, the perusal of it must indeed be a rich and rare treat.—But its classic lore, the rich elegance of its rhetoric, the fathomless depths of its vocabulary, are altogether too deep for our poor barren genius—we can not comprehend, we can not fathom the sublime conceptions of our author! When he talks about 'swaggerish,' 'whistle away mantic-like,' 'spring you a bit,' &c., &c., we are utterly at a loss to know where he learned his vocabulary, it is so much beyond our humble ability to fathom. Had he not very generously accorded to his opponent the category of 'a wild ass's colt,' we might have supposed some part of his vocabulary was derived from that learned school. But we can not suppose he would consent to stand in the same stall and feed at the same crib, as the one whom he thus addresses.

Mr. Hartwell's great candor and honesty we suppose he would have us infer from the following declaration:

'The vilest wretch is going straight to heaven. Get drunk enough to die, and the Lord will at once embrace you. Pour it down, Tippler! Mr. Morey says you are safe.'

His pacific inclination is indicated by his closing paragraph where he says, 'You will understand that I am now out for all day!'

But we may not dwell longer on the beauties and sublimities of Mr. H.'s production. We designed not to review or reply to it but simply to call public attention to so meritorious a performance of so distinguished a man. Whether Br. Morey will deem it of sufficient importance to justify or call for a rejoinder we can not say. If he does our readers will doubtless hear from him soon.

D. S.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Public opinion is a sentiment strong in its nature, and one with which it is difficult to contend. With this in his favor, one with a fair share of intellectual talent, may arise high in the estimation of his fellow citizens; perhaps may ascend to stations of power and trust, and those too, which carry with them honor and esteem. But it should be borne in mind, that though this opinion is the sentiment of the multitude and possessing power and might, yet it is not always correct; not always upon principles of equity, but anon far from being as it should be, right. This truth may be observed by looking back upon time past away; not to ancient days alone, where evidences appear in abundance, nor yet to foreign lands; but if we look back but a few years as it were, and in our own beloved America, we may observe popular opinion sanctioning actions which are now looked upon as so many evidences of human weakness and folly. But a few years have rolled away, since the habitations of old women were ransacked, and the inmates thereof were brought before grave judges, when legal gentlemen poured forth their strains of 'eloquence on fire'; when patient jurors deliberated upon, weighed, and examined the testimony; when the gaping crowd stood gazing in eager expectation, and all for what? Because forsooth by the said old women, a neighbor's children had been set a jerking, and divers other wild pranks 'cut up,' not unlike some mentioned in the history of the renowned Don Quixotte, too foolish to mention here, but which were heralded forth as the lamentable woes and horrors of Witchcraft! But men now look back and laugh at the folly of their 'illustrious predecessors'; truly illustrious, in ignorance and folly. Yet we behold public opinion placing a sanction upon the whole; supporting those wild vagaries, and ever ready to pronounce condemnation upon those against whom the least whisper was breathed.

And though public opinion may be, and undoubtedly is, wrong at the present day relative to many subjects upon which mankind are called to express a judgment, yet alas! how many do we find, who have not sufficient moral courage to stem the tide of popular sentiment.—There are those, and not a few either, but a host which scarcely any man can number; who if called upon to express an opinion relative to aught engaging the attention of man, do not come forward and pronounce their judgments, but forthwith look around upon their neighbors and others moving in high life, and ascertaining the drift of their minds, they join in with the general clamor and are loud in speech, pro or con, just as popular opinion may direct. They will declare and follow out principles and sentiments one day, bringing all of their powers in one combined effort to urge forward the reigning scheme; but another day, a change comes over the spirit of their dreams, because the popular trump has given another sound. Miserable beings! They have no knowledge of themselves; no knowledge of their own minds; no knowledge of what should be the end and aim of human power and human life. They may suppose themselves to be men, but they have surely mistaken their nature. Men? Far from it; but only walking apologies for men! Mere shells; beautiful it may be, in outward appearance, but filled with vanity! Cringing slaves to the public will; the eye of Heaven is upon them, and his scouring rod shall eventually bring them to a knowledge of themselves, and to a knowledge of the truth; that they are far from acting the part of men, and only bring down upon their heads the condemnation of every honest and upright man, and the strong disapprobation of the Almighty!

Though public opinion is a sentiment with which it is difficult to contend; though it possesses a power strong in its nature, and may bear heavy upon him who may attempt to oppose it; yet this is the very reason why attention should be kept upon it, and why one, when it may be wrong, should boldly step forth and contend with it to the utmost of his strength and ability. Its power renders it an engine of tenfold greater evil, than it would be were it in possession of less strength; and in consequence, the more diligently should it be guarded. And when it has swerved from the line of rectitude, then it is the bounden duty of every man to raise his voice against it, and use his utmost endeavors to establish the principles of justice and thus confer upon society those blessings of which mankind would be deprived from the reign of an erroneous popular opinion. And that man who does not possess sufficient moral courage to raise his hand in behalf of the principles and sentiments of justice and rectitude; or who may join in with the public voice because he fears its vengeance if he maintains silence; or for the purpose of accomplishing some selfish object—that man, we say, is a traitor; a base traitor, to himself, to his brother man, and to his God! And were there a less number of such individuals in the world, and more of sterling integrity, many evils which are now spreading their curses abroad, would be deep sunk in the silence of oblivion.

The human mind, the noblest creation of the living

God, was formed for thought free as the mountain air; and it should never so basely stoop from its high nature, as to give countenance and support to sentiments not in agreement with those of rectitude, though they may be advocated by a majority of the people. With 'Heaven and Truth' for a motto, one should go forward with a determination to live and act for the cause of justice and humanity, regardless of the popular wake; swerving neither to the right hand or the left hand, and though strong opposition may meet him awhile, yet eventually, truth shall triumph and abundantly reward him for his labors.

S. J. G.

REFUSAL TO EXCHANGE.

Br. WALKER—With very unpleasant feelings I proceed to notice some remarks made by yourself and Rev. E. Buckingham, of Trenton, in relation to a refusal of the latter to exchange pulpit services with me. I regret your mention of the circumstance; but still more do I regret Mr. B.'s statements, that he is 'not aware' of any such occurrence; and that he 'can not recall' to his 'mind that' I 'ever made any application in personal intercourse with a view to exchanging;' or, 'that any person ever applied to him 'in behalf' of myself, for that purpose. These statements, under all the circumstances of the case, amount to a denial to the best of his memory, and seem to me to require an answer. But the time that has elapsed since that event, may well be supposed to render memory rather uncertain in minor details; and my removal from New York, will probably increase the difficulty of proving my statements correct. You perceive, then, the unpleasantness of my position. But as my 'large organs of cautiousness' do not look at possible difficulties in the way of performing my duty, so much as at those arising from neglect of duty, I will 'say my say' as plainly and as truly as I can, and leave others to their responsibility for their belief or disbelief, assent or denial—and will trust to God for the consequences resulting from my speaking the truth.

I can not boast of a good memory in some things; but in others I believe it is above the average. In remembering numbers and dates, I am defective—in events, moderate—in language, or rather the substance of conversations, I believe, I am moderately good. But as I narrated what I now have to relate, to several persons soon after it occurred, they can correct me if I fail in any particular. I give you their names in a private note, that you may inquire for yourself, should any statement of mine be called in question; and I am not only willing, but desirous to be corrected in all particulars wherein their or Mr. B.'s powers of memory are greater or better than mine.

I think it was early in the Summer of 1842, that Mr. H., (who resided near the Public Square on Holland Patent,) spoke to myself and brother several times, about my exchanging pulpit services with Rev. Mr. Buckingham, who then officiated a part of the time in that section.—Mr. H. said that Mr. B. had expressed a willingness to exchange with me. I agreed to do so, and proposed that Mr. B. should name two or more days, on either of which the exchange might take place, when I would select one of the days named, and give notice in the paper accordingly. From time to time, Mr. H. and Mr. G. (who resided in the same vicinity) inquired of me why I did not make the proposed exchange, and expressed astonishment at my statement, that I had not yet heard from Mr. B. Both seemed confident of Mr. B.'s entire willingness to exchange—indeed, I think both said he told them that he would exchange with me. Thus matters remained, (unpleasantly to me, I confess; for it appeared that my friends might suspect my willingness, or veracity, or both,) until in the winter following—I think in February or March, 1843—when Mr. Buckingham called at my residence (on Spring street, Utica.) As he appeared to hesitate (as if embarrassed) about the object of his visit, I hastened to relieve him by introducing the subject of our long-proposed and long-delayed exchange. To my astonishment, his embarrassment appeared rather to increase. His remarks were exceedingly vague and non-committalish—very much like those in the sixth and seventh paragraphs of his letter in your paper of the 6th inst. On urging him into more definite explanations, he finally declined exchanging, with many deprecatory compliments to myself, on the following grounds:—

1st.—He declined, because he felt too distrustful of his abilities to supply the desk in a city, where I and other such able preachers had preached!!!—Not wishing to bandy compliments, and lose sight of the business in hand, (for I was determined, if possible, to get either an agreement, or a refusal, to exchange,) I jocosely replied, that men who were reputed to be great abroad, were often very little men at home—that I frequently preached poor sermons; so much so, that he need not fear preaching worse ones, or having less patient hearers—and that our city congregations were no better judges of preaching than those he usually addressed. He then objected:—

2d.—That he might casually drop an expression, contrary to my views, and those of the congregation, and thus wound the feelings of, if not give more serious offence to, the audience. (Here he introduced many of those twilight remarks contained in the seventh paragraph of his late article.)—I replied, that he did not differ more from me, than I from him; nor more, probably, from some of my congregation, than I did from others—that they were capable and responsible to hear and judge for themselves, and did so hear and judge, whoever might be the preacher—that I preached to them what I believed to be true and proper, without regard to their views, and they received or rejected as they deemed to be right and proper, without regard to my views—and that he need not fear to preach to my congregation, however plainly, his peculiar and different views; for they did not assume to keep their preacher's conscience, and would not allow a preacher to be their conscience-keeper.—I think it was at this stage that he said, that he was 'what you [I] would call a Partialist'—these, I am confident, were his words—but, on further conversation, he modified the expression, by saying that, to him, neither reason (or philosophy) nor Revelation furnished any evidence that sin and suffering would ever be terminated in the universe. But on assuring him that even those views would be no hindrance to my exchanging with him, inasmuch as I had (with the approbation of the congregation) offered to exchange with the Trinitarian Partialist clergymen of Utica, he finally declined to exchange—

3d.—Because there were some in his congregation at Holland Patent, who were 'weak in the faith,' and who might be disturbed or perplexed—(he would not impugn my courtesy, or care to avoid all disputed points, &c., &c., &c.; but &c.—) they being weak in such things—not illiberal, by any means—might be disturbed in mind and feelings by hearing a preacher who preached differently from what they had always been accustomed to hear.—I replied that if he had any in his congregation so weak that he was afraid to trust—[here he interrupted me with a polite and careful disavowal]—or who were not capable of judging for themselves in religious matters—[another disavowal]—or who could not bear to hear any thing advanced in a sermon, save what accorded with their own peculiar views, then, perhaps he would do well not to exchange with me; for that although I always endeavored, to treat my hearers, (and especially those who differed from me in opinion,) with all due courtesy, yet I claimed for myself what I always accorded to others, the privilege of speaking my views freely, fully and plainly on all proper occasions; and I believed that I seldom had given offence by so doing. On pressing him to name the opinions of such persons, he gave, as nearly as I could understand him, the doctrine of ceaseless sin and woe, as the one to which such very weak persons held with such great fondness!

We parted, as we met—and afterwards met and parted, on good and friendly terms. But I could not but regret that one seemingly so amiable and talented, should be so deficient in frankness, independence of soul, and moral courage—to which I am now compelled to add an additional sorrow, that he is so very deficient in good memory. I should also add, in justice to Mr. B., that although he thyself,' and thy high destiny; and in the character of Jesus of Nazareth, behold thy example. You live in an age of 'holy privileges, high responsibilities,' every heart should be armed for the combat; and can you look idly on, and behold the spoiler of your race, 'blighting the beautiful, and desecrating the holy,' without making a mighty effort to arrest his progress? O, hasten to the rescue!! and in the strength of Him, whose holy arm is bared to save, be fearless—crush the serpent, and the joy of Eden will again fan our beautiful earth, blended with the inspiring hopes of immortal bliss.

OLD SCHOOLISM vs. NEW SCHOOLISM.

Br. SKINNER—I was much interested a few days since in the perusal of a Presbyterian paper, (the New York Evangelist of Jan. 22d,) particularly an article that was presented therein to its readers that they might at a glance perceive the leading points of difference between the two schemes of doctrine held by the Old and New School. And believing that your readers generally would be pleased to see said article, I here transcribe and transmit the same for publication in the Magazine. The article is as follows:—

- | OLD SCHOOLISM. | vs. | NEW SCHOOLISM. |
|--|-----|---|
| 1. 'Men are condemned for the sin of Adam.' | | 1. 'Men are condemned for their own transgression.' |
| 2. 'Men have a natural or physical incapacity to obey God.' | | 2. 'Men have no inability to obey God but what arises from want of inclination or will.' |
| 3. 'Christ made atonement or propitiation for none but the elect.' | | 3. 'Christ made atonement or propitiation for all mankind.' |
| 4. 'The Gospel invites none but the elect to come to Christ.' | | 4. 'The Gospel invites all mankind.' |
| 5. 'None but the elect are under obligation to believe in Christ.' | | 5. 'All who hear the Gospel are under obligation to believe in Christ.' |
| 6. 'The elect are not bound to believe in Christ till he shows them that he will save them.' | | 6. 'Every sinner who hears the Gospel is bound to believe as much at one time as another.' |
| 7. 'No man will be condemned at last for unbelief, because the elect will all believe.' | | 7. 'All who have the Gospel and do not believe, will be condemned for their unbelief.' |
| 8. 'Faith consists in believing that Christ died for me.' | | 8. 'Faith consists in receiving and resting on Christ alone for salvation as he is offered in the Gospel.' |
| 9. 'Those for whom Christ did not die, can not believe that he died for them, unless they can believe what is not true; therefore they can not be condemned for unbelief.' | | 9. 'As Christ died for all men, any sinner who hears the Gospel can receive and rest alone on him for salvation; therefore any unbeliever will be condemned.' |
| 10. 'Faith is neither an exercise of the will nor understanding, but a divine principle.' | | 10. 'Faith is an exercise both of the will and understanding, and a divine principle is a phrase without an idea.' |
| 11. 'The Christian begins to love Christ when he finds Christ will save him, and that is the true motive of his love.' | | 11. 'The Christian begins to love Christ before he knows he will save him, and loves him for other and higher reasons.' |
| 12. 'Saving faith is before, and of course without love to God, or holiness, unless holiness be different from love.' | | 12. 'Saving faith is love in its very nature, and is a holy exercise, because love is holiness.' |
| 13. 'A Christian can not be disinterested—the interest of self must be at the bottom, and the moving spring of all his actions—even of his religion.' | | 13. A shameful and barefaced confession, as unworthy of a philosopher as a Christian.' |

Reader, here is the contrast, and whether there be or not at present open war in the Presbyterian church, the schism existing is wide and deep, as you will at once discover—its dogmas are weighed in the balances of truth and are found wanting, and 'thy glory is departing' is written both upon 'the worse and the better reason.'

ORDINATION OF BR. HARRIS.—The ordination of Br. T. L. Harris, took place in the Elizabeth street church on Tuesday evening the 12th inst.—Circumstances prevented our attendance, and we have waited a promised account of the exercises from those present, till it is necessary our paper should go to press. 'ALL THESE THINGS ARE AGAINST ME.'

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

And thus did the sorrowing Patriarch cry,
When the pangs of bereavement assail'd him;
And he felt from his bosom all happiness fly,
And no hope that he cherished availed him.

Lo! Joseph is not—and Simeon is not!
There was one only tie, to earth bound me;
Will ye break that asunder? O, bitter my lot!
For the waters of Marah surround me.

Desolation still darken'd his grief-stricken soul,
For the friend of his youth long departed,
While sweet o'er his mem'ry her shadow oft stole,
With its soft light to cheer the lone hearted.

The delight of his age he had long mourn'd as dead,
In his beauty and innocence perish'd;
For he saw not the hand who to honor's had led,
Or the arm that protected and cherish'd.

The sun shines in glory and equally bright,
Though by clouds from our ken it is shrouded;
So shadows of doubt hide the spirit's true light,
And the mind becomes heavily clouded.

There are bright ones and beautiful passing away,
And the clods of the valley embrace them,
They are wept and lamented with sadness each day;
But they go where no visions can trace them!

Such tears are rich pearls by the sanctified worn,
Which the fingers of angels are weaving,
In wreaths for the crowns of the true kingdom born,
When all mourners shall cease from their grieving!

May the Gospel console them where hope points above,
And beyond this oblivious sweet,
Where nothing can sever the prison ties of love,
And where Jesus our Saviour is risen.

We are prone unto trouble as sparks to ascend,
Ever destined to journey in sorrow;
Yet God is our Father, Protector, and Friend,
And will comfort and bless us to-morrow.

FINDING RELIGION.

The following amusing but not uninteresting sketch is from Br. George Rogers' Memoranda of the Experience, Labors and Travels of a Universalist Preacher:—

'Whilst I was in Bolivar, I had much conversation on theology with numerous planters from the country, who were then in attendance upon Court. The following fragment of one of those colloquies will afford a specimen of their character in general:

'But I've been another man since I found religion.'

'Stay, my friend—pardon my interruption—where did you find your religion?'

'I found it at Grove Corners meeting-house.'

'Is there any more to be found there? or did you get all there was?'

'No, sir, I didn't get it all; I allow you can get some too, if you'll use the means.'

'What, of the same sort that you found?'

'Yes, sir.'

'Perhaps it may not be worth the trouble, when found; and besides, as I am journeying on horseback, I might find it troublesome to carry. Is it a heavy article?'

'I calculate, stranger, you never had religion, if you are a preacher'; somewhat piqued, 'or I allow, if you had, you've lost it.'

'In the latter case, I might, I suppose, recover the property by advertising it, with a reward to the finder.' As this was uttered with such cool gravity, the stranger supposed me serious, and was overwhelmed with amazement.

'Why, now! if that don't saw my leg clean off! I never see'd afore such ignorance of religion! You talk just as if religion was something a man carried in his pocket.'

'So I understood you to speak, my friend; and I adapted my discourse to your apparent views; for you talk of getting religion—finding—losing—and having it, as tho' it were in fact a tangible matter, a thing of possession, rather than of practice and feeling.'

The devil must have a fund of religion by this time, according to the language in common use among religionists, for he is said to have gotten many a poor fellow's religion away from him. But possibly he does not keep all that he gets, and in that case he must be an ill-natured fiend, to filch from others what can be of no use to himself.

Seriously; every lover of Christianity must deplore the fact, that maugre all the preaching, praying, professing, writing, &c., about religion, so little apparently is known of its nature and offices. It seems a cabalistic spell, very potent in its qualities, but for what? To save us from hell—to get us to heaven! We all have religious faculties; in some they are more active than in others; and in the same persons they are more active at some times than at others: when these are excited into exercise, we experience religion; and this experience is delightful or otherwise, according as the objects by which it is excited are pleasing or terrible. Experimental religion is feeling, produced by the exercise of our religious faculties. Practical religion is action, prompted by that feeling. He, then, is religious, whose religious faculties are in constant exercise; and he is irreligious, in whom these faculties are dormant. Now a man may be religious without being a Christian; because his religious faculties may be acted upon by other and different objects from those which Christianity furnishes; he may be a Jew, Mahomedan, Pagan, and yet a religious man; and on the other hand, he may be in faith a Christian, without being a religious man. The current phraseology, therefore, on the subject of religion, such as getting religion—finding—having—losing it, &c., expresses no intelligible sense whatever.'

LETTERS FROM NEW YORK.

BY LYDIA MARIA CHILD.

The New York Prison Association—The Young Englishman—The Hope Cottage School—The Good Youth and the Poor Children.

A series of interesting and instructing letters from New York are now in course of publication in the Boston Courier, written by Mrs. Child. We always read her letters with great pleasure and profit. We present below some extracts from one which will deeply interest our humane readers:

'I cheer my heart with manifestations of man's capacity for renovation. The Prison Association which I have mentioned in previous letters, more than realizes the hopes of believers in the law of kindness. Nine out of ten of the released inmates of Sing Sing, who have been assisted by the Association, are doing extremely well, and evince a very grateful disposition. It is a painful fact, that momentary recklessness is often punished as severely as deliberate crime.

A young Englishman left his native land, where a pampered church and nobility drive our honest working-men from a soil they gained by conquest, and still keep by the law of force. He came to this country for employment, and found every corner crowded. He was honest and industrious, but very timid, and easily depressed. When his money was gone, and he could obtain no work—in an evil hour of distress and discouragement, he was tempted to hire a wagon with the view of selling it, and pocketing the proceeds. He drove on desperately, far away from the city; but he was unused to knavish tricks, and conscience would not allow him to offer the horse and wagon for sale. Still he could not muster sufficient courage to go back and avow his fault. Natural timidity, and experience of man's harshness made him dread the task. He was soon sought for and arrested. He was advised to plead not guilty, and was told that an acute lawyer could bring him safely out of the difficulty. But he answered, humbly and sorrowfully, 'I did mean to sell the horse and wagon; and why should I add to my fault by telling a lie?' Notwithstanding his modest deportment, the uncommonly honest expression of his young face, and the upright nature implied by this declaration, he was sentenced to three years at Sing Sing. He served his time out with the utmost humility and propriety; and when he was released, came to the Prison Association for advice and assistance. He gave every indication of a sincere determination to be a useful and honorable man. They furnished him with clothing, and paid his board, until suitable employment could be obtained for him. Not long after, he received a legacy of four hundred dollars, from a deceased relative in England. He immediately went to the office of the Association, repaid all the money that had been loaned him, and added a donation of twenty dollars. Was this a nature to be trampled under the feet of constables and police officers? Who was to blame, society or the young disheartened stranger?

But let us trust in God, and take courage. Men are beginning to feel and perceive that human souls are worth more than property.

At the extremity of a dark court, close to one of the most crowded thoroughfares of the city, I often see a bright little sign, 'Hope Cottage School.' Whence came the idea of such a name, in such a place, I know not.—But I thank the dear Father of us all, that sunshine, music, and hope, find their way into the darkest corners.—And now I will tell you 'a merry story,' as Jeremy Taylor says. Not far from here is a public school for poor children; and near by is a toy shop. A little boy, handsomely dressed, goes in there, and buys his pockets full of marbles. He watches till school is dismissed, then flings his marbles into the street, and runs. His bright face peeps round a corner, to see the poor children pick them up; but they never know who is their benefactor. I know not how he has worked it out, in his little brain, that all the playthings of this world ought not to be monopolized by those who have money in their pockets; neither do I know who he is. The woman, who tends the toy shop, says he often repeats this pretty little experiment, and seems to take great delight in it. If the world does not spoil him before he is a man, and if his head is as clear as his heart is warm, he will probably be an earnest re-builder of the social system. If he dies, meanwhile, he will deserve the Shakspearean epitaph, that I once read on a child's tomb-stone in Plymouth grave-yard: 'God knows what a man he might have made; we know he died a most rare boy.'

FOUR GREAT MURDERERS.

Happening to cast my eye upon a printed page of miniature portraits, I perceived that the four persons who occupied the four most conspicuous places, were Alexander, Hannibal, Cæsar and Bonaparte. I had seen the same unnumbered times before, but never did the same sensation arise in my bosom, as my mind glanced over their several histories.

ALEXANDER, after having climbed the dizzy heights of his ambition, and with his temples bound with chaplets dipped in the blood of millions, looked down upon a conquered world, and wept! that there was not another for him to conquer, set a city on fire, and died in a scene of debauch.

HANNIBAL, after having, to the astonishment and consternation of Rome, passed the Alps and having put to flight the armies of the mistress of the world, and stripped 'three bushels' of golden rings from the fingers of her slaughtered knights, and made her very foundations quake, fled from his country, being hated by those who exulting, united his name to that of their God and called him Hanni Baal, and died at last by poison administered by his own hands, unlamented and unwept in a foreign land.

CÆSAR, after having conquered eight hundred cities, and dyed his garment in the blood of one million of his foes, after having pursued to death the only rival he had on earth, was miserably assassinated by those he considered his nearest friends, and in that very place, the attainment of which had been his greatest ambition.

BONAPARTE, whose mandates kings and popes obeyed, and after having filled the earth with terror of his name—finally declined an exchange with me, (at least, until his weak brethren grew strong enough in the faith to bear my preaching!) he politely expressed a strong desire to hear me preach, and a wish that I could visit his preaching places, and preach for him, he sitting and hearing me. But I am also constrained to add, that when our friends obtained permission to occupy the Unitarian meetinghouse at the Square on Holland Patent, in the Summer of 1843, and when I did visit there and preach in it at that time, Mr. B. made an appointment for himself a few miles distant, much to the astonishment of our friends who had always believed his expression of desire to hear me; but undoubtedly in perfect consistency with his regard for his weak brethren, who might else have come to hear me, and been greatly disturbed, if not offended, at my preaching.

As I freely and frankly related to Messrs. H. and G. (before named) and to others, our conversations above given in substance, and as a young lady, who was present and heard it at Mr. B.'s visit, freely spoke of it to her friends, who reside on Holland Patent, I am not at all surprised that Mr. B. 'often heard of a flying rumor' of his declining to exchange with me; but I was surprised to learn that he was 'utterly unable to account for it.' It is possible, however, (if he has given a true statement of his excessive timidity in preaching the Gospel among strangers, and in a 'Universalist pulpit!') that such a lamentable want of moral courage may obscure or paralyze his memory of conversations actually had with Messrs. H., and G., and myself! But if so—if he is to be commiserated for this sad defect, is he not to be considered as censurable for remaining in an office which his moral cowardice prevents him from filling with fidelity to his Master or credit to himself—which represses his liberality in exchanges, and even prevents him from preaching the truth when a door is opened to him among strangers, lest the popular sects may question his orthodoxy, or the people misunderstand his message! Had Jesus, or Paul, or Luther been thus ill qualified for their missions, Mr. B. and his entire denomination would now be in little danger of being reproached for their departure from Orthodoxy. But the subject is too painful to pursue farther, unless necessary to do so. I add the full names of parties and witnesses in a private note, and close by assuring you all, that I cherish none but kind wishes for the moral welfare of all alluded to and named, however plainly I may have written.

Fraternally yours, A. B. GROSH.

UNIVERSALISM IN UTICA.

Since the melancholy event of the loss of our meeting house, in this city, one year since, we have not deemed it necessary or proper often to allude to the state of our cause here. There has been, no stated, but occasionally a Sunday's preaching. And sometimes on such occasions large audiences have attended. A late communication to the Editor of the Trumpet from a well known and worthy brother in this city, contains some home and solemn truths, which the world, and especially the parties concerned, ought to see and know. They may be unwelcome to some, but they are not the less true; and we transfer them to our columns in hopes that the guilty ones may see and read them, and like David in the presence of Nathan, hear the solemn voice sounding in their ears:—'Thou art the man!'

'Since our Meeting-House was sold, we have had several discourses in Mechanics' Hall, from Br. T. J. Sawyer, which were well received, generally by large and attentive congregations. Exertions will probably soon be made to sustain preaching regularly hereafter, and which, if properly made, will no doubt be attended with complete success, for there never was a time, in my opinion, in which there was so little prejudice in Utica against real Universalism, as at the present. At the time our house was sold, it was expected that there would be great rejoicing among our brethren of the other denominations; but it is singular that I have never heard one exult at our loss, but on the contrary, have heard many express their regret that after all our exertions we should lose our house. Much has been said about the sale of our house and where the blame should be attached. I can tell you who ought to receive a good share of the blame. If many individuals who attended the Universalist meetings in Utica, and who were looked upon as prominent members of the society, had done their duty, and sustained their own ministers half as well by their purses and their attendance, as they now do Episcopal and other churches, the cause would never have drooped in Utica—the Meeting-house, in my opinion, would never have been sold. These professed Universalists while they attended (no they did not half attend,) their own church, always talked and acted as though the trifle (and it was but a trifle,) they contributed for the support of their minister was an inordinate tax, and who seemed to think that their pastor was a mere beggar, a mere mendicant existing on their bounty, and hardly worth their notice, and whom to notice was to honor, now pay voluntarily and promptly as much again to the rich Episcopalians as they used grudgingly to pay their own poor church, and that too I'll warrant you without any intimations that their money is paid to support priestly mendicants. So far from it, they seem to take pride in letting you know that they are specially honored with the acquaintance of their Episcopal priest. Had these individuals, who 'knew their duty and did it not,' performed well their part, we would not at this moment be houseless—our harps would not now be hanging upon the willows. O it is enough to make one's blood boil to think how the cause of Universalism has bled in Utica by craven-hearted lovers of popularity! If it was not for this accursed love of popularity, Universalism would long since have been triumphant in our city. But I am not altogether discouraged. God will not let his cause languish and die outright. It is to be hoped that the day is not far distant when the good and the true will rally and unite their energies for the support of the great truth which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, for it is in such hands only, the good and the true, will the cause ever be blessed by our Father in heaven. Yours.

BR. BARRAY'S REMOVAL TO RICHMOND.

By the following hastily written lines from Br. A. C. Barry, we learn, what we had indeed been prepared to expect, that he has received and accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the Universalist society in Richmond, Va. He goes to a warm hearted and devoted band of brothers and friends, of whose devotion and zeal and ardor of friendship we have had personal and demonstrative proof a number of years since. And truly should we like, did circumstances permit, once more to greet them in the flesh, as we do in spirit. May Heaven bless them with their newly chosen pastor and grant them long and uninterrupted prosperity and peace. D. S.

Fort Plain, March 17.

Br. SKINNER—I am again at home with my family, and somewhat improved in health and strength. So much better am I indeed, that I shall give the Southern climate a longer trial, and am in hopes thereby to regain my health entirely.

My present visit has truly been a pleasant one. And why not? They are a glorious people in Richmond, and why should we not have glorious times?

That you may know something of the reception I met with, I send you the following, simply saying that I have left my concurrence behind.

Richmond, March 8th, 1846.

Reverend and Respected Sir:

We have been appointed on the part of 'The First Independent Christian Society' of the city of Richmond, to wait on you, and to hand you a copy of the resolutions adopted this day, and to request your concurrence therein:—

At a meeting of 'The First Independent Christian Society,' held at their church on the morning of Sunday, the 8th day of March, 1846, Resolved unanimously, that this society, being well satisfied with the labors of the Rev. Alfred C. Barry, of Fort Plain, Montgomery county, N. Y., for the time he has been with us, and having the assurance of the congregation and friends of the society of the same satisfaction on their parts, do earnestly and affectionately invite Br. Barry to the pastorship of the society.

Resolved, that James E. Couty, Robert T. Wicker, John W. Daniel, and Thomas H. Wynne, Esqs., be appointed to wait on Br. Barry and request him to accept the pastorship of the society, and to make such terms with him, and to settle the commencement of the time of his services, in such manner as to them may seem best.

We, therefore, Rev. brother, in pursuance of the power vested in us, request you to accept the pastorate of our society, and we are ready to treat with you in relation to the terms and time thereof.

We are yours truly and affectionately,

JAMES E. COUTY,
R. TATE WICKER,
J. M. DANIELS,
THOMAS H. WYNNE, } Committee.

My family will remain at the North until next fall. I shall enter upon my pastoral duties at R. about the 1st of May. A. C. BARRAY.

Br. Ira Curtis of Auburn, keeps a general assortment of Universalist Books for sale. He is also agent for the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist publications generally.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. N. BROWN will preach the first (instead of the second) Sunday in April, at Sennett Corners. Subject—The origin of the doctrine of Endless Misery.

Br. N. BROWN will preach the SECOND Sunday in April at Wolcott. Subject—The power of the Law of Kindness.

There will be preaching the THIRD Sunday in April at the 'CASE TOWN' School House. It is important that every Universalist in the town should be in attendance, as the subject of SABBATH SCHOOLS will be laid before the meeting, and will be acted upon. Also, action will be taken in regard to the permanent support of preaching for the present year. 'Awake! put on thy strength, O Zion!'

DEATHS.

In Mexico, Jan. 27th, 1846, Mrs. OLIVE HAMILTON, in the 70th year of her age. The deceased with her husband was among the first settlers of the town. She was respected by all who knew her. She was a believer in the reconciliation of all things to God, and she died as she had lived. Her funeral was attended on the 29th by the writer. May the blessings of his Gospel, who said 'Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted,' richly descend upon this afflicted family. J. S. KIBBE.

In Little Falls, March 12th, Mr. ALFRED RANKIN aged, 22 years.

The subject of this notice was a young man of excellent character, and highly esteemed by his associates and all who enjoyed the pleasure of his acquaintance. He was a member of the Fire Company at Little Falls, and that company, on receiving intelligence of his death, called a meeting of its members to express their deep regret at the loss of their esteemed friend, and their sympathy for the parents and relatives of the departed.

This young man was under engagement of marriage with an amiable and respected daughter of an esteemed citizen of this county, who was with him during the latter part of his sickness till about three hours before his death, when she was compelled by severe illness to leave him, and his eyes were closed in death by another hand than hers, and was buried while sickness prevented her attending his funeral; a privilege of which she could hardly be denied, notwithstanding she was unable to sit up. Mr. Rankin was to have been joined in marriage the day following the date of his sickness. May the consolations of the Gospel of Christ sustain and comfort the mourners, and enable them to rest in the hope of a more glorious meeting beyond the grave.

At Little Falls, on the 16th inst., after an illness of about two months, Mr. BENJAMIN PETRIE, in the 50th year of his age. He has left a widow, seven children, and a numerous circle of relatives to mourn his early removal from their midst; but they do not mourn as those that are without hope. His funeral was attended on the 18th by the writer of this, in compliance with the request of the deceased, and a sermon was preached to a crowded and deeply attentive congregation assembled in the Methodist church, which was kindly opened for the occasion, from Job xiv: 10.—'But man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?' D. S.

In Granger, March 10th, Mr. DARLING SMITH, in the 59th year of his age. Funeral attended by the writer, at house of his son, and the consolations of the Gospel presented to the mourners and sympathizing friends. A. K.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

IV.

'THY KINGDOM COME.'

Father in heaven, may 'thy kingdom come,'
And through the world resistless speed thy name!
The human heart make there its peaceful home,
And in its depths light up the holy flame!
May the loved Gospel through the world be spread,
As on the pinions of the viewless wind;
And may its accents rouse the living dead,
And burst the fetters of the captive mind!
Speed it from mind to mind and soul to soul;
Bind it all hearts to be the same as one;
Flame its bright radiance from pole to pole,
And in its brilliant track 'thy kingdom come'!
Oh, may the Gospel take the wings of light,
And to the morn of truth give place the night!

V.

'THY WILL BE DONE.'

Father, forever may 'thy will be done,'
Nor let a murmur in our souls arise;
Thou workest by the love and truth of One,
Given to guide us upward to the skies!
He is the one long prophesied of you,
Who was to be a 'witness' to the world,
A 'leader' and 'commander,' by whose lore
Error and sin should be to ruin hurled!
Oh, may the purpose ever have full sway,
And fashion our soul's likeness unto thine!
May earthly things be lost in the full ray,
That glitters from thy throne, so pure, divine!
And when thy summons calls from earth away,
Then may we soar and dwell in endless day.

VI.

'IN EARTH AS IN HEAVEN.'

Where angels soar, and live, and ever love,
And bend, and worship round thy holy throne,
Where all is harmony and joy, above,
And all as children thou dost freely own,
In the high court of Heaven, where ever thou
Dost rule according to thy holy will,
And where, all sin excluded, spirits bow,
And praise thy name on Zion's holy hill;
Thither, Oh, God, may human eyes be turned,
To emulate the spirits of the just;
And from the earth be sin and error burned,
By the quick flame of truth and love and trust!
So shall the will of God 'in earth' be given
The scope and influence it hath 'in Heaven.'

'GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD.'

Unto thee, Father, would we 'daily' bow,
And humbly crave thy blessing to descend
Of food and raiment on the world; and now
Our need requires that thou shouldst quickly send,
From thy full store, such tokens of thy love,
As our decaying nature doth require,
And as shall serve the purpose to improve
The mind, and light within the holy fire;
'Give us this day our daily bread,' Oh, Lord,
Nor bread of perishable kind alone,
But with the food of earth, Oh, send thy Word,
Laden with treasures from thy holy throne!
Give each to take what'er he needs 'this day,'
And move with pleasure on the heavenly way.

PROFESSION OF FAITH, AND ECCLESIASTICAL RULES.

[We had not room in last week's paper for the following, which were adopted and published by the church in Utica, in connection with their Profession of Faith, viz.]

The foregoing Profession of Faith is presented to the Christian public, as expressive of the general views and leading doctrines of the First Universalist Church in Utica, N. Y. Knowing that our sentiments are often misrepresented by our enemies, and misunderstood by many who would otherwise be our friends, we have deemed it expedient to publish this Profession, together with what follows, that the citizens of this place, and community in general, into whose hands it may chance to fall, may be correctly informed in relation to our faith and ecclesiastical rules.

That there may nothing appear, however, either in our principles or practices, of an exclusive character or tendency, or in the least calculated to abridge that true Christian liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, or to debar any sincere Christian (though differing, in their views on some points of Christian doctrine) from our fellowship or communion, no other test of fellowship shall be required of any one wishing to become a member of this church, than that of sustaining a good moral character, and subscribing the following brief Declaration, Covenant, and Constitution.

DECLARATION.—We believe that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and the Saviour of the world.

COVENANT.—We, whose names are hereunto subjoined, feeling a devout and religious desire to unite with a regular church of Christians for the promotion of religion, morality, and good order in society; and also for our own mutual edification and the participation of the benefits of fellowship, social communion, and Christian watch-care; having duly deliberated and seriously reflected on the subject, do consider it our solemn duty and high privilege to make this public confession of our faith in Christ, and hope of salvation through him, both before men and in the presence of our heavenly Father, by subjoining our signatures in testimony of our sincerity and fidelity. And we solemnly covenant and promise, so far as divine assistance shall be given us, to walk uprightly before God and men, according to the precepts of the Gospel, as children of light; to counsel, advise, and watch over each other in the Lord for good, and, if necessary, admonish one another in brotherly love and friendship, as children of one common Parent, redeemed by one Saviour, and destined to one and the same happy end, viz: to glorify God and enjoy him forever: and humbly pray Almighty God to assist us, that we may walk as becometh the Gospel of Christ, doing good to all men as we have opportunity, especially to the household of faith, and thus adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, in all things. We further engage that we will not reject or disfellowship any brother or sister, merely on account of a difference of faith on particular points of doctrine; but will affectionately invite all believers in Christ, to our fellowship and communion, who lead a pious and godly life, and feel a desire to unite with us in shewing forth the Lord's death by visible symbols; that we may thus be built up together on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone, in whom we believingly pray that the whole building, fitly framed together, may grow up into an holy temple in the Lord; and we be thus enabled to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.—Amen.

CONSTITUTION.—ARTICLE I. This church shall have full power, in its own body, to choose its own officers, and govern itself in all cases whatever, provided, always, that it do not infringe the prerogative of the Association to which it belongs.

ART. II. The officers of this church shall consist of—First, a Moderator, which office shall be filled at all church meetings, by the officiating minister when present; but in case of his absence, by some other member who shall be chosen pro tempore.—Second, a Clerk whose duty it shall be to keep a just and correct account of the proceedings of the church, to record the additions or diminutions of its members, and such other transactions as require to be recorded. Third, two Deacons, whose duty it shall be to provide for, and assist the minister in serving the table, on communion days, and to inquire into, and supply the necessities of the poor; the expenses of which shall be defrayed by the voluntary contributions of the members; and Fourth, a Standing Committee of Discipline, consisting of the officiating minister and deacons, who shall receive, and lay before the church, all requests for membership, and all complaints that shall be made against members, if any, and attend to such other duties as belong to those in their station.

ART. III. Any person wishing to become a member of this church, must make application to one or more of the aforesaid Standing Committee, which application must be laid before the church, at least one week before such person can be admitted as a member, and must be received by a unanimous vote of the church, or of the members present; though such person may be admitted to the communion at any time previous to the membership, provided no member present objects.

ART. IV. In case of any complaint against any member for immoral and unchristian conduct, the Committee of Discipline shall take cognizance of the same, if the charge appear well substantiated, and to reclaim such offending brother or sister, shall pursue the measures pointed out by our Saviour, and recorded in the Gospel of Matt. xviii: 15-17. But no member feeling aggrieved or injured by a private offence, shall enter a complaint to the church, or make the same public, until he or she shall have first sought in vain for satisfaction from the offender, according to the direction given in the above Scripture. And the church shall pass no further judgment, against any irreclaimable member, than barely withdrawing the hand of fellowship.

ART. V. Any member wishing to withdraw from this church, can have the liberty at any time, by applying to the Clerk: and such person shall be entitled to a certificate of moral character, if desired; or a letter of recommendation to any other Christian church, provided nothing is known to exist against his or her moral character which ought to debar him or her from communion.

ART. VI. This church, while they continue to have constant preaching by a regularly ordained minister of the Gospel, shall attend to the administration of the Eucharist, or Lord's Supper, as often, at least, as once in three months, (the days of communion to be the first Sunday in every third month,) and on such other times and occasions as the pastor and members may deem proper and necessary to edification, and growth in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

ART. VII. The foregoing articles of this Constitution shall be subject to any amendments or alterations that shall be deemed necessary at any time hereafter, provided two-thirds of the members agree to such alterations.

CHRISTIAN HOPE.

BY REV. N. C. HODGDON.

'Let me not be ashamed of my hope.' PSALM cxix: 116.

As believers in the great salvation, we ought not to be ashamed of our hope, which is 'as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast.' We believe in the universal LOVE of God as the Scriptures teach, Ps. cxlv: 9. We also believe in his universal paternity. 'Have we not all one Father?' Mal. ii: 10. We believe in his Son; and the promises are universal also. Gen. xxviii: 14; Acts iii: 25. We know that the object of Christ's death is universal. Heb. ii: 9. His dominion is universal likewise. Isa. ix: 7. When we come to the resurrection, we find that this is universal. Acts xxiv: 15. And then, when we come to examine the great theme of salvation, we find that this is universal also. Rom. v: 19. Upon this broad and solid foundation, we build our hope. Our faith encircles the whole intelligent creation. And as 'faith is the substance of things hoped for,' we rejoice in view of the final result of the Redeemer's work. We call ourselves Universalists, and we can say in sincerity, that we are no more ashamed of our hope, than St. Paul was of the Gospel of Christ. Eternal truth is the object of hope, and when we have an evidence that hope is well grounded, we are at REST. We rest in Abraham's bosom.

'Let me not be ashamed of my hope.' This was the language of the sweet singer of Israel. It seems from the general tenor of his writings, that he had great confidence in the word of God. 'Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. I hate vain thoughts: but thy law do I love. Thou art my hiding place and my shield: I hope in thy word. Uphold me according to thy word, that I may live: and let me not be ashamed of my hope.' We are frequently called upon to hope in God. 'Let Israel hope in the Lord: for with the Lord there is mercy. Behold the eye of the Lord is upon them . . . that hope in his mercy. Let thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us, according as we hope in thee. Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the Lord. Lord I have hoped for thy salvation. For thou art my hope. And now, Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in thee!'

The above are a few of the sayings of David, and they open the desires of a warm and grateful heart. He was a man of sorrows. He lived in a world of sin. Temptation was in his way, and he was often enticed. See St. James i: 12-15. Yet, in the end he loved and obeyed God, and hoped in his salvation. 'I have done thy commandments,' says he. Have we confidence in God as a being of universal love and benevolence? If we have, then we can trust in his mercy—for love and mercy are twin graces! David hoped also in God's judgments—for he knew that he was a God of truth—and that just and right was he in all his ways. If God deals with man here, according to his word, (Ps. xcvi: 13,) and renders unto every man according to his deeds, (2 Chron. vi: 30,) then we rejoice, and are glad, that we hope in him, for he will do nothing but what is right with us.

The prophet says, 'Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is.'—Hope then, begets in the heart confidence and trust, and the very best of feelings. It is an abiding principle. It is a heavenly boon worth cultivating.

We will now attend to its definition, and then proceed with our subject.

The true definition of hope is, the expectation of future good: or it is the desire of good, heightened by the expectation of enjoyment. It is a compound of desire and expectation. For when we hope for any thing, we have a desire for it, and entertain an expectation that it will be granted unto us. We may, however, desire a thing, and yet, have no expectation of it. For instance, we have a friend who is sick,—we desire and ardently pray for his recovery—but we have given up all expectation of ever witnessing such a thing, and therefore we can not be said to hope it.

All men have hope—and all men have desires, but they differ in proportion as their aims in life differ. We are all seeking after happiness, and we expect to find it in our searchings. But we do not seek it always in the right objects. And this is wherein the hope of the unjust perisheth. It is because they do not seek the true source for enjoyment.

We hope, and hope on, and no peace comes to the heart. It is because we hope in ourselves—we hope that some friend will make us happy—or we trust in some outward sign, &c. In a word, we place our affections on objects that are perishable, fleeting and transitory. But the Psalmist says, 'Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help.' But 'happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the Lord his God.' Does the reader understand the subject? Does he realize that we have got to put all our trust and confidence in the God of truth? He is unchangeable, and if we hope in him we shall not be disappointed. He is full of love and mercy, and whatever we hope for, or even expect, he will bestow it upon us. If we love the pleasures of sin, and expect to derive happiness from a single course of conduct, we shall be sadly disappointed—for we can not find happiness except in the highway of holiness.

Now, we believe in a future state—a state of immortality—a state of blessedness. We are religious beings—we have religious affections, desires, and hopes. They all take hold on immortality. And the great object of all religious hope is, to deliver us from the fear of death! 'We are saved by hope.' Saved from fears and doubts. It begets in us a joyful heart in contemplating upon the happy prospect before us—freedom from all sin and eternal life in the world to come. And we have faith in a God of love, &c., as set forth in the first part of this article—in a Saviour from all sin, and a life of purity in the unseen world. This is the substance of that faith which was once delivered to the saints—and one that we are exhorted to hold fast 'without wavering; for he is faithful that promised.' We therefore, believe, that whatsoever God has promised will surely come to pass. And hence, we acknowledge the truth which is after godliness.—In hope of eternal life, which God, that can not lie, promised before the world began.' Titus i: 2.

Our faith then is a FULL and FREE salvation—the gift of God is eternal life. This life is in his Son. See 1 John v: 11.

We not only expect, but also believe, and have every reason to hope, that we shall all enter into rest when we come to die. 'For he that is dead is freed from sin.' Rom. vi: 7. 'To-day,' says the Saviour, to the penitent thief, 'shalt thou be with me in paradise.' Luke xxiii: 43.

Our hope is in Israel's God, and it is anchored in heaven. We believe it is sure and steadfast. We look beyond those things which are seen, and put no confidence in an arm of flesh. We trust in Him who has all power to save! We hope for a final and complete ingathering of the human race from the thralldom of sin and unbelief. This hope is big with immortality—and we hope for no more than we have faith to believe will come into Christ's kingdom, and receive the crown of life.

We have not the hypocrites hope, (Job viii: 13,) to believe in one thing, and to pray for another of an opposite character, and to expect neither. Our prayers, faith and hope are all in unison—in harmony with each other. What we believe we pray for—and what we pray for, we hope, or expect will be fulfilled.

We lift up our hands (1 Tim. ii: 8) 'without wrath or doubting,' and implore God's grace to fill every heart, and bring all in to a FULL participation of his love and goodness, which are so clearly set forth in the plan of our salvation and redemption, through the blood of Christ! We look forward with a holy joy to this happy period—and it is this faith and hope that makes us fearless and fervent in the dissemination of our views of God's moral government, and his righteous character.—And in the language of our text, 'Let us not be ashamed of this hope;' for, as St. Paul remarks—'Hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts.'

Ashamed of our hope! No! And we would say with David in relation to another subject—'If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy.' So say we in relation to the glorious hope of the Gospel of Christ—a FULL and FREE salvation. I am, for one, no more ashamed of my hope, than the apostle was of the glorious Gospel of the blessed God: 'for,' as he says, 'it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek.' We live by faith in the heavenly promises made to the fathers, and we hope in him who made them known, and look unto Jesus as the Lamb of God, who has given himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time. Such a lively hope as we cherish, makes the soul rejoice, even when sorrow and affliction press hard upon us, and render life wearisome!

There may be those who are ashamed of their hope—or rather afraid to let their real sentiments be known to the world. Such have our sympathy. But for one, I never saw that hour—I never was so situated in life, that I was either afraid to make known my views—or ashamed of my hope. No, for it is a hope that springs directly from the fount of God's love. It overflows the soul and bursts forth with praise and thanksgiving. Let us not be ashamed of this principle, for if we do, sorrow and affliction will make life a 'cruel bitter,' and in the hour of dissolving nature, we shall be without hope, and without God in the world—and of all men the most miserable. Our views are now generally known by those who wish to know them; and we have only to heed the admonition contained in the text, and we shall prosper.

Asbamed of hope—the jewel of the soul! Can it be possible, that any reflecting mind is ashamed of what the all-wise Creator has planted so deeply in every bosom, whether high or low, bond or free, Jew or Gentile? We all have hope—we should not be intelligent without it. And what does Peter say about this matter? 'And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you.' Hence, there is need of cultivation. We need more light and wisdom, that we may defend our faith with manliness, and a zeal that is according to knowledge!

But we must here inquire, How are we to know that ours is the Gospel hope, and whether it is founded in God or not? If we read 1 Pet. i: 17-21, we have an evidence that our faith and hope are in God. St. Paul put on for a helmet, the hope of salvation. When writing to the Hebrews, he says, 'As we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end,' &c. See Heb. vi: 13-19. In writing to Timothy, he says, 'Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the commandment of God our Saviour, and Son Jesus Christ, which is our hope.' Here we have the evidence that our hope is in God—and the efficacy of his Son's mission, to destroy sin, finish transgression, and bring in everlasting righteousness. Titus iii: 4-7, shows that it is not of works, but of grace. And so does Paul to the Ephesians, ii: 4-9.

That our hope has a good tendency upon the heart, we learn from Titus ii: 11-14; also 1 John iii: 3. Let the reader turn and read these references, and he will learn what our hope teaches us to do, and to expect. Paul to the Romans (iv: 18) speaks about those 'who against hope believed in hope.' They were those who, like us, staggered not at the promises of God, but were strong in the faith, giving God all the glory. We are saved by hope, and are enabled to live in the spirit of Christ, in view of the end of all evil—and a happy life in the world to come!

We have remarked that hope is a compound of desire and expectation. Now, what do we really desire, when we have the love of God shed abroad in the heart. If we desire the happiness of the human family, do we not pray for it? Do we not hope for it? And if we expect God's will to be done, we shall then seek to make man happy by inspiring in his heart hope that is anchored within the veil. A man may believe in the doctrine of endless misery—he may expect it, but he neither hopes nor prays for the truth of this sentiment. Why? Because the Deity has never planted such a principle in his bosom. Hence we think that our hope is not only a reasonable, and a natural one, but it is one which the Gospel every where inculcates. The Gospel is good news to all men.—And hope wishes all men well: It is beautifully expressed by the poet in the following lines.

'Hail! sweetest, dearest tie that binds
Our glowing hearts in one,
Hail! sacred hope that tunes our minds
To harmony divine!
It is the hope, the blissful hope,
Which Jesus' grace has given;
The hope when days and years are past,
We all shall meet in Heaven.'

We look upon hope next to reason itself—when hope forsakes the bosom reason leaves the brain.

'It is but an empty, vain deceit,
In the brains of fools created;
It speaks to the soul of a state more sweet,
Where its longings shall all be sated.
And the promise the indwelling spirit thus makes
To the hoping soul—it never breaks.'

If we look at the sentiments of St. Paul, we find that his desire, (Rom. x: 1,) prayer and hope were all in sweet harmony. 'And we have hope toward God, . . . that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, but of the just and unjust.' As he was strong in the faith, that 'in thee (Christ, which is Abraham's seed) shall all the nations be blessed;' we have confidence to believe that he expected they would come forth from the dead and receive the crown of life. As they had both died in Adam, he expected they would both be made alive in Christ. This is the doctrine of impartiality which our Saviour taught in his sermon on the Mount. This is the hope which the Gospel inculcates, that in the resurrection we shall be made equal unto the angels of God in heaven—we can die no more, being the children of God and of the resurrection.

Thus, the doctrine of the 'restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began,' (Acts iii: 21,) is one that we not only hope for, but even expect. If not, then we could put no confidence in the word of God.

Such feeling as this blessed hope begets in the soul, enables us to love all men with a pure heart serently. It teaches universal brotherhood. If we love our entire race as we ought, then we shall desire their best good, and pray for their happiness, and hope for their resurrection and salvation from all sin and its evil consequences. This is our hope of rejoicing, and we are not ashamed of it. It sustains and comforts us amidst the most trying scenes of our life, and bids us look up and rejoice in God, the source of all true enjoyment. It is a 'good hope'—given through grace, and is well calculated to establish us in 'every good word and work.' 2 Thess. ii: 16.

It is good, because it promises nothing but good to humanity. It is a lively hope—that is, a living hope that never dies. Earthly hopes are transitory—they fail—but this is unailing and undying. It produces life in the soul—and makes us love and cherish the Gospel. It is a hope of courage, and makes us not ashamed. It is a joyful hope, because it rejoices the heart and fills the soul with glory. There may be 'A mortal paleness on my cheek,

But glory in my soul'

It is a sure hope—it will never fail. God is the author—'He is not man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent.'

In conclusion, this hope promises the restoration of all men. It tells us that Christ died for all—that he gave himself a ransom for all—that he rose for all—and that he even lives and reigns over all. It assures us of a happy meeting in the future—of reunion with kindred spirits in that bright world 'where no storms lower, no sickness comes, no death divides; the destroyer shall then no more chill us with his icy breath, and with his long fingers straighten us for the grave.'

Let us cherish this hope, and pray for the increase of faith, and cultivate our affections. For 'Faith, hope and love ever dwell on earth,

And earth by them is blest;
But faith and hope must yield to love,
Of all the graces best.

Hope shall to full fruition rise,
And faith be sight above;
These are the means, but that the end,
For saints forever love.'

This then is that which 'looks to the final consummation of all things, and like a lamp suspended on high, shines' with undiminished rays when all around is darkness and gloom.' Amen and Amen.

A PROBLEM.

A majority of professing Christians do yet, I believe, set out upon the principle, and ground their faith upon the doctrine that God is 'unreconciled to man'—that Jesus Christ came into the world, to reconcile God to us—that the three persons in the Trinity, the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, are one—and that the Son, who is, according to this theory, the very eternal God, died to reconcile his Father to us*—or in other words, God died, or sacrificed himself to himself, to reconcile himself to us?

It has also been contended, that the moral man is often a more dangerous member of community than an individual entirely of the opposite character. Very well! And now for the sake of having our problem solved, admit it—and let us suppose, still further, that there is a good moral man, who has arrived at the age of forty years—but, has never (according to the opinion of him who assumes the prerogative to judge) 'been born again'—or in other words, in the common language of the day, never has 'experienced religion,' &c. Now this supposed moralist is met by another of about the same age, who is entirely of the opposite character—he has been, up to the time of their meeting, a villain. The two individuals, here referred to, enter into a conversation, disagree; an altercation ensues—and finally, the villain draws a dagger, and plunges it into the heart of the moralist; who, according to the avowed doctrine of the day, must sink to hell! yes! his doom is fixed—is sealed forever! (no change after death.) O yes! he is irrecoverably gone, where no mercy can ever reach him—while, according to the beautiful system of our Orthodox friends, the other individual, may be immediately arrested, tried, condemned to be executed; and, but one moment before he is launched into eternity, he professes to be very penitent—is really so—the atoning, vicarious sacrifice of Jesus' blood is applied for the remission of his sins; and he is thus swung into heaven! to sing hallelujah, through the endless ages of eternity, over the poor moralist, whom he has hurried into hell!

* See Methodist and Episcopal creed or discipline Articles 2d.

Tell me, ye who say, that the natural man can not discern, or understand the things of the spirit of God, how is this an equitable rewarding of men according to the deeds done in the body? The doctrine of the Bible is, that he that is guilty of much shall receive many stripes, while he that is guilty of less, shall receive fewer. And this is also, the doctrine of reason, observation and experience.—Remember, also, at the same time, that the doctrine of Revelation is, that God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself; and not, that Christ is reconciling God to the world. No! let us ever reverently remember, that God is right! and the world of mankind are wrong! and thus, may we henceforth humbly endeavor to be reconciled to his will. Having learned these great, these glorious truths, you will discover also, that Universalists believe in regeneration, or the 'new birth,' as taught in the Scriptures—i. e. that we must be born from above (which is the correct rendering of the passage) or of the spirit of love; for 'God is love,' and 'whosoever dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him'—and finally, that this 'new birth' consists in 'ceasing to do evil, and learning to do well,' and that we are required to love, not in words merely, and in tongue, but indeed and in truth.

A CONTROVERSY, AND CHALLENGE FOR DISCUSSION.

Br. SKINNER:—You probably have not heard of the short discussion between Mr. Bartlett, the Campbellite preacher of this place, and myself.—Inasmuch as he has challenged me to discuss the subject further, and accuses me of wishing to evade discussing my sentiments, I will give you a brief statement of facts in relation to the matter. Soon after I came to Ellisburg, it was rumored abroad that Mr. Bartlett was desirous of engaging in a discussion. A few days after I heard of this, one of our friends Mr. Bonney, came to me and said that he had had some conversation with Mr. Hudson, one of Mr. Bartlett's friends, and he (Mr. Hudson) wished to have some Universalist preach a sermon from a passage of Scripture in Heb. v: 8; 9, and let Mr. Bartlett follow him giving his views. Mr. Bonney said he told him that he presumed I, or some other one, would preach, providing he would give him the privilege of selecting a text for Mr. Bartlett to preach from, and let the Universalist follow him. I told him I would preach, consequently arrangements were made, and the first discourse was preached on Sunday the 28th of Dec. in the forenoon; in the afternoon Mr. Bartlett followed in reply. I will give you one or two ideas relating to the most important point. I took the ground that 'eternal life' might be enjoyed in this life, and referred to several passages as proof of my position. Mr. Bartlett seemed to think that I had taken one step beyond Universalism, for he said that Universalists explained 'everlasting' as limited in some cases, but 'eternal' they did not; and said that 'eternal' was never used in any other than an unlimited sense. He said that 'eternal' meant eternity, and ridiculed the idea of eternity being enjoyed in the short space of three score and ten years, said he could see how we could have eternity in prospect, but he did not see how we could enjoy it in time. One of his strongest arguments was, that he had been taught from his youth up, that 'eternal' meant 'eternity,' and said that he would go to school to some of us if we could teach him. He is now about fifty years of age I should judge from his family; it is possible, however, that he can learn something—people are never too old to learn.

Two weeks from that time we preached from 1 Tim. ii: 4. He delivered his discourse in the forenoon; and I replied in the afternoon. After I had closed my reply, he appeared to be very much dissatisfied—said that I had misrepresented him, and if I did not retract he should review my reply. I did not know what retraction he wished me to make as he did not point out a single misrepresentation.

At the close of the meeting, I gave out the appointment for Br. Hawes of Fulton, to preach in two weeks on an exchange. Mr. Bartlett was present at the time. During my absence of one week, at the Mexico discussion, and Fulton the Sunday after, Mr. Bartlett got up a meeting, in order to review my reply. When the people had assembled, he stands up before them, and says, 'I do not see Mr. Rice here.' He then proceeds to examine several points in the debate, and according to what I have heard, the whole was ridicule and abuse, from beginning to end. At the close of his remarks, he stated that he was very sorry that I was not present. One of our friends present, asked him if he did not know that I was to be absent? He answered that he did not. This friend then told Mr. Bartlett that it would plague him to make the community believe it.

After my return, on hearing what observations he had made, I concluded to reply to his sermon; and I sent him a line inviting him to be present, and received the following reply:

January 31, 1846.

Mr. Luther Rice: Dear Sir,—I received your note informing me that you intend to reply to my discourse to-morrow afternoon. How you can reply to what you did not hear, I can not well conceive. I suppose you are well aware that I am engaged all day to-morrow, and can not therefore attend. Had you chosen the evening or some other time when I was not engaged, you might have expected me in attendance. My proposition for discussion is before you; if you see fit to accept it, well.

Proposition for discussion—Do the Scriptures teach the ultimate happiness and salvation of all mankind, regardless of their character and actions in this life? Benevolently yours,

J. MILTON BARTLETT.

On receiving the above, I addressed him a line, stating that I would accept his challenge, providing he was willing to discuss a fair question. I supposed that he would be willing to have a conjoint question, and take the lead in the debate, a part of the time, in as much as he gave the challenge. I stated a question after this manner—'Does the Bible teach the final holiness and happiness of all mankind? or does it teach the doctrine of endless misery?' Wishing to have a question that would cover the whole ground, and bring out his views as well as my own. He does not pretend to tell what he believes in regard to the future state. In a private conversation with him before the discussion, I expressed my ignorance of his sentiments as to the condition of the wicked, but he gave me no information. I then asked him if a fair disputant would not let his views be known in the discussion? He answered that he would. So I expected he would tell us what he did believe, if he designed to be a fair and honorable disputant.

In his second discourse he said that he had understood that some had complained because he did not let his sentiments be known; but says he, 'I have no sentiments—I have no right to any sentiments, they are God's sentiments, and I explain the Bible just as I understand it.' Now I am willing to take his question and discuss it until he is satisfied, and then if he is a man, or possesses any thing of a manly spirit, he will take the affirmative and defend his belief, let it be what it will. If he believes in endless misery let him say so, if he believes in annihilation, let him give a question embodying his views and go ahead. I am ready for the discussion; so I stated in my letter, and this is his answer; and I ask if there is any thing honorable about it? I wish to lay it before the public that they may judge.

February 16, 1846.

Luther Rice—Dear Sir, your note of Feb. 12th was duly received, and is now before me. I can not say that I am disappointed in your wishing to evade discussing the truth of your theory of the unconditional salvation of all mankind. You insinuate, that the question I proposed for discussion, is not a fair one. If you have confidence in the sentiment you endeavored to maintain in the discussion with me, it is just the question you would choose. It gives you the benefit of all the theories of Universalism extant, and if you can prove the truth of any one of them, why not address yourself to the work. You have great encouragement, for if you succeed, (and succeed you certainly will, if the Bible teaches the dogma,) you convert us all to your views at once. You also say, 'a question in few words will cover the whole ground,' as if the question I proposed contained many words. Upon comparing them, I find the question you propose, and the one I sent you to contain exactly the same number of words. It is not then on account of the wordiness of my question that you decline to discuss it. But because you think the task of proving the truth of universal salvation, before a competent board, greater than you wish to undertake. Be it so then, if you think yourself incompetent, but still believe the affirmative of my question, perhaps you can procure some one of respectable standing, of your preachers, who would be glad to do your cause a service in this place. We can doubtless procure a man, and you and I will step aside; and let them have the arena. Benevolently yours,

J. MILTON BARTLETT.

Mr. Bartlett says above that he is not 'disappointed in my wishing to evade discussing,' &c., and he would fain have it believed that I wish to evade discussing the theory of Universalism, when I stated in my letter, and in the desk, that I was ready. I have been informed that Mr. Bartlett said, on hearing that I had accepted his challenge on condition that he would consent to have a conjoint question, that he could spend his time more profitably. If these are his feelings, why does he not come out and say that he does not wish for further discussion, instead of attempting to clear himself by accusing me of wishing to evade? He will do no honor to himself by pursuing such a course.

If a person is challenged to discuss a religious subject, has he no right to say any thing about the question without being charged with the crime of wishing to evade? There is no evasion on my part; if Mr. Bartlett desires it, I wish to discuss the truth of Universalism; and in connection, I wish to discuss his sentiments if he has any; but if he has none I do not wish to discuss with him.—He says that it is not on the 'account of the wordiness of his question that I decline to discuss it, but because I think the task of proving the truth of universal salvation, before a competent board, greater than I wish to undertake.' I stated in my letter that a question in few words would cover the whole ground; his evidently does not. He insinuates that I object to his on the account of words, but says that he finds on examination 'the same amount of words' in each; just as though there was no difference in questions of the same number of words!—His does not cover the whole ground, and he knows it. But I am willing to discuss it and he may add more words if he wishes; but in addition I want a question embodying his views. As to feeling incompetent, I frankly confess that I do; youth and inexperience forbid that I should feel otherwise; but I have no fears while I have truth on my side; and it is evidently a mere quibble with him, designed to cover a retreat and enable him to get clear and not have it said that he backed out. It appears that he is willing to confess himself incompetent, if I will only acknowledge that I am; for he says that he can 'procure a man,' to discuss with some one of our preachers of respectable standing. So it appears that he is the one who wishes to 'evade.' Well, if he is desirous of having the discussion continued, let him bring forward his man, who will consent to a conjoint question, and I will pledge myself to procure one of respectable standing or take it upon myself.

L. RICE.

Ellisburgh, March 18th, 1846.

DEATHS.

In York, March 11th, Mrs. SOPHIA, consort of Mr. Daniel Holmes, in the 38th year of her age. By this sad event, a husband and four children are called to mourning, with other relatives who also share in their sorrow. Sister H. was emphatically a good woman, and a Christian. All who knew her can remember her quiet virtues. She was a faithful wife, a kind mother, and an obliging neighbor, and good to the poor. For several months she was on the decline, thus warning her friends of her departure, and being convinced herself that the time of her departure was at hand. It came, and she departed in the faith of the restitution, expecting to meet those whom she left behind in a fairer world. By her request a sermon was preached for the consolation of the mourners, by the writer. May Heaven's blessings rest upon the mourning friends, and keep them from the evils of the world, and in the faith of God's unchanging love.

A. KELSEY.

Suddenly, of congestion of the lungs, on the 14th ult., Mrs. MARY ANN BULL, aged 49 years, wife of Henry Bull, 276 Henry street, New York.

At Saratoga Springs, on the 18th ult., MORTIMER CLARENCE, son of Rev. J. A. and Frances Aspinwall, aged 8 years and 5 months.

The family of Br. A.—the mother and four children—have within the last four weeks, all been afflicted with that dreadful disease, Scarlet Fever, which in its ravages proved fatal to one lovely boy, whose death was as sudden and unexpected, as though he had been taken away in full health; as he had so far recovered from a relapse, as to be full of his wonted joy and happiness, and was considered out of danger from the disease.

But alas! the fatal disease had, in all probability, never been dislodged from his system, but while there was every appearance of recovery, it was steadily accomplishing its fatal work.

In this providence our bereaved brother and sister are called to drink of a bitter cup; but the reflection that their heavenly Father hath mingled it, enables them to say, in all the fullness of resigned and filial hearts, 'The cup which my Father hath given me shall I not drink it?'

The funeral services were performed by the writer, in the church, attended by a goodly number of friends and neighbors of different religious views, all of whom evinced that full share of Christian sympathy, which the occasion demanded, and which the spirit of Christianity so amply furnishes.

The lovely little corpse was interred in the new Cemetery which the citizens of that beautiful village have recently opened and dedicated as a sacred depository of the mortal remains of their dear departed friends. There, on the brow of a hill descending to the east, ready to receive the first rays of the sun, with a beautiful young pine at its head, is the grave containing the first departed child of affectionate parents. That cemetery is one of nature's lovely spots, hallowed and rendered more sacred and lovely by the purpose to which it is devoted. To it may the living delight to repair, to commune with the spirits of the departed, and the spirit of Light and Life; and there, in those shadowy bowers of peace and love, may the spirit of the living be chastened, subdued and purified from the dross of earth—that it may live in more constant communion with the glorified in heaven; and thus be the better prepared for all the duties, and labors, and trials of life, in the consciousness of the Divine presence and blessings of him who is God over all, forever blessed, and forever blessing all the subjects of his moral government.

From the Gospel Banner.
CHARITABLE OBLIGATIONS.

Brs. D. H. Plumbe and C. B. Wakeman of Jersey City have sent us the daily Evening Sentinel of the 31st of Dec. last, published in that place, with the following article in it marked for our attention:—

'Mr. Editor—In your paper of Monday you give currency to what is called a 'Thrust that tells,' by a certain Mr. Drew. 'It is as follows: 'A Mason or an Odd-Fellow is bound to render assistance to his brother in need in any part of the world—why is it not so among Christians? But let a Christian go from this state to New Orleans, and be taken sick, and needy, and make himself known as a Christian, and who would come to his aid on that account?' I answer to this semi-infidel thrust: scores would be ready to render all necessary aid: and that too whether he were Christian or not, his sickness and need, without any secret pass word, would give him access to Christian sympathy and relief.

'And further, that such cases are of every day occurrence, and excite no surprise whatever. I suspect therefore this is a 'Thrust that tells' a slander on Christians, and Christianity. And moreover, that masonry and odd fellowship need no such thrusts to support them. They yield their benefits to their members exclusively, those only who can pronounce the shibboleth, and do not pretend to be charitable, or benevolent societies. In these and kindred associations the members pay their dues, comply with the rules and receive all the benefits not as a charity, but as a right, a regular 'quid pro quo' equivalent. It is a regular plan of insurance, you pay your money and get your 'policy' and the proper idea of benevolence is excluded.

'Let him who aimed this thrust come to this place in circumstances of want, and we will give a better specimen of 'Gospel' than was floating on his 'Banner' when he wrote that article. W.'

This is evidently written by some one who is ignorant both of Masonry and Odd-Fellowship, and who is an enemy to these institutions because he is ignorant of them. We surely meant our article as no semi-infidel thrust at Christianity; it was only designed to say that most Christian churches as now organized do not surely respond to the demands of charity as do the Masonic and Odd-Fellow's Fraternities—and we regretted that it was so. But more of this by and by.

Our article appears to have engaged extensive animadversion, for some one has within a few days sent us from New Orleans, the 'New Orleans Protestant,' a Presbyterian paper of that city, with the following article marked in it, to which our attention is called:—

'UNKIND BECAUSE UNTRUE.—We cut the following from the Philadelphia Native American:

A Close Hit.—Rev. Mr. Drew, of the Gospel Banner, gives very quiet thrusts occasionally. Here is one that tells:—

'A Mason or an Odd Fellow is bound to render assistance to his brother in need, in any part of the world—why is it not so among Christians? But let a Christian go from this State to New Orleans, and be taken sick and needy, and make himself known to the churches as a Christian, and who would come to his aid on that account?'

'Who the Rev. Mr. Drew is, who is capable of giving such occasional close and quiet thrusts, we do not know; but however dexterous he may be in giving close hits occasionally, he has certainly this time struck wide of the mark.

'We have many vile and wicked people in New Orleans, and many people coming here who call themselves Christians consort with these and suffer from them, and if they escape at all, go out often naked and wounded. For such we can not answer.

'But we pledge the entire Christian community of New Orleans, of every denomination, to the kindly reception and speedy relief of any one who shall come among us claiming charity as a disciple of Christ. And more than this, the churches of New Orleans do not wait to receive a secret grip before they extend relief; they do not ask whether a man can make a required sign, before they give the hand of charity; it is enough for them to know that he is needy and in distress.

'It is possible that the Rev. Mr. Drew has himself been down to Jericho and fallen among thieves, but we question very much whether he or any other man who has made himself known to the churches of our city as being in destitution and want, has ever been turned empty away.'

The New Jersey writer slanders Masons and Odd-Fellows when he says 'they yield their benefits to their members exclusively.' This is false. They are as charitable to persons out of those fraternities as are other people.—Indeed, they are specially charged in their duties, to remember that a Mason's charities, like the masonry of the Universe itself, should be universal. Neither does the writer know the difference between Masonry and Odd Fellowship. Masonry is purely a charitable institution; it bestows none of its benefits as matters of right, any farther than every mason has a right to expect charity when in need of it. It is no insurance office.—The writer, therefore, utters falsehood when he says, 'They do not pretend to be charitable or benevolent societies.' The man either does not know what he is writing about, or he means to deceive. True, Odd-Fellowship provides a pecuniary benefit as a matter of right to its sick and unfortunate members; but its benefits do not end here. Provision is also made for the support of widows and the education of orphans; and Odd-Fellows are charged to be charitable beyond the bounds of their own fraternity. What harm is it for charity to begin at home, if it is also taught to spread from that point and diffuse its blessings far and wide? There is nothing restrictive in the charitable obligations of Masons and Odd-Fellows.

With regard to New Orleans, we hope it is in the city as the Protestant says it is. We did not instance New Orleans as if that city was any worse than others. We only meant to say, that if any person professing to be a Christian should go away from home—say to New Orleans, Havanna, Lisbon, Vienna, or London—and there should fall sick—would he have a right as a Christian to send word to the first Christian church whose steeple might chance to display itself from the window of his sick room, and demand that a committee be sent with money in hand to supply his necessities, and watchers repair to his bedside to cheer and assist him the live-long night? Perhaps some churches might do this. We know not but all in New Orleans would; if so, however, we apprehend they are much more truly Christianized than most of the churches in New England are. Many a stranger Christian here might suffer for the want of Christian help, when if he were also a Mason or an Odd-Fellow he would know just where to apply for assistance and be sure of receiving it.

When we go to New Orleans and are taken down with the Yellow Fever, we will not first make ourself known either as a Mason or an Odd-Fellow; but will apply directly to the Presbyterian church of which the Editor of the Protestant is a member, and know, by experience, whether that will recognize us as a Christian, and do as much more for us as a Christian, than Masonry or Odd-Fellowship would do for us as a Mason or an Odd-Fellow,—as much more, we say, as Christianity exceeds Masonry or Odd-Fellowship in the excellence of its principles. We fear if we did not know the secret grip, and could not pronounce the Shibboleth, to satisfy the Presbyterian church that we are also a Presbyterian, we should hardly be sure of ten dollars per week and good nursing on account of our being a Universalist Christian.

THE DEVIL'S GRIP.

'THE DEVIL'S GRIP. Sitting in my office a few evenings since, I was startled by a noise in the street, and on looking out of the window perceived a crowd of persons on the opposite side of the street, appearing to be much excited. The rapid change of position, the shoutings of many persons, the sounds of a whip or stick very bravely used, &c., induced me to see what was the matter. On arriving at the spot, and passing through the crowd, two dogs were perceived, one of them having seized the other by the snout, and was holding on with a grip that nothing seemed able to make him unloose. Men took hold of the hind legs of each and pulled with all their strength—a cowhide wielded most powerfully by a strong man was tried—stamping with the foot, immediately where the teeth of one had sunk in the flesh of the other, with a force that one would have thought would certainly have broken the hold had it been iron—these and other expedients were resorted to, and not the least impression seemed to be made upon the one who had the grip. There they stood, one quietly holding on, and the other enduring the hold, occasionally giving evidence of his suffering. After all other expedients had failed, a shovel full of hot coals was applied to the mouth of him who had the advantage, and immediately he let go—he could not stand fire.

'In thinking about the affair since, I came to the conclusion that the dog was not so much to blame as I supposed; it was his nature to seize and hold on in that way; and somehow I could not help comparing this peculiarity of the dog to the enemy of all good, the devil. The everlasting destruction of the soul is his chief aim; 'he goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.' O! thou wicked man—pause in your mad career, stop, think, God will not be mocked—the soul that sinneth it shall die. O! by every consideration that can influence an intelligent being, you are besought to turn from the error of your ways. Do not despise the riches of his grace, who suffered and died that you might live. Try and get your mind enlightened and your heart purified. Know most assuredly that the Bible is true—the figures used in the Scriptures to teach other great truths are to be relied on—so that which compares hell to fire. The great God would not deceive you on this point, and He says plainly that there 'the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.' And remember that just as it was the nature of the dog to hold on to his grip, so it is the nature of the devil to glory in your destruction—and that not even fire will make him unloose his hold of him who gets fairly into his clutches.'—[Methodist Protestant.

On the above story the Editor of the Trumpet has the following pertinent remarks.

'As to this story, so far as the dogs are concerned, we have but little to say. For fighting dogs are somewhat like men. They do not however often kill each other. When they are angry, they fight. But the dog is an animal of strong attachments; he loves his master, and will risk his own life to protect his friends. This is just as congenial with the dog's nature, as it is for him to fight when imposed upon. We do not believe any more in the total depravity of dogs, than we do in that of the human species.

'The Editor of the 'Protestant' turns from the dog, to his favorite topic, the devil. He says, 'The everlasting destruction of the soul is his chief aim; 'he goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.' O! thou wicked man—pause in your mad career, stop, think, God will not be mocked—that soul that sinneth it shall die.' Thus much for the Methodist Editor. What an impious association of the two beings! Our God, our heavenly Father, the Merciful and Good, is here represented, as it were, in a very league with the devil. The devil desires to get men into his clutches, and God sanctions it. If God desired to prevent it, he might do it, for he has all power; but he is represented as permitting and in fact aiding to produce the very thing the devil desires to have done.

'Could the devil get men 'into his clutches' (to use the elegant language of the 'Protestant') if he had not permission? Does he roam unrestrained? If so, who gave him the power? And can not the Being who gave him that power take it away at any time? Could the devil do all the damage that it is said he will do, if God did not permit it? We should be glad to have these questions answered. We are willing to put them into the following shape:—Suppose the devil should seek to get men 'into his clutches,' and should do every thing that lay in his power to accomplish it; and on the other hand, God should oppose such a design, and do every thing that lay in his power to defeat it, which would succeed? God? or the devil?

'Now, we maintain, that the devil can not glory forever in the destruction of mankind unless he have permission. He has no original power. There are not two eternal antagonist principles. If men will persist in talking about the devil as a real being, they must remember that all the power he has is delegated. All Scripture represents the devil as being under control. He could not tempt Job until he had permission. One of the angels had power enough over him to seize him and bind him for a thousand years, and shut him up for that time, and afterward he was to be loosed for a little season, not for all eternity. The devil then is clearly under subjection. Now, if souls are to be tormented to all eternity, it must be because God wills it. But we protest against such a doctrine. Why should God make man endlessly miserable? or permit it to be done? And in closing we suggest to the editor of the 'Protestant' to be a little more careful in his description of characters and things; for he has so identified the doings of God and the devil, that it is difficult to distinguish between them.'

We can not but add a remark or two to the above. It seems that the dog relinquished his hitherto unyielding grip when 'a shovel full of hot coals was applied to his mouth—he could not stand fire. But according to the Methodist writer, the devil can stand fire right well; and when all the burning coals and red hot embers and molten lava of hell are heaped upon him and poured into his mouth, he will not relax his hold one iota on the poor victim on which his grip is laid! His author—for we suppose he must have had a maker—has so constituted him that he can stand fire like a salamander! Indeed fire would seem to be his natural element. And if so he must enjoy himself pretty well therein and would be very unhappy if taken out of it. Query: Could this poor brute of a dog stand it in such a place? No; certainly not.—How then can man stand it? Is it not blasphemy thus to associate God with the devil, and represent them both as uniting all their powers of malignity and vengeance to torment man the offspring of God in liquid fire to all eternity? The true Divinity declares, (Isa. lvii: 16), 'I will not contend for ever; neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me and the souls which I have made.' Man could not endure it—he would sink under such an accumulation of evil. Now it seems to us that those who contradict God, and say he will contend forever, ought to be able to give as good a reason why he will as he has why he will not. D. S.

DOW, JR.

This inimitable Lay Preacher, whose sermons are weekly recorded in the 'New York Sunday Mercury,' puts forth some discourses about as well 'mixed up' with good advice, good sense, fun and rich humor, as any thing in that line to be met with now-a-days. To the lovers of fun we heartily commend the 'Mercury.' It is only one dollar a year—published by Nichols, Paige and Krauth, 109 Nassau street, N. Y.

We give below, for the edification of our readers, a late sermon of said Dow.

Revenge is but a frailty incident
To crazed and sickly minds; the poor content
Of little souls, unable to surmount
An injury, to weak to bear affront.

My hearers—I wish to poke it through your ears into your hearts, that Revenge is one of the most foolish, pitiful, and unprofitable of all the human passions. Love, anger, jealousy, pity, scorn, sorrow and remorse, all have their uses. They are bosom winds that—although they sometimes rage after the manner of an old-fashioned hurricane, and do a great deal of damage, upsetting the temples of happiness and demolishing the palaces of peace—when blown as gentle breezes, are purifying to the mortal atmosphere, refreshing to the soul, invigorating to the system, and inciting to laudable action: but revenge doesn't contain half so much to recommend as a bomb-shell, that bursts itself in dealing out destruction to others. That it is a frailty incident to minds that, at times, are as crazy as a wild cat in christian company, and naturally as sickly as morals in Mulberry street, is as evident as a pump-handle. Minds capable of rising twenty degrees above the dream of a dog are too noble for revenge: they look upon it as digging a very small species of potatoes, or shooting mosquitoes with a musket, calculated to compromise the character and dignity of him who indulges in such amusement. In fact, he who seeks revenge for every trifling injury, is almost as much without a soul as a pepper-pod, that gives bite for bite, and gets used up at last.

My friends—revenge belongs to the savages—and yet, you, who claim to be civilized beings, appear to be as much given to it, as the veriest Indian that ever redressed a wrong with a tomahawk and scalping-knife! If a person throws mud at your reputation—breaks the tools, with which you work for a living—puts brush, logs and stones in your road to fortune—kisses your wife—seduces your sister—and plays particular Tommy with your domestic ducks in general—you can't sleep nor rest till you get revenge. Then, when you have got it, what good does it do you? Can revenge wash out the spots that slander has cast upon your reputation? No. Can it mend the tools that malice has broken? No. Can it produce faithfulness on the part of your wife? No. Can it have any good effect upon your domestic ducks in general? Most decidedly not. Then, I ask again, of what use under heaven is this revenge to you? Oh! you say, it is most precious sweet!—it affords me a world of satisfaction to know that I have given the rascal just what he deserves. But, my friends, because one wrong has been done, must another be committed to make it right? God and common sense forbid! I am well aware that, in grammar, two negatives are equivalent to an affirmative; but I have looked all through my moral arithmetic, and I can't find any place in it where it says that two wrongs are equal to a right. But revenge is woven in your natures, and I suppose there is no use in trying to pick it out with my preaching. If you stub one toe against a rolling stone in your path, you must need bruise another in kicking it spitefully out.—That's satisfaction! You bump your nose in the dark against some innocent but obstinate post, and whereupon you give it an unmerciful beating.—Serves it right, for it had no business to have been in your way! All this, my friends, is no less funny than foolish; but it serves to soothe you, as a doating mother soothes her squalling bantling by chastising the door that pinches its digits: Naughty door to pinch baby's little teeny fingers!—mother'll whip it!—there!—there! So, you big boobies, you all delight, more or less, in revenge, according to the power of your brutish propensities, and the quantity of sulphur and saltpetre in your bosoms. Why don't you chase the gale with a cudgel, that takes the hat from off your head, or get revenge out of the hurricane that upsets your domicils? Some of you are just silly enough to do it: and I have not the least doubt, that if two or three whom I could mention, among my congregation, were to be knocked down by a thunderbolt, their first object would be, on recovering their senses, to look about for a brickbat.

My dear friends—you should never meditate revenge for a moment. You will show your bravery and nobleness, by forgiving and forgetting. If you do this, your enemies will forever after lack the power and disposition to harm you. Look back upon my friend Socrates—now reduced to a peck of dust! He was divinely brave! Injured he fell, and dying he forgave. He drank the poisonous draught, as calmly as a child ever drank a cup of milk: with a mind as serene and as mild as a sunset in summer, and a soul too magnanimous for revenge, he didn't wish to see his vile accusers drink so deep as he; but he had revenge, notwithstanding,—for as he bade them farewell, he bruised their hearts with his dying blessing; and that was something they couldn't get over to the last day of their lives. If, my friends, you were each to mind your own business, and let others alone, there could be no occasion for revenge. It is this meddling with the concerns of others, that makes mischief in the human family, and frightens happiness over fences. Keep your own secrets, and manifest no interest in that of your neighbor. Take not advantage of the weakness of the female sex, to draw from them a host of little privacies, which when let loose upon the community, create a greater disturbance than a nest of hornets in a prayer meeting; for scandal, angry feelings and revenge are sure to be the consequences. Though generally speaking, the secrets of women are easily got into, yet I am happy that there are many, very many, glorious exceptions—exceptions that add lustre to the natural beauty of the sex, and do honor to the world. So mote it be! Dow Jr.

RETALIATION.

When we look upon the different members of community, carefully examining the motives upon which many act, as well as upon the manner in which they conduct themselves toward their fellow beings; we find that too often a spirit of retaliation is the motive power, urging them forward to the accomplishment of their various purposes. If we view those excitements which have become so prevalent in the world; examine the intercourse of man with man, we shall observe that passion is by far too frequently the ruling power, and ruling too, with a rod of iron.

For instance, one supposes his neighbor to have imbibed an erroneous opinion relative to any subject engaging public attention; that his sentiments are unlike those which govern the man who has any anxiety or desire for the welfare of society, and forthwith he determines to meet him and his actions, not upon the broad principle of a manly and friendly opposition, but as dictated by the evil spirit of retaliation. Kindness; that noble power which should ever govern the human mind, is lost amid the darkness of angry feeling, and he has no charity for him whose thoughts are different from his own. Language the most offensive and insulting is employed; utmost powers exerted in order to wound the tender feelings of the heart; no pains spared to harrow up the soul; and in truth, such an individual, so far as he is not restrained by the force of the law, will do his utmost to injure the feelings of all those whose sentiments and opinions do not square with his notions of expediency.

Such is the manner in which we may be treated, now and then, by some who are governed by excited propensities and lost in a measure to the instruction of moral and virtuous sentiments. But what should be our conduct in return? Passion would speak and urge us forth to do as we are done by; to return railing for railing, imprecation for imprecation, curse for curse. But this is a voice from the abuse of the lower propensities of our nature, and should never be received or obeyed, for it would result in the most serious and lamentable consequences, not only to others, but also to ourselves. For we may contemplate the life of that man who acts upon the impulse of excited and angry feelings, unmindful of more sober and candid considerations, and we shall find that he passes his hours in one continued turmoil; fears and anxieties, sorrows and afflictions, distress and disappointment, mark the passage of his days. He is regarded as one upon whom but little dependance can be placed; no confidence is reposed in his integrity, and while men take care that he does not ascend to any important and responsible station in society, he will wend his way through the world covered with shame, and at last, with a mind filled with sorrow, go down to the sepulchre leaving behind him no cherished remembrance!

But there is a man who liveth a different life, and such an one as should be ours. The spirit of retaliation is never suffered to come within his mind, for seeing the responsibility resting upon the children of men, and also the effect of all actions, he goes forward maintaining a mind influenced by candor and integrity. He is looked upon as one upon whom the institutions of society are dependent for support; he commands the respect of all, even of him who is moved by a retaliatory spirit; he is revered and loved by the candid and upright, and regarded as of the noblest of God's created intelligent beings. And while we view his life with admiration; marking 'the even tenor of his way'; the beauty of his daily walk; the reverence appearing at the mention of his name, and indeed all connected with his earthly being, we should endeavor to go forth and do likewise.

We may have to contend with occasional difficulties it is true, but they will be difficulties easily overcome. We may have many provocations to induce us to swerve from the line of virtue, and meet others as we are met. We may be the objects of disdainful and contemptuous treatment; but we should not suffer ourselves by such things, to be brought into slavery to a revengeful spirit, for were we to do so, our day of peace would soon draw to a close. In maintaining such conduct however, we need not yield up any of our lawful rights; need not forego the enjoyment of any of our privileges, or refrain from the expression of our opinions. Yet toward all who would endeavor to injure our feelings, or our standing, while we meet them with a firm, a determined, and a manly opposition, a spirit of friendship and kindness should mark every word falling from our lips, and every deed executed by our hands. Maintaining such a character, our duties in life thus far will be accomplished, and great will be our reward.

DESTITUTE SOCIETIES.

By a letter just received from Newark, Wayne county, N. Y., we learn that Br. Locke, who has been laboring to very general acceptance in that place for the past year, proposes leaving this Spring, (for what place we do not learn,) and consequently the Universalist society in Newark will be left destitute of a preacher, and will be desirous of engaging some efficient pastor to supply their desk for the ensuing year. We believe this is an excellent society.

While on this subject, we would also state that there are several other Universalist societies in this State, which we believe are well able to sustain constant preaching, but which are now destitute of the preached word. Among them, we mean the society at Victor, where Br. J. M. Cook preached a portion of the time during the past year; the one at Cooperstown, where Br. O. Whiston has labored in word and doctrine for a number of years; and the one at Fort Plain, now left destitute by the engagement of Br. A. C. Barray to remove to Richmond, Va. These are all good places and the Universalist societies in each of them, we believe are able, if united, and well suited with their pastor, to sustain constant preaching, do honor to themselves and the cause, and give an efficient support to their pastors. We sincerely hope they will not long remain destitute.

EUSEBIUS HOAG.

In this paper of the 13th ult., we published an inquiry respecting the whereabouts of the above named individual, stating that a number of years ago he collected money belonging to us and appropriated it to his own use without leave from us; and though often written to had never answered, nor refunded the money thus used. This statement was strictly true: and we were for years pained to know that it was so, and in reference to one too, who professed to be a preacher of the true faith. But we are happy now to state to the public that we have just received two letters on the subject, one from Br. Hoag and one from Br. Dutcher, a Trustee of the Universalist society in Gibson, by which we learn several circumstances that go to mitigate and in a measure excuse this seeming neglect of duty. They are the following. 1. That of the number of letters we sent to him, he never received but one. 2. That he has been afflicted in his family and severely pressed with poverty, insomuch that when he received said letter he had not and could not raise money enough to pay the postage on an answer to it; so he did not reply. 3. That he has always purposed to refund the money thus taken as soon as able—that he still purposes to do so, and is now engaged where he hopes soon to be able to pay the debt, is less embarrassed than formerly, and sends, in his present letter, an instalment of what was due. Believing in his professions, that he is honest and means to do right, and having the assurance that he is esteemed and his labors appreciated where he now is, we hope our former notice of him may not operate to his injury, or in any way prejudice his friends or others against him, so as to curtail his usefulness, and that he may be prospered and receive such a support as he and his family may need.

REFLECTIONS.

The subject called up by the above notice has awakened some unpleasant reminiscences and painful reflections in our mind, relative to a large number of individuals of various faith and professions, and among them several whose faith and profession should have been a guaranty against such practices as they have been guilty of. To say nothing of those cases, wherein others are more particularly interested or have sustained losses in this way, of which the report has come to our ears, we will only advert to some where we have been the loser, and have had personal knowledge of the facts.

We have known men making great pretensions to religion, and claiming to be religious teachers too, who have received money in trust for us, embezzled and appropriated it to their own use without leave or licence, and evidently without ever intending to refund it: for they did not even notify us of having received it, nor acknowledged it till we had obtained information of the fact from other sources. Others again, under the guise of friendship, and with promises of early payment, have borrowed money for a short time, or obtained other property, and never afterwards given themselves the least trouble or uneasiness, or apparently made the least effort to pay. Years and years have rolled away. Some of them have often renewed their promises and as often broken them: Others, instead of renewing their promises, when called on, would perhaps reply they had nothing with which to pay (and while they pursue their present course the Lord knows they never will have any thing to pay with) and that on the whole, as they could not pay, 'we might just as well laugh as cry about it.' And at the same time that these teachers of religion in theory but deniers of it in practice have thus neglected their obligations, and even taunted and laughed at us for our losses by them, a number of them to our certain knowledge, have repeatedly had money in their possession enough to pay the debt for moneys embezzled, or borrowed, or honestly due to us, but instead of paying it, they have spent it in travelling from Dan to Beersheba, or through the length and breadth of the Union—yes, in some instances, beyond the Union and across the Atlantic to foreign countries—and spent hundreds and hundreds of dollars in unnecessary journeys; while others have spent it in extravagant living, or furniture, or books that they could have done without, or dress for themselves, or families; and others again were not only imprudent and destitute of all economy in these things, but must needs be very liberal and charitable to help every poor and needy man, woman and child that appealed to their benevolence and thus used up all their funds, (or rather their creditors funds,) without paying their debts. We have also known many to condemn all the above practices in unqualified terms, and then—go right off and do precisely the same thing themselves!

Now we have no objections to people, or preachers, travelling all over the Union, and over the whole Eastern and Western hemispheres if they choose; provided they do it at their own and not our expense. We have no objections to their extravagance in living, furniture, books, dress, &c., for themselves and families; and still less objections to their giving most liberally and freely to the poor and the destitute of every description, but are right glad to see it, provided they use their own money and not ours to do it with. But he who owes us one hundred dollars, and having the money in hand, instead of paying it over to us, spends it for what is unnecessary, or gives it away to some poor and needy person, spends what belongs to us, or gives away what is not his own. It is not truly his own till his honest debts are paid. We had rather have the pleasure of giving it away of ourself than that he should assume to be the almoner of our bounty without consulting us. Men should learn to be just before they are generous. Honesty should be practiced before liberality, alms-giving, or extravagant living is indulged. For he who robs his honest creditor for either purpose—even to give to the poor,—commits a positive crime, but he who withholds charity or alms from the poor, when he has it not to give, is innocent, however glad he might be to give if he had the wherewith.

By just such men as we have described above we have lost hundreds and hundreds, yes, thousands of dollars; and the reader may well suppose the subject is a painful one to dwell upon when viewed in connection with the standing and professions of the individuals concerned.—We have seriously queried in our minds whether such men ought to be allowed to retain their standing, to whatever denomination they may belong, or however splendid their talents may be—whether it was not our duty, and the duty of all who are knowing to these facts, to expose them by name to the public, or have them arraigned before the proper ecclesiastical tribunal, and tried for dishonesty, swindling, or by whatever other name their conduct shall be designated. And then the idea would occur that should we do it, the act would be considered as originating in selfishness, or personal considerations alone, and not in a desire for promoting the purity of the Christian profession and character. In speaking or acting on such a subject we are free to admit that no personal considerations should have any weight or influence whatever. But it appears to us that sins of this description, though committed in high places, should not be permitted to go unrebuked.

But some will probably ask, 'Can you make no allowance for poverty, misfortune, sickness, unforeseen calamity? but must you exact the last farthing of such as have not, and can not procure the means of paying what they honestly owe?' We answer, we can and do cheerfully make allowance for all these things, and many a man knows that we have often forgiven large debts to such as were unable, from any of these causes to pay, and whom we had every reason to believe to be honest. It is the dishonest and knavish alone of whom we have been speaking above, or those whose carelessness and inattention to duty involve them in that category—those who have embezzled and used other men's money without leave or licence; or borrowed, or bought, without ever designing to pay; or if not, who never do or never will pay, but when they have the means, are sure to use them for some other or any other purpose rather than to pay their honest debts. Such can justly claim neither forgiveness, charity nor forbearance. For what better is their conduct than theft or robbery? We can not regard it in any more favorable light. No man is obliged to be guilty of either of those acts. It is far more honest, more honorable, more Christian, to beg than to be guilty of such an act. Sooner than do it, we would beg our bread from door to door, or live on roots and herbs, rather than spend another man's money without his consent, for the most costly viands and garments that ever graced the taste of an epicure or a dandy. For years we have thought of these things and now we have spoken. Are we wrong for having done so, if what we state be true? 'Whoso readeth,' &c.

D. S.

TO A. S. NORWICH, N. Y.

Dear Sir—Your communication was duly received, but having more than my usual allowance of writing to do, I was not able to answer it immediately. You ask my views of the License or No License question which agitates your State at present. I do not feel able to answer you fully. I am no longer a citizen of New York, and may be deemed presuming by many should I enter largely into a question which must be decided by your voters alone. Besides, the time of decision is so very near at hand, that all I could say in truth and justice, would have little or no influence on the result. But I will say, that I fear that result. Unless the voters are more generally and decidedly 'No License' than I have reason to believe they are, the 'Temperance men' will have called the voters together, and provided an election, merely to be beaten. And having drawn definite lines, and divided the voters into parties, and excited party spirit, it will, I think, be found more difficult to make converts to Temperance practices, than if the lines had not been drawn. These are my fears, frankly expressed—fears which, probably, would not exist were I on the ground and well acquainted with all the circumstances.

You also ask an expression of my views in regard to the Washingtonians deserting their principles of moral suasion in opposition to coercion and legal force; and allude to the fact that one of my co-editors, Br. Skinner, has countenanced the resort to the ballot box. That may be; but up to the period of my leaving Utica Br. Skinner had not taken the Washingtonian pledge, nor joined a Washingtonian society, though he had long advocated the Temperance cause in the old Temperance ranks—so that his course is not an indication of that of the Washingtonians particularly, nor a rule for me to go by in sentiment or action.* Hence I must be permitted to 'answer for myself.' In my humble opinion, when a Washingtonian abandons moral suasion for legal coercion, he ceases to be a Washingtonian as much as if he had introduced sectarianism or politics into his code of arguments and means; and though he remains a Temperance man, it is of the Old School class. The motto of the original Washingtonian society has painted in large letters on the wall of its large Hall in Baltimore, 'THE WASHINGTON BENEVOLENT TEMPERANCE SOCIETY AND HER PRINCIPLES!!! What are her principles? EXPERIENCE AND MORAL SUASION.' To that motto she, at least, has remained ever faithful. To that motto all the branch or auxiliary societies in her immediate fellowship and intercourse, remain constant—and when one abandons those principles it acknowledges an abandonment of Washingtonianism also. Such is my opinion, and such is the fact on which I base it. I consider moral suasion to be the great distinctive idea of Washingtonianism, as Baptism is of the Baptist church; the divine Unity, of Unitarianism; universal salvation, of Universalism; presbyterian government, of Presbyterianism, &c. I was informed that at a Washingtonian State Convention held last Spring, in Massachusetts, the Washingtonians reaffirmed as strongly as ever their confidence in moral suasion as contra-distinguished from coercion of every kind, and expressed their belief that legal force was injurious rather than beneficial to the reformation of drinkers and drunkards. I know not how correct this information is; but it embodies my own opinion, more and more confirmed by all the observations I have been enabled to make in New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. The legal traffic may be suppressed at last, after two-thirds or three-fourths of the voters unite, not only to vote it down, but also to enforce the fines and penalties of the law so as to keep it down. But while there are drinkers, intoxicating liquors will be sold; and many who vote 'no license,' will connive at, if not encourage, the illegal traffic. And should the number of such voters be considerable in a small majority of the whole number, a revulsion will take place, and a defeat the next year, follow the victory of this; and the contentions, strifes, litigations, and alienations of friends and families in neighborhoods, consequent on attempts by a minority to enforce the law in the great mass, will render even a final victory very dearly purchased. I wish, therefore, most ardently, that the Washingtonians every where had remained firm and true to their principles and measures—not opposing nor encouraging the passage of the law in question, but keeping themselves as a reserve corps that might come up when the old Temperance men were again brought to a stand, or driven in defeat from the field, and again seizing the Temperance standard that had fallen to the ground in the strife of law and party bitterness, bearing onward once more among the enemy, with the approbation of all, and to the triumph of the cause! In this manner Washingtonians did step in in time to retrieve the Fifteen gallon law in Massachusetts—and again in 1843 in Boston, after the old Temperance men had conquered at the polls to be beaten at the bars. And thus they did in 1840 and 1841, almost every where after the Old Reform had come pretty near to a stand-still. And thus they could have done again in your State, should the next election, or its following one, prove as disastrous to the Temperance cause as I sincerely fear it will.

I have answered you fully and frankly, as you requested, and to gratify your wishes, send this for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, believing that, notwithstanding the opinions of its chief Editor to the contrary, he will cheerfully give it place. Very respectfully yours,

A. B. GROSH.

P. S.—While on the subject, I ask room in a note, to say that a bit of sectarianism was inserted (quite unintentionally, I have no doubt,) by the Publisher or Printer of the Fourth Edition of the Washingtonian Pocket Companion. I mean the (to me, abominable) Trinitarian doxology inserted on page 37—probably more 'to fill out the page,' than out of any particular regard for its meaning. But in view of the strong declaration I have given in the Preface, I very much regret its insertion for any cause whatever, and wish to have it understood that I did not do it, and do regret that it was done. Harpers Publications.

Gardner's FARMER'S DICTIONARY, a neatly printed and handsomely bound 12mo. of 876 pages.* It is 'a vocabulary of the technical terms recently introduced into agriculture and horticulture from various sciences, and also a compendium of practical farming.' This work can be nothing less than a valuable one to agriculturalists. The names of plants, fruits, grains, all kinds of domestic animals, farming utensils of every description, and indeed every thing pertaining to agriculture, not excepting the atmosphere, electricity, insects of various kinds—elements that have a bearing upon the growth of the vegetable kingdom,—insects that infest and often destroy the entire crops of the farmer, &c., &c. It is profusely illustrated with representations of various plants, farming tools, cattle, etc., with definitions, as to their nature and uses. To every farmer specially this book can not but be a valuable acquisition.

JOHN MARTEN, a sequel to Henry Milner, by Mrs. Sherwood. This is a work of 352 pages 12mo. neatly bound, and written by an author generally known to the public. It seems to be the record of the scenes and trials of the subject of the memoir, during his progress as a theological student, to the rectorship of a parish. Many and various characters are introduced into the narrative, illustrating the motives of action and feelings of the society in which the lot of John Marten was cast.

THE COUSINS: a tale of early life, by the author of 'Conquest and self-conquest,' 'Praise and principle,' &c., is a pretty little 12mo. volume of 205 pages. It is an instructive and moral tale, calculated more specially for the young reader, but may be read with interest and profit by all.

Philanthropy; or MY MOTHER'S BIBLE. Founded on an incident which happened in New York, is another neat volume of 168 12mo. pages. The subject of the book, after reading its title, is fully explained by the following beautiful text. 'Every kindness we do our fellow creature brings its own reward.' All of the foregoing books are for sale by G. Tracy, 58 Genesee street.

Among the 'Harpers' recent cheap publications for sale by Mr. G. N. Beesley, this city, are No. 11 of their edition of the pictorial 'Wandering Jew,' price 25 cents.

No 73 of the Library of Select Novels, is 'THE ELVES,' with other tales and sketches, translated from the German of Tieck, by Thomas Carlyle, 25 cents. No. 74-5 is the STEP MOTHER, in two parts at 25 cents each. This is a romance from the prolific pen of G. P. R. James. No. 76 is 'JESSIE'S FLIRTATIONS,' by the author of 'Kate in search of a husband,' &c., 25 cents.

No. 4 of MAUNDER'S TREASURY OF HISTORY, contains the history of England from 1413 through the reigns of seven Kings, viz: Henry V and VI, Edward IV and V, Richard III, Henry VII and VIII down to A. D. 1535, containing 107 closely printed octavo pages, comprising all the remarkable events of 122 years. Only 25 cents per number. Daniel Adee 107 Fulton street, N. Y., publisher, of whom it may be obtained, or of G. N. Beesley.

The Sermons of Mrs. Soule and Chase are both thankfully received, and shall have a place soon. Where is 'Uncle Zeke'?

We have received a tale in five chapters from the pen of Sister Gibson, the first of which will appear in next week's paper. It will occupy a space in each number for four or five weeks. The story is illustrative of the folly of parents instructing their daughters to look upon wealth as the sine qua non of happiness and enjoyment in entering the marriage life. The moral it is intended to convey is excellent—consequently we consider it appropriate to our columns, and trust all our readers will not only receive interest but instruction from its perusal.

We have received from the publisher, A. Tompkins, Boston, Mass., a handsome gilt edged 12mo. volume of 214 pages, entitled SIBYLLINE VERSES, or 'The mirror of Fate,' by Miss J. H. Woodman, author of the 'Language of the Genius.' This volume is calculated for instruction and amusement combined. It is a sort of 'fortune teller.' A table of numbers is given, corresponding to the pages of the book. Any number may be chosen from 1 to 103—the opposite even number will be the Lady's fortune—the odd number the Gentleman's. A few copies for sale at this office—price 75 cents.

We have also received from the same publisher, a neat 12mo. volume of 197 pages, entitled 'ELLEN, or forgive and forget.' By Schoolcraft Jones. We can give no better idea of the object and tendency of the moral tale contained in this book than by copying most of the author's preface. Here it is. 'I beg to advertise you, before you enter on its perusal, that the following tale is not a mere fiction. Substantially, it is the imperfect record of veritable scenes, events, and characters, of which I had personal knowledge in the days of my youth. It is true, they did not all occur—the events I mean—in the town where they are here represented as taking place; but none of them have been removed far enough from the place of their birth, to be, in any respect, strangers in the company in which they are now found. Such a person as Ellen did exist, and bore the character, and acted the part, which are ascribed to her. It was the noble example which she gave of the divine spirit of forgiveness, that induced me to attempt this little book. * * * * With the hope that it may inspire within you the heavenly spirit of forgiveness, and induce you to illustrate it more fully and constantly in your life, this little book is now submitted to you and to the world.'

For sale at this office—price 44 cents.

* Though I had 'long advocated the Temperance cause in the old Temperance ranks' and for many years before Washingtonians, by that name, were known in the Temperance ranks; yet it was always and mainly by the power of moral suasion that I sought to promote and advance the Temperance cause. Nor have I ever changed my ground on this subject; nor have I now any recollection of ever having said, written or published a syllable indicative of a wish to abandon moral suasion, or substitute coercion and legal force in room of it. THE LORD'S PRAYER.

VIII.

'AND FORGIVE US OUR DEBTS.'

Our sins, oh, God, are all before thee spread,
Mounting their blackened summit to the sky!
And each of all the human race is dead—
Dead to that love which should be ever nigh!
Father, we pray that thou wouldst put away
Our every trespass of thy holy law;
Remove each tendency to go astray,
And for all sin inspire a fearful awe;
As thou wilt punish us for every sin,
That we may wear the spotless robe of love;
So may we ever walk thy way within,
And urge our course to heavenly realms above;
'Forgive' the trespasses of all our race,
And fill our soul's with treasures of thy grace.

IX.

'AS WE FORGIVE OUR DEBTORS.'

There is an impulse living deep within,
Which prompts us to avenge the slightest wrong—
If in our eyes it wears the mark of sin—
Unless 'tis borne by truth and love along,
And made means of blessing to the vile,—
Unless it lose revenge in hope of gain
To the dark soul, from holiness exile,
Whose future pleasure shall succeed the pain;
Thy pleasure, God, is ever human joy,
Thy punishment designed for holy end;
And without any of earth's base alloy,
Thy frowns and smiles to the same purpose bend!
As we by others do, oh God, we pray
That thou by us wilt deal the self-same day.

X.

'AND LEAD US NOT INTO TEMPTATION.'

Oh, God, we pray that thou wouldst ever guide
Our feet aside from the dark Tempter's wiles,
And place them on the Rock of Truth, beside
The foot-prints of our Saviour! May thy smiles
Beam brightly o'er our journey to the land,
From whose dark 'bourn no traveller returns'
To tell us tales of the rapt angel band,
Within whose bosoms the pure flame e'er burns
Of love and truth, by God's own bounty given!
There, in that upper sphere, the Tempter's art
Allures no soul from the high bliss of Heaven—
Plunges no dagger in each seraph heart!
Thither, oh God, freed from 'temptations' power,
May we ascend in the last fearful hour!

XI.

'BUT DELIVER US FROM EVIL.'

We can not pray, like thousands of our race,
That thou, oh God, wouldst not reward our good,
Nor punish our bad deeds; but by thy grace,
May all our duties be well understood;
And with the knowledge thou the practice give,
That we may imitate thy lowly Son,—
His life was given that we might learn to live,—
As Christ with God, may we with him be one.
Oh, save us from the evils we may do,
Not from awards of those already done!
Evermore prompt us to the just and true,
And Heaven in prospect is a Heaven won!
Father, from evil may our race be freed,
But justly punish every evil deed.

AN IMPORTANT QUERY.

CAN A THING BE DESTROYED, AND YET PRESERVE ITS IDENTITY IN THE SAME STATE AND MODE OF EXISTENCE?

I shall take the negative of the question and proceed to state the reasons why. To destroy, is to kill, lay waste, destroy from off the earth. See Genesis xviii: 23, xix: 13. Psalms cx: 8, and many other Scriptures which prove that destroy, and death were used as synonymous terms. Having experienced the verity of the supreme Governor of the universe in a punctual fulfilment of all threatenings and promises made known to us in Holy Writ for thousands of years past; it is exceedingly strange that so much infidelity and unbelief should still hang, like an incubus, on the minds of so many professed Bible believers; and that, of certain passages of Scripture they are willing to allow the meaning anything else except what is plainly expressed. But the word of God is sure. Genesis 3, to the serpent God said, 'dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life.' To Adam God said, 'cursed is the ground for thy sake: in sorrow shalt thou eat* it all the days of thy life.' Under that sentence Adam has died: what reason then can be given that the serpent under a like sentence shall not die? Was not the manner of his destruction, and the certainty thereof, denounced at the same time? viz., that it should be by 'the seed of the woman,' (Christ,) who should bruise his head; which is inevitable death to a serpent. The foot of him who is almighty, will grind him to powder. That he (Christ) was commissioned and sent into the world to perform that very work of destruction upon the old serpent, which is called the devil, and satan, is unequivocally set forth in Heb. ii: 14, 15. 'For as much then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their life time subject to bondage.' Were those Christians, who were all their life time subject to bondage through fear of death? I trow not! Now the above passage of Scripture is so plain and positive, respecting the destruction of the devil, that I see no way to evade a belief of it only so far to become a Bible infidel, and say, I can not receive the passage as literal, or believe that it means as it reads; but rather admit the absurd, the inexplicable idea that a thing can be destroyed and yet preserve its identity in the same state and mode of existence forever!

Shall I adopt such absurdities and come into those measures for the sake of being honored as orthodox? God forbid! but rather let me bear the cross of Christ in a full belief of his Gospel. 'The Son of God was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil.' Will he do it? If death and sin (the works of the devil) are destroyed, what will be the materials of his kingdom? By the Supreme Lawgiver and Judge, the devil is charged with being a 'murderer from the beginning,' and is it not decreed by the same lawgiver, He that killeth any man shall surely be put to death?—Shall we have a law given to us, by which 'the sovereign himself doth not govern in his dominions? Shall we conclude that he looks with indifference upon this destroyer among his children? Not so! For the sentence of his (the devil's) death is already passed, and the decree has gone forth for the destruction of him and his works; and we have the word of God for its accomplishment. 1 Cor. xv: 26. 'The last enemy shall be destroyed, death.* This certainly implies that the devil was already destroyed, or should be previously, or death could not have been the last enemy.

After these Scriptures are fulfilled what further cause can there be for pain, sorrow, and crying? And what will be the materials of the devil's kingdom? 'The devil was a murderer from the beginning.' 'No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him.' Whence then shall he obtain that eternal life, or endless existence, which is contended for by those that can not well get along without him? How shall we evade the testimony contained in Heb. xii: 27. 'And this word, yet once more signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, and of things that are made, that those things which can not be shaken may remain.' Where is the bold advocate for this murdering devil, that will undertake to prove his kingdom and throne to be on so firm a foundation that the Almighty himself can neither shake or remove it? If it is shaken, it must be removed and pass away. But the ancient,

* Of is added by the translators.

* That and is added by the translators to thwart the doctrine of the restitution, or render the passage ambiguous.

the damning sin of unbelief still holds dominion over the children of men. The angels made known their errand in Sodom, that the Lord sent them to destroy that place; and Lot said to his sons-in-law, Up, get you out of this place; for the Lord will destroy this city. But he seemed to them as one that mocked. But the Lord destroyed the place according to his word. The prophets, and the Son of God himself, forewarned the Jews of their destruction and the destruction of their city and temple; but they believed them not, but obstinately adhered to their infidelity, until that destruction came upon them. The same spirit of infidelity still lowers upon the people. Things that are clearly set forth in Divine Revelation as any of the circumstances above mentioned are disbelieved and rejected; while those that do believe and advocate their fulfilment are looked upon as those that mock. But we, as a people, stagger not at the promises of God, but believe that sin, death and the devil, with his entire kingdom, shall, in due time, be destroyed and pass away; and that in the new creation there will be no new devil made, no new hell, neither will there be any more pain, sorrow, or crying.—So mote it be!

And now reverting to the question, I have come to a decided conclusion that, if a thing is destroyed, it can not preserve its identity in the same state and mode of existence—the thing is absurd and impossible. But if any thing that I have trespassed against his Satanic Majesty and desires to prove that the kingdom of sin, death and the devil, will be eternal, let him set forth his strong reasons to Smithport, Pa.

A DISCOURSE.

BY H. B. SOULE.

MATT. xix: 26.—But Jesus beheld them, and said unto them, With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible.

This language of the Great Teacher, was in reply to the doubt expressed by the disciples, respecting the possibility of salvation. These disciples had just witnessed the conversation between Jesus and the young man, who came and inquired what he should do to inherit eternal life. When told that, if he would be perfect, he must, in addition to the keeping of the commandments of Moses, sell all his worldly possessions, and distribute the proceeds among the poor, and then go and follow Christ—the narrative informs us that he went away sorrowful, because he had great possessions. As he departed, Jesus addressed his disciples:—‘Verily, I say unto you that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.’ This idea he then set forth under a strong oriental figure of speech, the better to impress it upon their memories:—‘And again I say unto you, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. When they heard this, they were exceedingly amazed,’ and exclaimed, ‘who then can be saved?’ To this doubt Jesus replied in the strong words of the text, ‘with man this is impossible; but with God all things are possible.’

This language, it will be particularly observed, was uttered concerning the moral omnipotence of Jehovah. His physical omnipotence is so apparent in the visible works of his hands, that it is universally accredited. No man who has ever turned the most transient contemplation to the material universe, can doubt that the power of its Maker is absolutely limitless. And after all, perhaps, a diviner philosophy will yet trace what we call the physical power of God, back to an origin that is strictly moral in its nature—and enable us to see, that it is but moral force applied to the government of matter. Such a view will clothe the very earth, of which some religionists speak so contemptuously, with a sanctity verging mightily on that of the profoundest religion. Nor will it serve a less holy purpose, in investing human life, and every thing connected with its temporal abode, with a moral significance, that will lead men, instead of despising, to appreciate them with due gratitude and thankfulness.

But if we turn to that which in the present state of men’s knowledge, is called God’s moral omnipotence, or that power with which he governs the moral universe—it is painful to the truly believing heart, to bear what equivocal language is applied to it, expressing, like that of the disciples, the serious doubts which shake men’s trust and confidence, and disturb the peace of their hearts. The form of faith which we cherish as the true Christian, especially that part of it which points to the complete salvation of the human family, meets with no obstacle in its progress more difficult, than this skepticism in men’s minds concerning the almightiness of God’s moral power. They doubt that its exercise will be entirely successful. God’s government in the material world, so far as it has come to be understood, seems to be complete; but they can not see the same exactness and completeness in the intellectual. Sin abounds; and of the dominion and malignity of wickedness, none but inspired pens can give adequate description; and falling back on their ignorance and shortsightedness, they declare, because they can not see how it will all ever be removed and all men made pure and holy, that they disbelieve such a result will, or possibly can, attend the administration of God’s moral power. The most charitable view we can take of this species of skepticism, makes it rest on human ignorance. It is doubting the efficiency of causes, because we are too shortsighted to discover, or too weak to comprehend, the processes through which they accomplish their results. If this course of procedure be admitted here, it establishes a rule which is applicable nowhere else—for every where else, faith, not doubt, is the first step by which the mind is led to the possession of knowledge and the revelation of mystery. If, indeed, we believed only what we knew or could account for—if we credited the existence only of what we entirely comprehended, we should believe very little—next to nothing; we should reduce the world to the worst form of infidelity, and the sources of human happiness to a bare microscopic point. Such a course is as unphilosophical as it is unreligious. We should believe all, in relation to God and his government, that does no violence to the highest sense we have of Moral Goodness, of Absolute Love.

‘With God all things are possible.’ This truth admitted with regard to the Moral Power of God, and we have a stand-point, from which, without distrust, to contemplate the most grateful of conceivable issues. All possible good—and all good is possible with God—is the sure inheritance of every creature of his care. We can not here believe too much. In the nature of things, the faith of the human soul can not attain to a vision keen enough to penetrate to a good beyond the reach of God’s Moral Efficiency. The conception of such a thing, is to circumscribe the Infinite. Nor is it a less derogation from the character of God, to suppose, as men do, that he will ever rest in imperfect results, in partial accomplishments of the designs of his Benevolence. That, it appears to us, is a most irreverent reproach—blasphemy. It represents him as sacrificing the claims of benevolence to the love of ease—a want of energy to fulfil the desires of his own nature; for if he be infinite, he possesses the power to answer, perfectly, every dictate of his own infinite benevolence; and what conceivable reason is there, save the love of ease, or the want of disposition to exercise his power, why he should consent to a sacrifice so ignoble in himself, and so awfully fatal to millions of his dependent children. But this reproach is too painful to the mind in which pure faith dwells, and we leave it to be considered by those who can look up into the shining heavens, and upon the golden pages of the book of life—and still be doubters.

Likewise is it with the Divine Justice, which, in human schemes, is so frequently and strikingly made to interfere with the operations of God’s Moral Power, and to prevent the attainment of a complete and satisfactory result—this is but another phase of this same skepticism in regard to God’s Moral Ability. Men think they can not see how God can be strictly just, and yet destroy all sin and transfigure every child of his creation into the splendor of heavenly beatitude,—and therefore they doubt the possibility of its accomplishment. Justice, in this view of it, is a species of brute vengeance, which, being tempered with no mercy, will be satisfied with nothing but a literal hell full of misery, to gloat on to all eternity. Surely, we have mistaken the Biblical record, if such an attribute belongs to the Father of our spirits. Besides, it implies that God has caused the existence of a condition of things, so full of irreconcilable antagonisms, that he cannot be both good and just to all his creatures, at the same time. Now contrary to all this, Justice appears to us to be that quality in the Divine Being, which consults the complete harmony between the glory of God and the intrinsic and highest interests of the human soul. And this of every soul; for infinite Justice can by no possibility, aim at any thing less than universality. So clearly does this appear to our mind, that, if we were to point to any single attribute in the Divine Nature, as the one on which we most strongly relied for the certain security of our eternal welfare, we should name the attribute of Justice. For is not the justice of a good God, an attribute of Goodness?—and is it not exercised for the sole purpose of securing good? Can it be exercised for any other purpose? Is it possible for the justice of an infinitely good Being to contemplate any other than a good end?—and, being infinite, must it not contemplate the highest good?—and is not the highest good, the good of the highest number?—and is not the highest number the whole number?

After all, we talk of Justice as though it was a distinct person in the councils of heaven, whereas it is only the dispensation of Love, maintaining truth and right in the moral universe. It is but one form of God’s moral action towards his children, and must be an absolute harmony with all his other actions—for God is one, and undivided, and changeless.

But it is still insisted, that men can not see how the complete redemption of the human family is to be effected, and therefore it is that they doubt the entire success of Christ’s mission. Man’s alleged incapacity to understand precisely how all moral beings are to be rendered spiritually pure and happy, is readily granted. But a little consideration will show both the want of philosophy and religious consistency, in an extreme application of this concession of our ignorance and weakness. Such application is made no where else but on this question, which, more than any or all others, addresses itself to all the higher sentiments of the soul.

Look at the air you breathe, and tell us, if you can, what it is. You say it oxygen and nitrogen; but what now are oxygen and nitrogen?—and what holds them together in a union of just such proportional parts? You answer that it is done by a chemical law; but you can not see that law, nor the mode of its operation. Experiment as you will, there is a mystery in the very air you breathe—a profound beyond the utmost reach of your thought. Then, too, when that air is inhaled into your lungs, can you tell how it is—by what mysterious analization, that the nitrogen is separated and exhaled, while the oxygen is taken up and carried through the system, imparting heat and color to the life-blood?

You see that granite there, towering up in its columnar beauty and strength—can you tell us how it was formed—by what invisible power its strange elements are held in such strong embrace? You answer by chemical affinity, and you answer well for aught we know; but do you once separate those particles and seek for those elements, and the secret charm that binds them is dissolved forever; no chemistry of yours can ever again unite them; the talked-of affinity has vanished, and those mysteriously bound particles are henceforth strangers.

And that mighty oak, with its thousand mouths hid beneath the earth, its green lungs basking in the broad sunshine and fluttering in the breeze,—how severely does it rebuke our ignorance. Silently, by night and by day, it pursues the laborious processes of a sturdy growth. Go, with thy boasted philosophy, my brother, and divine to us the mystery that lies wrapped up in the history of that forest-king. Can you reveal to us the power and wisdom, by which it selects and sucks up that food, only, which is convertible into the oaken sinew?—or how that food in the form of sap climbs up the minute pores, until it reaches the loftiest leaf; how it is there affected by the atmosphere; and how it again descends, and is laid along the trunk and limbs in that firm texture, which gives it strength to withstand the blasts of centuries—and, withal, to fit it as nothing else is fitted, for the vessel's huge ribs, that rides in triumph on the remotest sea? Alas, we know but little of God's ways, even in things commonest to our eyes.—Things there are, even in these allusions, which are beyond us,—to which our wisdom has not yet attained,—but to God they are intuitively known. How absurd it would be, here, to doubt the existence of efficient agencies, because we are too weak and ignorant to discover and reveal the mode of their operation. But here we all exercise the necessary faith, where, so far as we know, no happiness is specially involved. Shall we, then, rise from the physical to the moral, to become doubters,—and be skeptical on the greatest of all questions, only because we can not fathom the Almighty's wisdom, or trace the minutest operation of his power? It would better become us to confess with Paul:—'O the depths of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!'

But if we turn now to the moral world, the fact, at which we have briefly hinted, still stares us in the face. For, respecting those things in which man is immediately concerned, and which have engaged his thoughts most seriously in all ages, his ignorance is still quite profound. The question how and why evil has been admitted into the present world, is one, of which there has yet been found no general satisfactory solution. It is usually looked at as an individual, abstract, and entirely hateful thing, forming no part of a great original plan; but an accident that has unexpectedly fallen in, and sadly frustrates the working of the divine economy. To all appearance, and by itself considered, sin is a positive evil; and to those who are its subjects it is certainly no light thing. But sin is only one form of evil, of which there are many. For man to completely understand why evil, as a whole, has been permitted to make so large a portion of the history of the human race, is beyond doubt impossible; but it were irreverent to make the same inference in relation to God, with whom all things are possible. For aught we know—and so we certainly believe—evil may be a purifier, and have a mighty and beneficent mission to perform in the spiritual discipline of the world. At most, it can not be absolute; for a righteous God would have admitted no such terrible element in his economy. It must therefore be relative; and if relative, then finite; and if finite, then limited. Indeed, in philosophic strictness, evil can not be absolute, unless God be evil; for there can be no moral absolute which does directly spring from his nature. But God is good. He understands why that which we call evil is here, what great office it shall perform, and how and when it shall end. Of this much we are certain. And hence, though in our present state, we can not see the exact process through which it shall be removed, yet our high Christian faith comforts us with the assurance, that all sin shall be finished,—all transgression be ended,—all evil done away,—that, indeed, there shall be no more pain, nor sorrowing, nor tears, nor death,—for these former things shall pass away, and God, in the effulgence of his love, be all and in all.

But once more, and to come to what relates more directly to our moral experience, we know that there is such a thing within us as conscience, and that it performs there a wonderful office. It has been with us from our earliest years, and we have had to do with it daily, and often right earnestly. A mighty and sacred power it is; we have heard it, and felt it, and rejoiced because of it, aye, and grieved too. But after all our thought, and study, communion with it, who can tell what coun-science is—how it takes cognizance of deeds—how it knows the right and the wrong—by what process it approves, or condemns, or executes its judgments,—now filling the soul with the pang of hell,—now thrilling it with the ecstasies of heaven? Man has yet no knowledge competent to the solution of questions like these, though they relate to something of which he has daily experience; he only knows that there is an invisible power within him, performing, in its own mysterious way, these great offices. If, then, he can not certainly know, fully understand, that of which he has the most constant experience, and which he carries along with him—what folly is it, to doubt the accomplishment of the highest good, simply because he is too weak to fathom the counsels through which it is to be effected!

But let us go one step further. It is objected to universal salvation, that men can not see—can not understand, how it is possible with God to perfect it. This is the ground assumed—for it is said, if they could see how it is possible for God consistently to save every man, none would more rejoice than they, to believe a doctrine which contemplates so glorious a result. They can not see how all men can be saved;—can they, on the other hand, see how one soul is to be saved? Is not the salvation of one, in reality, as incomprehensible as the salvation of all? Can they see how the divine life is begotten in the soul?—how it works there, and precisely what it does? Can they tell what are the actual occurrences in the article of death—what experiences are visited upon the soul in that hour of trial and triumph? Can they see all, through which they shall pass, before they shall reach their salvation and home in heaven?—and how God's power shall change them into the likeness of angels, and make them his children in love and obedience forever? Oh, no; they know no more of these things than do you and I; their faith and little experience are all they can boast. Why, then, do they doubt, for surely the power which saves one soul can save all; since all souls are his and he knoweth them altogether? To some minds it may sound strange, but we venture the assertion, that any argument which will clearly prove the ultimate salvation of one soul, will also, and just as clearly, prove the salvation of every soul. He who establishes a principle that will save one soul, establishes, in that act, a principle, which, carried out in its application, will just as certainly save all souls; for they all possess the same nature, and must be saved by the same means. There is, infallibly, a moral defect in every principle, which, in its practical result, effects the redemption of only a portion of the children of the same heavenly Father. So that the man, who doubts the salvation of all, because he can not see how it is to be effected, to be consistent, should also doubt the salvation of every man,—since, when you get to the bottom of the thing, he can not, in precisely the same sense, see how any man is to be saved. But this he does not do; he trusts God for his own salvation, though he can not tell how it is to be effected; and believes that when it is done, it will be well done. Would that he were consistent, and extended his faith and trust until he saw in the saving power a moral omnipotence, in whose hand all interests are secure, and all issues shall be glorious. Then would his joy be full. It is a high privilege to believe and feel as did Christ, that 'with God all things are possible.' May we ever keep this faith, and joyfully live in it, and at last triumph in it, with the same victory over death that crowned the Lord of life and glory. * * *

NOTE.—The above hastily written discourse, somewhat upon the reductio ad absurdum principle, was suggested while listening to a sermon, the burden of which was—'That it is unreasonable and absurd to believe in the salvation of all men, because we can not see how it is possible for God to effect it, consistently with his nature.' This, verbatim, was the leading proposition, Br. J. H. Sanford has received and accepted an invitation to settle in Detroit, where he will commence his ministerial labors on the last Sunday in March inst., and wishes thereafter to be addressed accordingly.

GOOD NEWS FROM AFAR.

The New York Christian Messenger contains the following very interesting letter, making known the important fact that Universalism has faithful believers and advocates in the far-off land of New South Wales.—[Star in the West.

'Br. Price—Good tidings coming from afar are enhanced, on the principle that 'distance lends enchantment to the view.' Laboring, as we are, in a work that embraces the whole field of humanity, to hear of the progress of that work from a distant land of darkness, comes like a ray of light over the gloom of ages. There is something natural in the human mind so much in accordance with the elements of God's eternal truth, that we often hear tidings of that truth coming up from regions that sat in the shadow of moral darkness and death. Go where you will, and there the human mind seems to be gasping for light, though the pall of ignorance and superstition may seem to hang heavily around.

Recent intelligence from New Holland is suggestive of these remarks. My informant is Mr. John Chubbuck, now a resident of Lockport, but recently returned from the Islands of New Holland and Zealand, where he resided for several years as a state and missionary printer. Mr. C. is a member of the Baptist church, although a recent convert to Universalism.

During his residence at Sidney or Port Jackson, in New Holland, he became an attendant upon the Baptist church, under the pastorate of Rev. J. Saunders, an Englishman by birth, educated at Oxford. He is represented as a man of unusual talents and attainments, being the greatest orator and scholar, and commanding the most popular audience in the city of Sidney. At his own expense, after his arrival at New Holland, he built a fine meeting house, established a school of arts, gave lectures himself, and opened a free library for the general benefit, and formed an institution for the defence and education of the poor.—The influence he exerted was wide and beneficent, and his unbounded liberality and benevolence elicited universal confidence, respect and admiration.

The wife of Mr. Saunders is described as a lady of superior excellence, and possessing a mind entirely congenial with that of Mr. S. himself. Charity seem the whole object of her being, and much of her time is spent in visiting, relieving and condoling with the sick, the poor and the unfortunate. Her mission is like an angel of mercy on that hard and benighted isle, dispensing glad news and welcome blessings. She has endeared herself to all who know her for heavenly charities, and is respected for her intelligence.

Mr. Saunders had been laboring as a Baptist minister in Sidney about ten years up to 1842. But his preaching was of a character too exalted ever to admit of the too common topics of wrath, and hell, and endless damnation. He usually dwelt upon the sublimer views of the divine government, and savored much of Universalism, until his mind at last became intently fixed upon a closer examination of the subject. The result of his labors was an entire renunciation of the doctrine of endless misery, and a cordial embracement of the doctrine of impartial benevolence. This was sometime in the year 1842. He gave no notice of his recantation, but having fully matured the subject in his own mind, prepared a discourse to be delivered on a Sunday afternoon. In the morning he preached from the text, 'God is love,' and carried the hearts and minds of his audience out into the illimitable ocean of divine beneficence, as if to prepare them for the glorious intelligence he was about to communicate.

The afternoon came, and he took for his text, 'Not willing that any should perish,' &c. He opened the theme in a most impressive style, and as he launched out, the fire of his eloquence warmed up and thrilled upon the hearts of his hearers. He bore them along with irresistible evidence, and riveted their attention with deep interest. He preached as long as he was able to speak and stand, over four hours, and with that holy enthusiasm which kept his auditors in perpetual intensity.—The effect of his renunciation, after the first pause of interest was over, was electric. Most of his church and congregation had been so unconsciously led along by his usual labors that they readily united with him in the new public position he had assumed.

But how was Universalism received by the New Hollanders generally? No one need be told of the character almost necessarily existing among the masses of that people, associated as they are with banished convicts. But was such a soil congenial to the sentiments newly advocated by Mr. Saunders? No. A general assault was almost immediately made. Alas! Orthodoxy is the same the world over. Protestants, Catholics, natives, convicts and all united in caricaturing. The intelligence reaching England, Mr. S. was excommunicated by the English Baptist church, and was compelled to give up his gown. But the best part of his people adhered to him, and maintained an independent church. Yet the moral character of Mr. S., and all that he had done for his fellow citizens did not spare him from the darkest calumnies and the grossest misrepresentations. His sentiments were so foully distorted, that he was at last compelled to publish his discourse in his own defence. This produced a calm of clamorous uproar, and no answer was attempted. Some of the clergy were eager for controversy and sanguine of their ability to silence Mr. S. But he met them coolly, in the spirit of his Master, and they were ready to abandon the field of argument and evidence after the first trial, until comparative peace was restored and the new 'sect every where spoken against' was permitted to go on in harmony.

Coming as this intelligence does, from the remotest corners of the earth, well may we receive it as the dawning of a better era, when the Gospel shall go forth as the light of the morning, and the distant islands of the sea shall wait for the law of God.

Harpers Publications.

No. 52 of their splendid ILLUMINATED BIBLE, is published. It contains the remaining chapters of Revelation, and consequently finishes the text. It also contains an alphabetical table of the proper names in the Old and New Testament with the meaning in their original languages,—five tables, weights and coins, measure of liquids, of dry articles, of length and time!—A chronological index to the Holy Bible as far as the letter M. One or two more numbers finish this magnificent book. 25 cents, at Beesley's.

No. 77 of the Library of Select Novels, is the CHEVALIER D'HARMENTAL from the French of Dumas. 25 cents, at Beesley's.

The same publishers are preparing to issue in numbers at 25 cents, a pictorial history of England, to contain about 1200 engravings.

REMARKABLE CRIMINAL TRIALS, is a record of the crimes, conviction and trials of many and various murderers, thieves, etc. It is a translation from the German of Anselm Ritter Von Feuerbach, by Lady Duff Gordon. It is a volume of some 339 12mo. pages neatly bound in cloth. The expediency and moral tendency of a general diffusion of such records of crime as are contained in this and other similar works, is somewhat questionable in this enlightened age. We have serious fears that their perusal would not better the morals of that portion of community which takes most delight in reading them. In our view there are quite enough of such records in the newspapers of the day.

The April No. (10) of the FARMER'S LIBRARY is issued. Thar's principles of agriculture (continued) occupy a portion of this number. The reproduction of animal and vegetable substances, vegetable reproductions, the harvest, and wheat are subjects treated upon. The portion devoted to the Monthly Journal of Agriculture, treats of a multiplicity of useful subjects relating to the science of farming, and among others is a treatise on Milch Cows, of various breeds, classified and illustrated with engravings. We learn that this excellent work is rapidly increasing in circulation, as it richly deserves to do. It may be had of G. N. Beesley, this city, or at the publishers, Greeley and McElrath, N. Y. $5.60 per annum.

We observe by a late number of the N. Y. SATURDAY EMPORIUM, that a change has recently been made in the proprietorship of that paper. It is now in the hands of Mr. Henry D. A. Ward, who will continue its publication as usual.

The Emporium is one of the largest and best weeklies in the Union. It always contains something interesting and acceptable for any and every class of readers. Literary, religious, political, agricultural, miscellaneous and amusing news is weekly served up to its patrons in great plenty and good style. About the only fault we find is that the paper is so large it takes too much time to read it. Almost 'too much of a good thing.' So cheap too, only $2.00 a year in advance. Address Ward & Co., 30 Ann street, N. Y. G. N. Beesley, this city, is also agent.

Br. Price—Send Messenger to Mr. Clement, and Mr. Huntington, 1 copy each, (Stage Hotel) Brantford, Canada West, and 1 copy to Mr. Barnes, London, C. W. Credit each $2.00 and charge A. W.

ELDER HOLMES.—We see this Methodist Elder is out upon us in the 'Northern Christian Advocate,' published at Auburn for the notice that has been taken in our columns of his 'House upon the Sand.' We shall endeavor to attend to him shortly. An uncommon press of business matters has prevented our doing so this week.

Albert J. Tirrell the supposed murderer of Maria Bickford has been acquitted, on the ground of somnambulism and the want of legal evidence that he was the murderer.

DEATHS.

Of cancer, at Clinton, March 20th, Mrs. RACHEL SMITH, aged 79 years, mother of Rev. S. R. Smith.

In Oriskany Falls, on the 6th of March, ANN MARIA, only child of Geo. Fowler, Esq. This was one of those events which serve to excite the sympathies, and to awaken painful emotions in the minds of those, who were acquainted with the little favorite, thus early taken from them. The deceased was left alone in the room occupied by her family. During the absence of her mother her clothes took fire; and notwithstanding the fire was extinguished in a few moments after it commenced its work, and every remedy known to the attending physician was applied, yet all efforts to save her were ineffectual. The destroyer had accomplished its work.

'O blest departed one,

Where all of life, a rosy day,
Blushed into dawn, then passed away.'

To the parents we tender our prayerful sympathies, and desire that they may still confide in that good Being, who, while he darkens the present, gives us bright visions of the future. They have seen their only bud checked in its expanding, 'and miss its beauty and sweetness in their home'—but may the pangs of bereavement be greatly softened by the reflection, that their loved one, has gone home to enjoy the presence of that God around whose throne we shall

The funeral was attended on the 8th of March by a very large concourse of relatives and friends, at the Presbyterians church, and a discourse appropriate to the occasion was delivered by Rev. Mr. Morey, assisted in the services by Rev. Mr. Fields.

In Schenectady, March 21st, Mr. AARON B. QUACKENBUSH, in the 47th year of his age. Some two years ago, that fell destroyer, consumption, marked him for his prey; and from that time he had been feeble, yet until quite recently had been able to attend to his business most of the time. In this dispensation of a wise and good Providence a wife and three little children are called to mourn the departure of a devoted husband and a fond and affectionate father. But they mourn not as those who have no hope.—May the Father impart his grace to them which shall be sufficient for them in this and all trials that shall fall to their lot in their mortal pilgrimage.

Br. Q. was an honest man and a sincere Christian. He lived in the power and spirit of universal good will, and died in the triumphs of that faith which teaches a happy immortality for all mankind. His funeral was attended by a very numerous congregation in the Universalist church in Schenectady, the 22d, and in accordance with his request a discourse was delivered by the writer. J. A. A.

At Little Falls, on the 27th ult. of fungus haematodes, Mr. MILO WIER, formerly from Connecticut, aged 35 years.—Mr. W. suffered severely by his complaint and finally had his leg amputated in the vain hope of saving life; but died a few hours after the painful operation was performed. He left an afflicted widow in feeble health with four young children to mourn their great bereavement. Though they deeply mourn, they mourn not without hope, trusting like their deceased husband and father, 'in the living God who is the Saviour of all men,' and joyfully anticipating a happy reunion hereafter with all the loved and lost of Adam's race. In Mexico, Feb. 13, ABSTIN, son of Reuben P. and Lydia Savage, in the 3d year of his age. Funeral attended the 15th by the writer. May the consolations of the Gospel be realized by the afflicted, that they mourn not as those who have no hope. J. S. KIBBE.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

XII.

'FOR THINE IS THE KINGDOM.'

Thou hast no partner in the heavenly fold,
To wield a portion of thy lawful realm;
Nor as was taught by heathen Seer of old,
Does there another hold with thee the helm;
Evil by man's own wickedness abounds,
Not by the fiat of an evil God;
And for the healing of its deathful wounds,
God's own exalted goodness bears the rod;
Christ's 'other sheep' shall in due time be brought,
To hear the 'voice' of God's anointed Son;
Then shall return the last that long were sought,
And in 'one fold' be governed but by 'one'!
'The kingdom,' Lord, is 'thine' forevermore,
Oh, may we love, and worship, and adore!

XIII.

'AND THE POWER.'

Thy might is visible, oh God, where'er
The human eye can reach, or thought can soar,
From the minutest atom to the sphere
That moves along magnificently o'er!
Through all the starry throng that stud the sky,
In every leaflet on earth's wide domain,
On every zephyr gaily floating by,
Voices to voices loud thy 'power' proclaim!
The soul notes down this lesson taught without,
And its own depths prove strength more strong within;
The soul sends back the echo of the shout,
Knowing no worlds without God's 'power' had been;
Creation's voices join the echo round,
Ocean and earth and skies repeat the sound!

XIV.

'AND THE GLORY.'

'Thy glory,' Father, all belongs to thee,
Designer, Architect, and Lord of all!
Thy wisdom planned, thy power caused to be,
Thy love is visible in great and small!
In the broad earth in all creation's bound,
Thy 'glory' shining forth we clearly see,
Thy 'glory' is reflected all around!
Hear, oh, ye heavens! and give ear, oh, earth!
'Glory' to God belongeth evermore!
He startled chaos, and from nought came forth
Suns, moons and stars, and all that creep or soar!
'Glory' forever! 'glory' to the Lord!
The world sprang into being at thy word!

XV.

'FOR EVER.'

Past, present, future, all are known to thee,
Who wast, who art, and ever shalt endure!
Oh, may earth's children all be taught to see
In thee the Owner of their souls' tenure!
Far in the regions of the mighty Past,
Thou, Father, wert the only living One;
Thyself determined chaos should not last,
Thou spak'st, and as quickly 'it was done'!
Now to the Future turns our searching thought,
For thou alone art self-existent still;
And without thee the Universe were nought,
Thou only 'all in all' shalt ever fill!
'Forever,' Lord, thy kingdom shalt endure,
Thy during nature makes it doubly sure!

XVI.

'AMEN.'

Ye heavens, send down the joyous shout to earth!
Earth, with your legion voices peal it back!
God ever reigneth! In him worlds had birth!
And of his Truth and Love there is no lack!
Skout ye aloud unto your Father, God!
His Dwelling is the spirit's final Home!
His Goodness for the present holds the Rod,
That in the future all may to Him come!
To Christ, His image, ALL shall be subdued,
Whose mission, armed with God's undying Love,
Shall, like the leaven in the meal imbued,
Subdue, and guide to God and Heaven above!
Earth, to your knees, and shout the pealing strain!
And all ye hosts of Heaven, prolong—'AMEN'!!!

THE MISGUIDED DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. S. ELIZABETH GIBSON.

'Gold pays the worth of all things here;
But not of love—that gem 's too dear.'

CHAPTER I.

It was a Sabbath morning in August, calm and beautiful indeed. The deep blue sky was unobscured by cloud, save here and there a feathery one of the purest white, behind which the sun now and then peeped; but for a few moments, when after adding new glory to his hiding place, it again shone forth with increased brightness and splendor. The air was as balmy and fragrant, and the birds sang no less sweetly than in early May; and now that nothing might be wanting to soothe the mind into a perfect serenity, the church bell pealed out to tell that the hour for assembling at the 'house of God' had already come. From every street soon issued those obedient to its call; there a carriage moving forward at a measured pace; yonder a less stylish buggy, bringing no doubt worshippers as truly devoted; and here groups on foot; and all merging into the open common, proceeded quietly to the church which stood in its centre.

But there were circumstances of more than common interest, which served to call out the people of the little village of T—, upon this day of rest and worship; for already had the nuptial bans been published three successive Sabbaths, and now that the wished-for day had arrived, the curious, as well as the devout, were out to witness the ceremony. It was not long ere the carriage, containing the bridal party, arrived at the church door and its occupants alighted. She that was to be bride was easily distinguished, and such in appearance as not a few would envy. Tall and Venus-like in form and proportion; graceful and dignified in step and movement, none could look upon her without admiration. But to her features rather than these, the eye turned the second time, and there indeed was enchained. A high, well developed and smooth forehead, beautifully contrasting with dark arching eyebrows and raven hair; a clear and lively complexion, deepening to a blush on either cheek; lips of 'carnation hue,' curling as if in proud consciousness of superior beauty; and large dark eyes, speaking a far more than ordinary intelligence; all these, if united in the imagination of the reader as the features of one being, will form a correct picture of Alethea Morse, the proud as well as the beautiful.

She had scarcely alighted, when a young lady of amiable appearance, approached her, and taking a hand in each of her own, and while a tear glistened in her eye, said, what was intended for a whisper, but from the earnestness of her language was heard by others—

Oh! Alethea, my friend, have you duly considered?—remember?

She was interrupted by her friend in a manner impatient—'Yes, I have thought it over and over again, and I know I shall be happy—enough,' she added after a slight pause. At this time the bell ceased its tones, and Alethea was hurried away into the church; but oh! how strange a sight. She, the belle and the beauty; the youthful and the admired; was supported by a frail and tottering old man, and he, soon to become her husband; he, who, to illustrate the fable of the mingling of the arrows of Death and Cupid, was aimed at by the former, but pierced by an arrow sped by the latter, had wooed and won her and was now to make her his wife by publishing his vows, in company with hers, before the world. And not less strangely in contrast, felt the sound of the fairy-like tread of the youthful one, with the heavy falling steps of the man of sixty. Young wives heard and saw the contrast, and moving still nearer their husbands, whispered—'how can she marry him?' Older couples looked upon them and then on each other, and wondered how they could equally bear the trials before them; but when they reached the altar and the bonnet of Alethea was laid aside, many there were who turned away and brushed the tear stealing from the eye. Alas! how many bow before the hymeneal altar, between whom there is no sympathy; no congeniality of feeling, and no real and true affection; and how much of the misery of this world arises from this same cause.

He who was commissioned to receive their vows, bowed and petitioned Heaven in their behalf. At first his voice was low and tremulous, but as he proceeded, earnestness strengthened it, till it seemed that in his fervency he had forgotten that mortals listened, so near to the foot of the throne had he brought those for whom he prayed. He betought that she, the youthful one, might be made to know the multiplied duties that were about to devolve upon her, and urged on to the performance of the same, if not by a youthful love, at least by a holy esteem, aided by a remembrance of the solemn oaths she was about to take, and that her heart might be brought to bear patiently the trials before her, and that she might subdue those yearnings for sympathy which youth can never realize from age; and that he, the husband, might be enabled to look with an indulgent eye on the hilarity and buoyancy of youthful years, and in remembrance of the great sacrifice she had made, endeavor to reward her with kindness and tenderness, though he might not in return receive that whole hearted devotedness which a husband had a right to claim, and which a wife should have a pleasure to yield, and finally he commended both to the especial care and protection of that Almighty One who alone could keep them in the way of peace.

When he closed, every eye was turned upon Alethea, but the flush had fled from her cheek and the paleness of death was upon her trembling lip. With seeming listlessness she suffered her hand to be placed within that of her affianced husband's, and the ceremony proceeded.—To the question first addressed to him, a quick and ready response was returned; but when the clergyman turned to her, pale and trembling as she was, how harshly sounded the words:—'Do you take this man who holds your hand within his own, to be your lawfully wedded husband: to be to him a faithful, an affectionate, and a devoted wife; to honor him and to love him in all seasons, in sickness as well as in health, in adversity as well as in prosperity, and to be to him a kind and loving companion until death shall sever the bonds of your union?'

A strong, convulsive shudder, together with a long and and dreadful silence, was the only reply. Again was the question repeated, and again a shudder passed over her frame, but unlike the former; for it was now the struggling of pride to overcome the emotions of the heart and convictions of reason, and then in a voice of studied firmness she answered—'I do.' They were pronounced 'husband and wife,' and again was Heaven supplicated with more than ordinary earnestness, for blessings and benedictions to rest upon them.

The bride was conducted to the richly cushioned pew of her husband, but she heard but very little of the remaining services of the day; and glad indeed was she, when she found herself once more seated in the carriage, and permitted to breathe the pure open air, and to look upon nature's lovely landscape, without feeling that that too returned her look with a pitying gaze or an impertinent stare. The carriage left the church by a way opposite to that which it had approached, and reaching the outskirts of the village, drew up before a dwelling erected in a style, the most fashionable, but of a date of twenty years prior to the present; though in appearance, it was the abode of the most rich and luxuriance abundance. In front were large square pillars ornamented with polished stucco, and wreathed with honey-suckle and jasmine.—High arched windows, guarded by heavy blinds which had scarcely been parted for many years, but which were now swung open, displaying rich sets of curtains; a spacious yard in which were ranged various kinds of shrubbery overshadowed by trees of heavy foliage, and all parted by tastefully arranged walks.

This was the abode of Chauncey Gardner, and as the eye of his bride rested upon it, she was informed that henceforth she was to be the undisputed mistress of it all—though perhaps it might have been the twentieth time the same tale had been told her. The color again returned to her cheek; the lustre to her eye; and the animation to her countenance, and she thought once more that she should be 'happy enough.' Alas! misguided one. She deemed not that though a stately mansion, and as she supposed, all that wealth could purchase, was not only the price of her name, but also of her peace. She deemed not that though an abundance of gold, and it might be all the elegance of wealth, was hers, yet without an union of heart in this indissoluble relation, there could be no happiness! No; and little heeded she the voice within, which might have whispered her this much, but on she passed, recklessly, until experience in a stern voice proclaimed to her the certain truth, and then, alas! she could not retrace her steps, or by repentance avoid the consequences of what was already done. Would that she were the only one that has thus erred; or would that her example might proclaim to all those thus misguided, as in a voice that could not be interpreted or misunderstood, that wealth availeth nothing in the purchase of happiness where congeniality of soul, and disinterestedness of affection, are wanting.

UTICA, FRIDAY, APRIL 10, 1846.

THE MURDER NEAR AUBURN.

Most of the readers of this paper have undoubtedly ere this, perused the heart-rending details of the horrid butchery of the Van's nest family near Auburn, on the evening of the 12th ult. The annals of crime will scarcely present a parallel to this case, in cold blooded atrocity, and heartless depravity. A father and mother, with their innocent babe, and an aged grandmother, all indiscriminately slaughtered in the most savage manner, and a young man, dangerously wounded. The soul sickens at a deed, so full of cruelty and blood—so wholly in opposition to all the higher and purer instincts of human nature. The murderer, is a colored man named Wm. Freeman. Ignorant, degraded and imbruted to the last degree, his bloody tragedy seemed more the act of a wild beast, than an intelligent being. No satisfactory motive for such a deed can be obtained from him. He was a stranger to the family—says he did not even know their names! Indeed the whole transaction,—his objects in the terrific butchery,—the indiscriminate slaughter—and the time, and circumstances, and manner—all are unaccountable on any of those rules and principles by which human conduct is usually explained.

The blood-stained murderer fled precipitately from the scene of carnage. But he could not annul the word of God—'though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished.' He was speedily pursued—overtaken and apprehended the next day—and the day following was brought to Auburn, and incarcerated in prison, where he now awaits the action of the offended laws of the land. Miserable wretch!—how awful his crime!—how awful his condition!—how awful the thoughts that must now prey like vipers on his heart! Who would not much rather prefer to sleep in the grave of his murdered victims, than to occupy his place in the felon's cell?

This atrocious deed sent a thrill of alarm throughout the surrounding community. People were horrified—filled with unutterable feelings of terror and amazement, that an act so ferocious and heartless, could have been committed in their midst! Indignation and abhorrence justly filled all hearts. No one could palliate the act—no one could or would speak but in terms of utter condemnation of the carnage and its brutal perpetrator. But alas! these proper feelings could not be restrained in a certain class of minds, but were allowed to degenerate into a cruel spirit of Revenge against the murderer.

When Freeman was brought back after his arrest, a mob, full of fury and vengeance, determined to take the law into their own hands, and, in violation of all the injunctions of Christianity, the safe-guards of society, and the common emotions of humanity, sacrifice him on the bloody altar of 'Retaliation.' 'Quarter him'—'hang him'—'no, hanging is too good—tear him limb from limb'—'roast him alive'—shouted the excited multitude! A rope was procured, and every preparation was made to carry their savage feelings into execution, and Lynch the miserable murderer on the spot! They did not stop to reflect—indeed, they were utterly incapable of reflection in their fury—that they were about to do a deed which would cover them and this community with infamy—that they were about to trample under foot all the restraints of just and salutary laws, and violate all their pretensions to civilization, Christianity and common decency. A raging thirst for blood!—blood!—blood!!! seemed to devour, for the time being, every pure and elevated sentiment in their hearts. As I contemplated with a pallid countenance, and an aching heart, the surging waves of that wild mob, I could not avoid again and again asking myself and others around me—'where are we—in the midst of the savage tribes who roam in the wilds of the Rocky Mountains, and who are about to sacrifice some captured enemy to their brutal ferocity, or in christianized and civilized Auburn?' The complexion, the dress, the names of the actors, would lead me to adopt the latter conclusion, while their spirit, their vengeful threats, and their deeds, urged me to acquiesce in the former! Happily, for the integrity of our laws; for the peace and safety of society, for the reputation of Auburn, for the character of the rioters themselves, these vengeful attempts were firmly resisted by the officers of the law, for which they are deserving the highest praise. And by resorting at last to a kind of ruse de guerre, they succeeded in lodging their panic stricken prisoner safely in jail.

Who took the most active part in this mob?—who may be considered the getters up and ring-leaders of this attempt to put Lynch law into force! Do you say, good reader, that it must have been reckless and hardened men, who had passed their days in a semi-barbarous community, who heard little of the Gospel and knew less of its spirit? You are mistaken. No; it was certain professors of religion! A resident of Auburn, who I am informed, is a member of one of the Presbyterian churches in this place, mounted some rostrum and addressing the excited mob, made a motion that the murderer be hung on the spot—(within a few feet of the house where the murder was committed, and where Freeman then was in the custody of the officers of justice)—and this inhuman and murderous resolution was seconded, I have been creditably informed, by an individual, who is the superintendent of one of the Evangelical Sabbath Schools in Auburn! What a spirit to be infused into the hearts of little children!! The motion was then put by the personage first alluded to—'Gentlemen—All who are in favor of hanging the negro on a tree forthwith, will hold up their hands!!!' Up, with the rapidity of lightning, went an hundred hands! But to the honor of decency and Christianity, the law robbed them of their victim.

If these professors and others who co-operated with them, or approbated them, had allowed the Christian spirit to be driven affrighted from their hearts by the black demon of Revenge—if they had made up their minds to violate the laws of the land and trample on the decencies of civilized society—could they not have some little regard for the credit of Christianity! In all their religious experience, had they ever heard of a book called 'The New Testament?' Had they not listened to some rumors, or obtained some hints from their spiritual instructors, that in the Gospel are laid down certain sublime and heavenly principles of love, forbearance and forgiveness—certain rules directing men what feelings to cherish toward the guilty—which are usually considered binding on professors of religion? Had they never, in their reading fallen on such passages as the following—'Ye have heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth; but I say unto you, that ye resist not evil.'—'Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy: But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: For he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.' 'Bless them which persecute you; bless, and curse not.' 'Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves; but rather give place unto wrath; for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him, [not hang him, forthwith, on a tree, by mob-law,] if he thirst, give him drink; [not tear him limb from limb,] for in so-doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil; but overcome evil with good.'—'Whosoever HATETH his brother, is a MURDERER; and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him.'

It is the duty of Christians to follow the examples of their Master and his apostles. Have these Lynching professors ever heard of the Saviour, or Peter, or John, or Paul, heading a mob, and proposing to violate the laws of the land, and murder any guilty wretch who had fallen into their power? Ah! how different were the lessons they taught—'Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers; for there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God.' Have these professors of religion, and others who cherish a like spirit, any remembrance of an exalted personage upon the earth—Jesus, the Son of God and 'the Saviour of the world?' Have they ever perused the history of his life—how he was contemned, despised, persecuted, arrested on false charges, insulted with a mock trial, and hurried away 'forthwith' to an ignominious, cruel and bloody death? Were not those Jews who hung him on the cross, and stained the brow of Calvary with his heart's precious blood, guilty of a deeper, blacker crime than even the wretched negro Freeman? And what was the spirit manifested towards the blood stained murderers, by their innocent victim,—not in a calm and collected moment—but while the blood was gushing from his side, and in the very midst of the agonies of the death they were so cruelly inflicting upon him? Did he cry out,—'Let these my murderers, be 'hung'—'quartered'—'roasted alive,' 'forthwith?' No—no—no!!! But with a voice full of Heaven's pity, he exclaimed, 'Father FORGIVE them, for they know not what they do!' Oh, when will Christians, come up to the spirit of their Master in their feelings for the guilty!

But alas! 'do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?' What better fruit can we expect from the erroneous and partial doctrines of the day, when their believers imbibe their spirit, and imitate strictly, and to the letter, their instructions! When men have been taught from infancy, that God acts on a principle of infinite RETALIATION—that for the evils of his erring children here have been guilty, he will hereafter, in return, pour out upon them a flood of endless evil—that he will retaliate upon them for their sins, with ceaseless rage and vengeance—what can we anticipate but that similar dark emotions will be cherished and encouraged in the hearts of those who have long been influenced by those errors, and that on sudden and trying occasions, of an exciting and irritating character, the passions of revenge and retaliation which had long been strengthening in their souls under these hardening influences, should break forth in vociferations for vengeance and blood!! I would not implicate the great body of the professors of religion of Auburn, in this dangerous attempt to overthrow the law, and to take vengeance into their own hands. Their hearts, I rejoice to believe, are vastly better than their creeds. Hence they very generally ranged themselves on the side of humanity and legal justice. But there was now and then one, whose soul was impregnated with the vengeful cruelty of his creed, and who was thus prepared not only to follow, but even to lead to deeds of blood, which would have violated every solitary principle of Christianity.

I regret to add that of the five or six papers published in Auburn, but one has yet, to my knowledge, dared to rebuke this anti-Christian, anti-law, attempt of the rioters! The only religious paper in this place, the Methodist Northern Christian Advocate, which, one would suppose would have some interest in diffusing the principles of the Gospel into the minds of the people, has not uttered a flap in opposition to this trampling under foot of all Christian principles! Indeed if we may judge of the feelings of those who control that paper, by the declaration of a Methodist clergyman of good standing, who witnessed the scene of the riot, there is reason to fear these savage attempts on the life of the wretched murderer, were too congenial with their own spirit, to receive a rebuke from them! And such men are lights and guides in the Methodist church!!!

The Editor of this Methodist paper, with others of like stamp, strive desperately to make capital out of this murder, against the efforts of those who would abolish Capital Punishment. He thinks nothing less will bring this class of reformers to their senses, than having the assassin's knife at their throats. Whether he thinks all who would do away with the death penalty ought to have 'the assassin's knife at their throats,' or that such will be the natural result of their efforts, he does not condescend to explain. If the former supposition would be at the expense of his claims to Christianity, the latter would as evidently call in question his common sense. For if those who strive to overthrow Capital Punishment, would confer so great a favor upon assassins as this Editor would have the public believe, why should they be eager to put their knives at their throats?

The logic by which it can be shown that a murder committed in the very face and in full defiance of the death penalty, showing its utter inutility in restraining from the most awful deeds, is an argument in favor of that penalty, and against those who would establish a more safe and salutary law, is of a character beyond the reach of my comprehension. To minds of common depth, this sanguinary event, affords a most overwhelming evidence that the punishment of death, possesses no power to deter the depraved from deeds of the darkest dye. True, an attempt has been seriously made in this Methodist paper, and other journals, to show that this murder is to be attributed to the circumstance, that the jury did not agree, in the case of Wyatt, who was tried for murder a few weeks since in Auburn. But all the arguments based on this foundation, and all the various homilies that have been preached from it, and all the changes which have been rung upon it, will come to nought, and leave their advocates prostrate, should it finally prove that this ignorant negro Freeman, knew nothing of Wyatt, and had heard nothing of his trial!! EVASIONS.

The Apostle, in his letters to the believers at Philippi, in speaking of our Saviour, declares that, 'God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father'; and we believe that it is admitted, that things in heaven, in earth, and under the earth, signifies every intelligent being, God alone excepted, of course. From this language of Paul an argument is drawn in favor of the final salvation of the whole human family, because when every knee shall have bowed to Christ and every tongue have confessed him Lord to the glory of God, then, as a matter of course, mankind will have been saved from all sin, purified from all iniquity, and have become in possession of holiness and consequent happiness.

To this view of the subject, those of a different faith have what they call an objection, yet it is no more or less than a mere evasion, put forth for the purpose of averting the force of the argument drawn from this Scripture in favor of the final salvation of the whole world. They declare the sense of the passage to be this—'That at the name of Jesus, every knee should bow'; i. e., it is the duty of every one to bow the knee to the name of the Saviour, and the duty of every one to confess him Lord; they should so confess, but they do not, nor bow the knee, and perhaps they never will; or at least we have but little reason to believe that the finally impenitent will ever do so, and bow the knee.

The reader readily observes the nature of this objection: it is made by changing the verb, should, from its positive value, to one of a doubtful meaning. This does violence to the passage; for it is a declaration of a positive nature, and is based upon conditions, and the point is coming on what conditions shall bow and every tongue confess, and not how and whether it they think proper to fulfil their duty, or not in doing so, and confessing if they do not think proper to do so, and drive. Why did God highly exalt our Saviour, and give him a name which is above every name? The very reason why this was done, was that every knee should bow, and every tongue confess him Lord, to the glory of God, and every knee will bow, and every tongue will confess him Lord, to the glory of God, and will do so, and drive. The Apostle, in his letter to the Romans, has exalted the Saviour in a name which is above every name, and the confession of every tongue, and every knee, for the purposes for the redemption of all mankind, and the glorification of the Father. This objection of our fellow Christian then, is an argument in favor of the final salvation of all mankind, drawn from this language of the apostle, is an objection leading to conclusions which he will not admit; and conclusions which are erroneous in cause inflicting us that some of the plans and purposes of the Almighty will never be accomplished, and therefore these conclusions show the objection to be based upon wrong premises, and the passage remains in all of its full and original force in favor of the doctrine of Universal Salvation.

Here we are met with a second objection. While it will be admitted, that the time will come when every knee will bow to the name of the Saviour and every tongue confess him Lord, yet it is said that this does not prove the final salvation or happiness of all, because the finally impenitent in the regions of everlasting despair will be made to bow the knee and confess, yet their sufferings would in no wise be mitigated thereby.

Such is the objection, and now for a brief review, and we trust it will be observed, to be without any real and substantial foundation. Let it be observed that this confession of the Saviour's name, made by the finally impenitent, is to be of a compulsory nature, and from this fact we think it would be far from being to the glory of God, because the confessor would not be actuated by any love or regard for the Supreme Being. Let us endeavor to illustrate the subject, by the use of a similitude:—

We will suppose that the parent has a son who has disobeyed the precepts and instructions given to him; been unmindful of morality and virtue; become disobedient and vicious. The parent calls him to an account and deals out the greatest severity at command; afflicts that son with punishment the most severe; bears on with a heavy hand, and indeed, employs his utmost powers in chastisement because of that evil and disobedient disposition of his offspring. While suffering that punishment the son acknowledges the authority of the parent, but he does it in the most abusive manner; curses his father to his very face, and employs language far from that which should spring from the virtuous and upright heart. But would this confession of the parent's authority, coming in such a manner and under such circumstances, be to the glory and praise of that parent? Far from it. It would morelike be to his shame, conclusively declaring that had he maintained a proper government over his son from the beginning, the passions of his offspring would not have become so strong as to outweigh the better judgment of the mind. So relative to the confession of the Saviour's name by the finally impenitent. While the sinner was writhing under the pains of anguish, while confessing the Saviour to be Lord, he would do it with blasphemy upon his lips and curses in his heart; and hence, that confession would be far from being to the glory and praise of God. The glory of God to be enhanced or shown forth by any thing, which, might transpire in an endless hell filled with imps and devils and damned spirits, is too foolish and absurd, to be for a moment entertained by a reasonable mind.

Again, Paul teaches us in his letter to the Corinthians, that no man can say that Jesus Christ is Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. But are the sinners, the finally impenitent, deep in the damnation of an endless hell, to be filled with the Holy Ghost, and by it bow the knee to Jesus, and confess that he is Lord? We think not, for the Holy Ghost is that comforting spirit of truth and inspiration, which the Saviour declared should descend upon the disciples after his ascension to the Father. That the sinners' minds are to be filled with it and thereby confess the Saviour's name, looks too much like a house divided against itself, and consequently, it must fall.

Thus the reader may see, that the objections which are urged against the obvious truth set forth in Paul's language to the Philippians, are without any solid and judicious foundations; that they are mere evasions to avoid the force of the apostle's reasoning and has been enabled to maintain and support creeds which are far from being based upon the principles of sound judgment and understanding. But in the end, truth must, and will triumph. We are certified that none can say that Jesus Christ is Lord but by the Holy Ghost; and that every tongue shall confess him Lord, and consequently the time cometh when all space shall be filled with that comforting Spirit, and rest in the enjoyment of peace and happiness never ending. Such is the decree of God, and such the work which will, and must be accomplished. S. J. G.

MR. HARTWELL'S REPLY.

It seems Rev. Mr. Hartwell has yet obtained quite notoriety enough to satisfy his ambition; so we will gratify him by inserting the following communication, to which we shall append a few notes by the way.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS ON J. HARTWELL'S REPLY TO D. S. MOREY.

MR. EDITOR: having just read your remarks on my reply to D. S. Morey, I would by your permission, say a few things through your paper.

As to the 'style' of my letter to Mr. M., I cheerfully acknowledge that it was unlike any thing I ever employed in writing to any other man; and such as I hope may never again be deserved at my hand. For I have neither taste nor ambition to gratify in the use of such a style.—But I supposed as did many others, that a letter of the character of mine was richly deserved on the part of Mr. M.; and that his letter to me was unkind, uncalled for, and undeserved. And if I do not greatly mistake, such is the opinion of the public generally, together with many of his own brethren.

I supposed that a better style, so far from answering any good purpose on him, would only excite his ridicule, and encourage him to repeat such attacks. Judging from his letter, I could not believe him capable of appreciating such a style as would have been demanded by almost any other occasion. I felt myself under the necessity of accommodating my style to the position of my opponent. This is my apology. (a) I shall be pleased however when I learn that Mr. M. is worthy of a better opinion than I have had reason to entertain of him. You will bear in mind that instead of making attacks on him, I only defend myself.

I would now, with all due respect, enquire whether in your opinion, it is consistent with the principles of honor, to publish, and make invidious comments on a private letter? I had received the opinion that such an act, was decidedly condemned by public sentiment as a violation of that confidence upon which all private correspondence is supposed to be conducted. I wrote that letter to you in the utmost confidence; not dreaming even that it would ever appear in public print. I was the more unsuspecting from the fact that a friend said to me, 'Mr. Skinner will treat you like a gentleman.' (b) I wrote the P. S. emphatically in haste, being in a store at the time, and just as the mail was coming in. As a consequence it seems that 3 letters were omitted; for so you have printed it. See the following: 'You friends he assure me that you will grant my request.' The letter is omitted on the first, and re on the third word. I will say nothing Mr. Editor of the dignity of this your act, but leave the subject entirely to your reflections. You will decide whether such treatment is fair, honorable, or such as you would like to receive. (c). It is certainly what I did not expect from such a source. I saw errors in Mr. M.'s letter, and referred them to a slip of the pen, or a mistake in the compositor. But how a gentleman of elevated sentiments can take advantage of a man's private letter, and publish it to his expense, is altogether remarkable. Had a young man pressed for matter, done this thing, it would not have excited so much surprise and.

(a) So then Mr. H. admits that his 'style' was bad—coarse, vulgar, undignified. And why? Because he supposed such to be the character of the person addressed! Well then, if a man has to deal with wild beasts, he must become a wild beast himself, must he!—Any thing else but wild beasts' play would not answer, but encourage renewed attacks! Verily, this is an important discovery. But we had supposed Mr. H.'s hand bill was designed for the public eye and edification, instead of Mr. Morey's. If intended for Mr. M. alone, why be at so much trouble and expense to publish it? He might have sent it to him as a private letter. If intended for the public, why not adopt a style that the public would call decent?

Saying nothing of editorial courtesies, I wish to enquire, how you can wrest parts from their context, and pretend at the same time to represent a production fairly? (e) I am placed before your readers by Mr. M. charged with a great want of courtesy;—as exceedingly 'selfish'—a 'pharisee,' 'hypocrite,' 'sinner'—'earthly, sensual, devilish,' etc., etc., etc. Knowing that many of your brethren will find no difficulty in believing every word of it to be true, and feeling myself wilfully misrepresented through your columns, I of course ask the use of said columns for a reply, and am denied. (f)

As though that was not enough, you take what you consider to be the most exceptionable parts of my reply, and publish them, and them only: say that you add the most opprobrious caricatures. But why publish those parts of my reply, on account of which you rejected all the rest? (g) Are these passages less offensive when

(b) In answer to this paragraph, we say, the letter was in reference to one published document and another about to be published—of course no private affair. Furthermore, Mr. H. did not mark the letter 'private,' nor 'confidential,' as he should have done had he desired it to be so considered. Again, the spirit and peremptory tone of the letter clearly show that it was no confidential letter; and no reader of it can doubt that could he have obtained any advantage over us, or made any capital for himself, he would at once have published both his letter and our answer.

(c) Why, what have we done? Simply followed copy. And how could we or our printers know whether there were any letters or words omitted or added? Had we added to, or omitted anything from the copy, he might have accused us of wilful misrepresentation. But of that he can not now accuse us.

(d) But why should Mr. H. be surprised at such treatment from Universalists, if the whole denomination is utterly destitute, as he would have the public believe, of courtesy, modesty and Christianity? Can he expect to 'gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles'?

(e) We have done no such thing. We quoted fairly what we did quote; and there is no 'wresting' about it. True, we did not quote the whole hand bill; but we did him no injustice.

(f) How, when and where denied? This charge is false. So far from being denied, Mr. H. was told his article, if properly written and not longer than Mr. Morey's should be inserted in the Magazine and Advocate, but he would not leave his MS. long enough for us to examine it to see whether it would come within those rules or conditions. After he had published it himself, (a much longer article than Mr. M.'s) it was needless for us to publish again, any farther than some extracts, and refer the public to his hand bill. And he could not reasonably ask us to copy, second hand, what he had refused to let us see before publication.

(g) We did not 'reject' any of his article; as above stated; for he never let us see it till he had published it himself. We then selected some specimens of it and advertised his production, so that our readers might know of it and read the whole for themselves. If the parts we selected were 'exceptionable' in the view of their author, why did he write and publish them? How could we know that they were exceptionable in his view?—We taken from their natural connection? If they constituted a sufficient reason for rejecting the whole article, why publish them at all? Do they tarnish your columns less taken alone? I told your publisher expressly to give my article entire, or none of it. (h)

You complain of the length of my reply, and then fill nearly three columns with a private correspondence, extracts taken from their connection, and your comments upon them. Do you generally in giving a fair specimen of a document, select only what you conceive to be its worst parts? Do you suppose that you have given your readers a correct idea of my reply to Mr. M. The principle facts and explanations which I gave in opposition to Mr. Morey's assertions are entirely concealed. Not one of the most important has appeared in your paper. (i)

I will not ask again whether you consider such a course to be fair or honorable; but only ask for these lines a place in your paper. Yours respectfully,

JOSEPH HARTWELL.

Stockbridge, March 30th, 1846.

P. S. The orthographical errors which appear in my private letter made public, do not exist in the copy which I kept. As you seem to be very deeply engaged in jobs and titles, you may find relief from your difficulties on the word 'Mantis,' by consulting one of our school books. See Comstock's Physiology, page 55-56 (k) supposed it most probable the parts we published were those on which he rid himself the most—that they were by him regarded as special points. He should have informed us and the public which parts he considered 'exceptionable,' and which ones 'praiseworthy'—which contained the most beauty, and which the most sublimity, so that we might have given our readers the very best part of it. But he says we have added 'the most opprobrious caricatures.' This is false. We have added no caricatures at all—he can not point out a single one. If he appears ridiculous it is from his own misperverted language fairly quoted. That any part of it appears to him like an 'opprobrious caricature' is evidence that he did not pause to examine and consider his language before he published it.

(h) Indeed! So we were bound by your instructions to the publisher! Verily, this is authoritative—equal to a new edict or bull from the Pope! We had hitherto supposed, in our ignorance, that what a man took pains and expense to publish to the world, was public property, or belonged to the public after publication—that any body had a right to use it, either in large or small doses, just as suited taste or convenience. But it seems our sapient author claims that the property is exclusively his after he has given it to the public; and that we had no right to give our readers a slice of his bread without compelling them to eat the whole loaf!

(i) To atone for any omissions, we now recommend to all our readers to procure and read, without delay, the whole of Rev. Joseph Hartwell's hand bill. It is too important a document to be omitted. We can not do it justice by any abstract we can give—its beauties, sublimities and glories transcend description. Read the whole of it—every word. There is no 'pride and swaggerish self-importance' about it, to use his own elegant diction.

(k) Eureka! eureka!! 'I have found it! I have found it!' as the enraptured philosopher exclaimed when his great problem was solved. So, here the great mystery is solved—the origin found of that most delectable and sublime phrase, 'whittle away mantice-like.' Comstock's Physiology explains mantis, (by the by, an entirely different word, of different termination and different genus from mantice or mantice-like, as used by the learned Mr. Hartwell,) to be 'a hemipterous or half-winged insect of very singular manners and habits, called the orator mantis, and sometimes the praying mantis,' &c. Shades of the departed literati and philosophers of the world! Ye Johnsons and Goldsmiths, ye Bacons and Lockes, ye Newtons and Shakespeares, and all the bright constellation in which ye moved when on earth! how would you hide your diminished heads if now permitted to step on the earth and listen to the learned lore of Mr. H.! How would your feeble lights be eclipsed and go entirely out were the bright coronations of this great luminary of the nineteenth century to fall upon and illumnate your minds! How utterly ashamed would ye be that ye had ever made any pretensions to science and learning! How would ye 'spring you a bit' and 'whittle away mantice-like' to obtain one ray of light, from the great Solomon of our age and country! Reader, procure and read Mr. Hartwell's hand bill without delay.

SALVATION BY FAITH.

Every where in the Gospel we are said to be saved by or through faith. 'By grace are ye saved through faith,' says an apostle. 'Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God.'—Through faith we are said to obtain the victory over the world—to inherit the promises—and to receive, at the end of it, the salvation of our souls.

When the woman came to Jesus and touched the hem of his garment, assured in her own heart that if she was permitted to do this she should be healed; he turned around and said to her, 'Daughter, be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole.' And so in several other instances, where individuals were miraculously healed of some infirmity or disease, their faith is said to heal them or make them whole.

But in what sense did faith do this? Plainly in this, that it brought the individuals to Christ, and led them to apply to him for relief. It was the faith—the strong confidence, that, in his father's house there was bread enough and to spare, that led back the prodigal son to the long-lost home of his boyhood. And it was faith that bowed the knee of the leper when he said, 'Lord, if thou wilt thou canst make me clean.' His faith saved him. And in the same sense the faith of the prodigal put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet, and clothed him with the best robe. So faith saves now. It brings the sinner to Jesus. It causes him to reach out his hand that he may touch the hem of his garment. It induces the cry of blind Bartemius, 'Have mercy, O Lord, thou son of David!' It leads us to a diligent use of the means of salvation, and brings the soul under the power of holy and sanctifying influences, and humbles its subject at the foot of the cross that he may find pardon and peace through the blood of Jesus Christ.

When the sinner has such faith in Christ—such confidence in his grace and mercy and his unbounded ability to save, as that he is brought by it to apply to him for relief, and for the removal of the leprosy of sin which makes the whole head sick and the whole heart faint, saying, 'Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean;' that moment will he be touched by the hand of a Saviour's power, and to his soul shall be uttered the life-giving—health-restoring words, 'I will; be thou clean.' MR. EDITOR—The following lines were written in remembrance of an event in my own history, which transpired in the 'joyous Spring-time' of the past year. If there is any thing meritorious in them, they are at your disposal.

TO THE DEPARTED.

Methinks I could have given thee up at any time but this,
Ere vernal beauties o'er the earth had spread her lovely ness;

It is not meet that one so fair, in girlhood's happy days,
When flowers are springing into bloom, should pass in vain away.

I could have borne, when Autumn gales were rudely by,
Thy loss far better; for it were more fitting time to die.

But there is a deathly loneliness that comes upon the soul,
That seals the soul in reveries, and pales my cheek and brow.

All buoyantly sprang every thought, unmingled with a pain,
As gentle Spring, her green robes threw o'er mountain, vale and plain;

And I joyed to think no hour would pass of happiness or care,
But thou with me, its willing toils would fondly, gladly share.

But the wild bird comes and sweetly sings upon the green-wood tree,
And vernal beauties round me spring, but ah! in vain for me!

The days long hours hang heavily: there is no voice nor tone
But seems to mock my loneliness, since I have missed thy own.

I strive to think it is not so, and thought from thee refrain;
And in my bosom's deepest cell would smother every pain;

But the mountain stream that from its bed awhile we teach to stray,
Will seek again its wonted course and murmur on its way.

It is but a sad mockery to try to smother woe,
And void the breast of memories and pangs we would not know;

To teach the forgetful heart the art of unbelief,
When every struggle but renews the wearying sense of grief.

There's nought in life's varying scenes, that falls so heavily
As death upon the heart's beloved, in Spring-time's joyous day!

When Autumn blasts sweep down the leaf from smitten branch and bough,
We know it is Death's season, then; not now, O, no! not now!

Oh! why shouldst thou, dark revealer, on gentle gales of Spring,
Commingle with its flowery breath, thy startling message bring?

When earth's glad voices on the air ring out in tones of glee,
We look for all things bright and fair, but not, O, Death! for thee.

PHYSICAL AND MORAL POWER.

The superiority of physical over moral power has, in all ages, found a willing belief in the minds of almost all men. Men have so uniformly acted in accordance with this belief—legislators have been so uniformly guided by it, that they have degraded and dishonored our moral nature. The history of the world, with few exceptions, is but the record of the splendid deeds and crowning victories of physical force. In perfect keeping with this belief, men have ascended from the creature to the Creator, and have discovered and acknowledged in him physical omnipotence, while they have denied, or failed to acknowledge his moral omnipotence. They have represented to themselves their God brandishing his thunderbolts, and threatening in his wrath to hurl them against his stubborn and sinful creatures. They place into his hands as weapons, and as proofs of his omnipotence, the lightning's rending, crushing velocity, earthquakes and volcanic eruptions, while, in humble imitation, they take into their own the rack, the gibbet, the dungeon and the rod. That God possesses physical omnipotence is true, and by it he governs the material world; but to deny that he possesses moral omnipotence is infinitely more degrading than to deny that man possesses moral power in however low degree, or to assert that all his courage is merely animal courage—that of the wild and ferocious beast.

Fortunately we have many examples of moral courage, and moral courage. Was it not moral courage that actuated the father of the nation to answer to his country's call, and to lead an army, and to defend the rights of his country? Was it not moral courage that actuated the brave and noble spirits of the Revolution? Was it not moral courage that actuated the brave and noble spirits of the Revolution? Was it not moral courage that actuated the brave and noble spirits of the Revolution?

Turn we then to the history of the world, and we find that the moral omnipotence of God is the only power that has constrained a persecutor to ask, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?'—or Agrippa to exclaim, 'Alas! what shall I do to be a Christian?' Was it this that caused Felix to tremble as he sat upon the judgment seat before his prisoner? Was it merely physical power that enabled a despised Nazarene and his twelve persecuted disciples to overcome, and subdue to the foot of the cross, the 'mistress of the world'? Can we not see, then, the superiority of moral over physical power? Physical power can do much. It may, as it has done, raze mountains, slaughter millions, desolate kingdoms and found empires; but it is moral power only that can overcome the mind, and change the deep, firm purpose of the soul. This moral power God possesses in an infinite degree; and because its operations are latent, silent and mysterious, its conquest and victory over all that is human are not the less decisive. For, what is able to withstand the moral power of God? Surely nothing that is finite. But human agency or human will, however free, is finite—limited in its powers. And accordingly the bubble on the ocean is as well able to bear on its convex expanse the lofty mountain or the ponderous globe, as the human will to bear up against the weight of God's moral power. How vain, then, how silly is the belief that man, poor, frail man, is able to maintain a successful rebellion against the power of God; yea, against the power of him without whose permission we can not draw a breath or lift a hand! And yet, the infernal world, if peopled at all, is peopled by such victorious rebels.

'The deepest waters move most silently; the hottest fires have the smallest flames, and the spheres that have the swiftest motion, move without noise.'

The perusal of the above, started a train of thought in my mind that has brought up some reflections, that may, perhaps, be to the reader, as they have been to me, pleasing and profitable; and as I wish to contribute my mite to the sum of human happiness, I am induced to write some of them, hoping they may not be wholly lost. The thoughts that occurred to my mind on reading in the Magazine and Advocate the sublime language alluded to, were these: How truthful the language! how beautiful its figurative character! how striking its application! and how important the lesson it contains! These leading ideas, very naturally led to the contemplation of the objects named; in the variety of aspects they assume—to dwell upon the nature of figures; bringing up numerous subjects to which they are applicable—to admire the simple grandeur with which instruction is given, by things that do exist; gazing with varied emotions upon nature's outspread volume, as seen in the waters and fires of earth—speaking wisdom in audible language—and in the silent music of the spheres, as they wheel their swift courses around their centre,

'Forever singing as they shine,
The hand that made us is divine.'

'The deepest waters move silently!' How true! and yet how often do the most shallow waters attract the most notice, simply because they make the most noise in the world!

Let a rivulet dance tumultuously along a rocky bed, and occasionally leap, in wanton sport, down a precipice, and all the wonder seeking observers of nature are attracted to its banks; and the little stream is immortalized by the pen of historian and poet; while the rocks and precipice, without which no ado could have been made, are allowed to rest in their lowly beds unthought of. But the broad river glides in silent majesty along its peaceful way, unsought and unsung. So, thought I, is it with human life. It is aptly called a stream; and a stream whose deepest waters move silently; and like the broad river, the deep waters of life attract less notice than the shallow; and for the same reason, they are not so noisy. Life too, has its rapids—its falls—its craggy steep and rocky shores, and at these we commonly hear the most noise made. In passing over them, individuals are wont to make the most ado—to express the greatest sense of being somebody. Indeed, I have presumed to think, that some who appear very prominent here, are entirely lost in the deep waters of the stream of life—they never being seen or heard there. No matter. Life is but a span; and whether carried up in the spray of the cataract, or down to the bottom of the mighty deep, man soon reaches the great reservoir—eternity.

'The hottest fires have the smallest flames.'—How evident this truth! How striking its application to man, in the manifestations of his passions and affections! Who does not know that the strongest passion—the warmest affection, often lays concealed at the bottom of the heart? rarely burning with a visible flame; but it is these fires of the soul that never go out—that ravage the whole being with rancorous hate or subdue it with resistless love; while the vehement exhibitions of feeling are short lived and evanescent.

'The spheres that have the swiftest motion move without noise.' So with minds. Those that are the most preferred—that fly on the wings of thought the farthest into infinite space, and most quickly discover the wisdom, power and goodness of God, in his vast works, move without noise—think without tumult and act without ostentation. So with the great mind of God himself. Every where present—yet no where seen—always moving swift as thought—but silently. Ever pouring out His unspeakable love; but without visible flames; consuming most, when least is seen. Happy are those who, moving silently in the deep waters of God's love, and cherishing an inward flame of devotion, are enabled to revolve in the universe of thought, in the immediate presence of the Most High.

A LETTER

FROM BR. A. G. LAURIE OF LONDON, CANADA WEST, TO ONE OF THE EDITORS OF THIS PAPER.

London, C. W. January 15th, 1846.

Dear Br. SMITH—If you think this worth inserting, you may send it to the Advocate. The request contained in it I should like to be complied with by those possessing the facts, not alone for the satisfaction of Br. Ebbs, but my own and that of one or two friends here.

A few weeks ago, I heard incidentally that a Mr. Ebbs, our Congregational minister here, was about to deliver to his congregation, for their warning and edification, a recital of the conversion of a Universalist clergyman, for twelve years a member and preacher among us. Now as such conversions are rare with us, my curiosity, and perhaps some more laudable emotions were somewhat excited, and I thought I should (as it was not to be on the Sabbath, as a Methodist said, excusing himself for attending a Universalist meeting,) make one of Mr. Ebbs congregation for the evening. In company with Br. Forsyth I accordingly went, and after some twenty interminable pages, during which, innocent that I was, I vainly endeavored to discover who was the great Unknown, whose whining fiddle-faddle was intended to work upon the religious sympathies of the congregation, at the close of a letter, apparently the production of a crazy person, and yet of one who evidently evinced a 'method in his madness,' a letter addressed to a Doctor Hawes, I think,—the same I presume whose name I remember appended to a tract, with ludicrous appropriateness entitled, A strange thing! though what possible motive the man had, for thus making fun of his production in its very title, I have always been at a loss to discover,—well, well, as I was saying when I got 'thus far into the bowels,' not of 'the land,' but the sentence, from which I don't see how I am to work myself out,—at the close of this letter then, was sung out the name of M. H. SMITH. And worthy Mr. Ebbs (an excellent little man by the way, I believe,) read on, and read on, his interest increasing in seriousness at every sentence, until really, it was exceedingly rich, to note the intense earnestness and sympathy, with which he detailed the chronicles of Matthew's tears, and groans, and heart-rendings, just as if it had been every word of it true! It beat any boarding school miss, over Thaddeus of Warsaw. Had Matthew been kicking before him, in propria persona, in a real fit of colic, instead of figuring away in his book in the fantastic throes of a sham conversion, Br. Ebbs could not have evinced sincerer sympathy.—I felt half ashamed to let the farce proceed, but as, in the first place, the whole affair was got up, I believe, for the mutual edification of the minister and his congregation, I thought it would be cruel and uncalled for in me to break the delusion, and thus baulk them of the gratification they were enjoying, over, I suspect, the first romance of the kind they had ever perused; and then, secondly, though I possessed information of the history of the hero of the novel, sufficient to have set things in their true light in the estimation of reasonable people, yet as I had never considered the unfortunate man's case as of importance enough to warrant the jotting down in my note book, memoranda of his antics, and would therefore have been at a loss to assign name, place and date, to his multiplied gyrations, and was convinced that without the most overwhelming evidence, it would have been as utterly impracticable to bring that congregation and its minister to sobriety, as to persuade the drunkard to abstinence while yet smacking his lips over the second stimulating glass, I deemed it best to appreciate in silence, the speaking suggestion of the hastily closed book, and the hurriedly lifted hands, and the rapidly commenced benediction, and the immediate subsequent descent from the desk, for the purpose of a most interesting conversation doubtless into which Br. Ebbs forthwith plunged, with some favored elder or doorkeeper in the aisle. Next day, however, I selected a few numbers of the 'Trumpet,' comprising some items of Matthew's history subsequent to his Sam Patch jump, and forwarded them, accompanied with a civil note, to Mr. Ebbs, who has since, I have been informed, addressed the Doctor Hawes before mentioned, in enquiries relative to his protege, now bidding fair to become as notorious in this part of her Majesty's realm, as Br. Maffit, who I recently observed, suffered victimization under the humbug-hating hands of the Editor of the Toronto Banner. Doctor Hawes like a faithful lawyer has uttered his most favorable opinion in defence of his client, though I regret to say, from lack of previous notice, I am indebted for this piece of information, to one of Mr. Ebbs's hearers, and am therefore unable to furnish you with the substance of his letter. Now would any of you, brethren editors of the Magazine, acquainted with the facts of poor Matthew's career, be so kind as to furnish us here, with a synopsis of the most prominent of such as are unquestionable, in order that any impression adverse to our faith, arising from the perusal of his new industriously circulated, and very veracious autobiography, may be effectually, and by the hand of truth, obliterated for ever. The ignition of a contemptible Lucifer match may surge a city in fire, and even Matthew H. Smith, insignificant as he may be in himself, may be the means, in the hands whether of sincere though deluded, or of unhesitating and wicked opponents, of inflicting a vast amount of injury upon our faith, among those already bigotedly averse to it, or half informed of its merits, and as yet unable to appreciate and love its glories. By complying with the above request you will, brethren, confer upon us, in London, an obligation to be gratefully remembered.

Yours sincerely in the faith of a world's deliverance.

CLERICO-CALVINISTIC COURTESY.

Travelling a short time since in the cars from Lockport to Niagara Falls to attend a funeral—chanced to be seated in an apartment with several gentlemen and the Rev. Mr. Cushing, of the Presbyterian church at Lower Lockport. Mr. C. had the fortune to get a seat next to the door and window, our car being one of the small, old-fashioned order, and next to him sat the Rev. Mr. Winchel, Baptist, a man far past middle life, of a kind and courteous appearance. Now it happens that Mr. Winchel is medically advised to smoke for the benefit of his health, and having rode some distance without the customary resort, the pipe was loaded and lighted. But not desiring to have his fellow travellers smoked out in this world, or in the cars at least, he politely requested Rev. Mr. Cushing to change seats. And do you believe it? Mr. C. 'preferred to sit there himself!' And such a look, and such a tone, and such!—that, if Br. Abel had been there, he would have said, 'Oh, do pitch him out!' Suffice it to say that Mr. C. 'sat' there like a cake of ice until he dropped himself out. But a plain looking lad opposite him gave him a most gentle rebuke by offering Mr. W. his seat.

Not long since we heard this Rev. Mr. C. preach on the parable of the Rich Man, and he insisted upon a literal hell of fire and flames and waves. He described Dives as being tossed up on a huge billow of burning lava within sight of heaven where Abraham stood; and in a moment's relief from the suffocating flame and smoke, calling for help. But Abraham stood there in cold and vindictive indifference, and said, 'No! no! no!' And this little circumstance in the cars served to refresh my memory in regard to this famed discourse. Mr. C. gave us a practical demonstration of the doctrine he applies to Dives and Abraham. If he believes that millions will be smoked and burned forever in a literal hell, he might have considered it a small affair to have his fellow passengers smoked only a little while with tobacco smoke. And he could say 'No! no! no!' for why should he care as long as he was doing well enough himself? Mr. C. undoubtedly considers himself one of the elect, in the cars, as well as in one of the highest seats in the upper synagogue, and why not be consistent in all his intercourses with the fellow race. But, poor man, we fear his pride may be humbled at last, and his preference to an eligible seat become as nothing in the sight of Him who is no respecter of persons.

Should the travelling public ever fall in with Mr. Cushing they will remember to give him the outside seat, and never think of disturbing such a gentleman.

SPRING.

A RAMBLE IN A NEIGHBORING GROVE.

What a thrilling sensation of pleasure, and sense of freedom fills the mind, when your foot first presses the greensward after the long and dreary confinement of winter! You can not brook the tardy step and measured tread, but your body, like your mind, is all for action. After you have gamboled yourself weary, Nature presents you with every variety of seats; perhaps a rock, cushioned with soft moss of a lively green, will suit your taste—it is Nature's sofa—and if it does not possess the richness and beauty of the gay drawing-room lounge, it possesses that which is far more attractive—the power of inspiration. Recline upon it and Nature will teach you a lesson. But winter—has that gone without leaving us a moral? No: but winter, with its storms, and clouds, and tempests, is a stern, harsh teacher; and most of us are fain to learn our lesson soon, and bid him go.

This day is most lovely. The sun looks upon earth again with one of his happiest smiles. A soft south wind has awakened the decayed leaves, and called them from the retreat they sought at the approach of winter, and is now racing them across the fields, or whirling them round in eddies in the little hollows, or calling them up in oft repeated circles, till, dizzy from the rapid motion, they fall again to earth. The birds, too, are out again, but their notes are few, and they are ever on the wing, as if fearful that the reign of winter was not yet over; but their notes, though few, are sweet; and there is music now, even in the inharmonious caw of the crow. Aught that betokens the approach of summer, is hailed with gladness. What pleasing ideas are associated with the word summer!—freshness and beauty, birds and flowers, delightful ramblings and pensive musings, golden sunsets and moon-lit evenings, in short, every thing that is grand, sublime, or beautiful, is associated with the word summer! Then hail its approach; for it brings gladness and joy to all nature! * * *

The sun has sunk from our view—the dying zephyrs whisper faint and low—yonder star has just come in to watch with the now pale corpse of day—but the cool air of evening warns me to return. Farewell. U. M. F.

THE DUTY OF WORSHIP.

BY REV. G. S. ABBOTT.

Our heavenly Father, is the great fountain of all good—the giver of every perfect gift—the source of every blessing—the protector of our lives and the sustainer of our bodies. It is in him 'we live and move and have our being.' As well might we suppose that the grain committed to the bosom of the earth would grow and thrive and bring forth fruit in due season without the gentle rain and genial sun to moisten and invigorate it, as to suppose the soul could grow in love, benevolence and virtue, when deprived of the privilege of bowing before Him in humble worship. It draws its life and spirit from him the same as the grain does its nourishment and support from the earth—and as sure as the plant will wither and die when not moistened by the gentle dew, so sure will the soul be barren of virtue when it neglects the place of worship.

Again: God is ever round about us for good—his all bountiful hand is continually open supplying all our rational wants and desires—and his kind and constant care is ministering to our necessities—in saving our lives and in conducting us safely on our journey to the tomb. As with his temporal, so with his spiritual blessings. From an exhaustless fountain he showers down his riches to satisfy this 'longing of the soul'—to allay its fears—to regulate its affections and to animate its hopes. Now in view of all these blessings and favors are we under no obligation to him? Shall we feed daily upon his bounty and still be unmindful of the Giver? Shall we, poor, frail, needy and helpless as we are, never raise one prayer of thanks—enter the courts of praise, or render him our offerings of gratitude? Should we thus neglect an earthly friend who had bestowed upon us so many favors and blessings? No, we should be careful to express our thanks in the most cordial manner. Shall we do this and forget God, the giver of all our blessings? O, let us not be thus ungrateful!

To bring the subject before us in a clear light—that cause of gratitude may be more distinctly manifest, let us consider what would have been our situation, had we been deprived of those intellectual and moral powers and faculties which now wake up within us the ten thousand pleasing emotions of hope, love and praise, and tune the harp of the soul in unison with the songs of angels around the throne. How low and miserable would have been our condition, were we destitute of those faculties which render us social and religious beings? The soul would then be filled with no holy aspirations of pleasing contemplation—the page, bright with the unnumbered testimonials of Divine wisdom, love and mercy, would be a mere blank to our eyes; and the ear which now delights to listen to the countless voices of nature and grace above and around us would be deaf to all the sounds of sweetness and love—and the tongue which now so often raises the sweet notes of joy and praise would be dumb to all the finer feelings of devotion. O, what goodness is here manifested! O, who would not worship, and love, and adore that Being who has conferred upon us all these numerous blessings? Who that realizes the richness of his goodness can be so cold and indifferent as to return him no thanks for his countless benefits? Who that has one spark of divine grace lighted up in his soul can be so ungrateful as to never bend the knee in adoration to so great and good a Being?

Where is the man, or woman, or child even, that is possessed of the common feelings of humanity that can take no delight in the services of God's house. That individual can not be found who, when he is once brought to see God as he is, does not take pleasing satisfaction in the duties of religious worship.

The assertion that man is a religious being is so self-evident that it has long since become a maxim. By this I understand that there is implanted in the mind of every intelligent being an inclination or desire to worship and venerate an unseen and higher power. This desire is the highest and purest of which man is capable, and is ever seeking for satisfaction. There is a constant 'hungering of the soul' after some object to satisfy its cravings.

And this longing of the mind after its proper food, when ungratified, is the source of continual dissatisfaction. In the pursuit of happiness, many being ignorant of the true source from which it may be derived, follow in the giddy round of fashion—but they are still unsatisfied. They only grasp at the shadow while the substance is removed far from them. They plunge into dissipation and vice, and pursue every gilded phantom, like the lone mariner who is cast out on the broad ocean without chart or compass, and following one of the revolving planets which soon sets—they sail over the ocean of life and find nothing to satisfy their desires. The reason is they are mistaken as regards the source to which they apply for happiness. They seem to overlook the high endowments of their nature, by seeking for satisfaction in the low pathway of the brute—by satisfying the bodily appetites and passions, while the mind, the only true fountain of human enjoyment, is choked and overgrown by ignorance and error.

Now before we can become fully satisfied—before we can take sweet delight in the contemplation and worship of a Supreme Being, we must have some just conceptions of his character and attributes. How shall we obtain this information.

1. By studying the great Book of nature above and around us, in contemplating the vastness of his works, and watching with what constant care and attention he provides for our animal and physical wants—with what regularity and harmony the great machine of nature moves—giving us the pleasing variety of the seasons—day and night—a time to sow and a time to reap—a time for activity and a time for repose.

2. By studying the revelation he has given us of his will—by examining the teachings of his holy word—and by studying the character of Christ who is the brightness of the Father's glory and the image of his adorable perfections—by contemplating the object of his mission and learning that his work will be accomplished—by understanding our duty to one another and to God.

When we are properly enlightened upon these subjects—when once we become imbued with that wisdom which is from above, how shall we delight to mingle our voices in praise and devout adoration before the great Giver of all our blessings.

Then let us worship God 'morning, noon and night,' yea, at all times in all places, let us lift up our hearts to the Father of mercies, the Author of nature the God of all worlds. Let us endeavor to study his works and his word and thus partake of those rich and sumptuous provisions that shall satisfy all spiritual wants and desires. Amen.

We copy the following communication of Br. G. W. Lawrence, from the 'Better Covenant' of the 12th ult. It would seem by the treatment that he received at a Methodist protracted meeting, that our good Methodist brethren out West are somewhat tainted with Knappishness.

DISGRACEFUL OUTRAGE AT AURORA—FACTS AND COMMENTS.

In the 'Better Covenant' of Feb. 12th, appeared a brief statement in relation to the hard and cruel treatment which I had then recently received at the hands of certain religionists, to wit: Rev. Salmon Stebbins, and some of his Methodist brethren in this place. I have waited for some one else to communicate the circumstances, but as they have not yet appeared,* and as I believe the public should be made acquainted with the facts connected with this disgraceful transaction, I shall now proceed to make a statement of them myself, accompanied with such comments as the nature of the case may require.

Sometime about the latter part of January, if I mistake not, a meeting was commenced by the Episcopal Methodist brethren at their house of worship in this place. The Rev. Mr. Stebbins, alluded to above, is the preacher in charge on this circuit. The meeting referred to had been in progress a few days, six or seven perhaps, before I had an opportunity of attending. Then, having leisure, I attended some four or five consecutive nights. And I challenge any one to show that my conduct was in the least degree disrespectful or disorderly upon either of those occasions. Furthermore, I challenge any one to show that I have ever conducted disrespectfully in a religious meeting. It is true, I took notes of the discourses to which I listened. And was there any thing disrespectful—any thing wrong in this? Why yes, in the opinion of a Methodist Br. with whom I conversed, this was certainly wrong. It seemed to indicate, he said, a design on my part, to overawe those who would, were it not for me, go forward to the 'anxious seat' and obtain religion. I would say here that I have never attempted to dissuade any person from going forward to an anxious seat in any religious meeting. And I had never before supposed that it was considered wrong for an individual to take notes of a public discourse. And no one but a bigot would so consider it. The following quotation from a small work in my possession, entitled, 'Acts of the Elders, or Book of Abraham,' seems quite appropriate in this place, therefore I introduce it:—'Wherefore do the elders speak unto the people? Is it not that they may hear? And wherefore do they hear? Is it not that they may understand? And wherefore do they understand? Is it not that they may remember? And wherefore should they remember? Is it not that they should practice? Verily, it is even so. If then I can not well remember otherwise, is it harmful that I simply note down the text from which an Elders speaketh? Ye answer, nay. I ask then, is it insulting that I note down the various passages of holy writ, which the speaker useth to prove his doctrine?—Still ye answer nay. And may I not strive to assist my memory, by the same method, to retain the various figures used, and illustrations made, to demonstrate, and make plain the subject? This ye can not deny me. Why then perceive ye not, that no harm is done, if by this very means, a whole discourse, from first to last, is borne in mind?' This extract is commended to the careful attention of those who have found fault with me for taking notes in protracted meetings. Being a public advocate of the doctrine of the Gospel, I certainly have a right to avail myself of the supposed argument of others, for the purpose of assisting me in the removal of error, and the inculcation of truth.

During the evenings on which I attended the meetings alluded to, I uttered not a word to any person except on one occasion. I did converse for a short time one evening with a gentleman on the subject of religion. But let it be understood that this gentleman is a Methodist, and that he came to me and commenced the conversation himself. I did talk with him; I thought it my privilege to do so. I should observe here, that during this brief colloquy, I was very closely watched by some of the brethren, the countenances of whom seemed to say I had no business to speak even when spoken to.

On Monday evening, Feb. 2, if I am not mistaken a discourse was delivered by a visiting minister, whose name I do not now recollect, on the parable of the 'Rich man and Lazarus.' The next day a request came to me from several individuals that I would preach the next Sabbath from the same parable. I consented to do so. And wishing to have a notice of my intention circulated as widely as possible, I accordingly wrote a line to Mr. Stebbins, requesting him to read to his congregation that evening a notice that I should preach on the parable referred to, on the next Sabbath.—Mr. S. received my notice in due season, but did not publish it to the congregation. The unprejudiced reader can determine who acted ungentlemanly touching this matter. Perhaps it was ungentlemanly in me to request Mr. Stebbins to confer on myself and others a special favor by giving out my notice; and perhaps also, it was an indication of a gentleman and a Christian for Mr. S. to withhold my notice from the congregation. As before remarked, the reader can decide this point for himself—I will not dwell upon it. I make an allusion to this circumstance, as it evidently had an effect to stir up the holy (!) indignation of Mr. Stebbins toward myself.

* Since I commenced this article, the 'Better Covenant' of Feb. 26th, has come to hand, in which I find the prominent circumstances of the case set forth. I shall however submit my article to the public.

I now pass to the memorable night of Thursday, Feb. 5th. A discourse was delivered this evening by Rev. Mr. Nason, who had been sent for to assist in carrying on the meeting. Mr. N. read for his text the whole of the 15th Psalm, the first three verses of which are as follows:—“Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly, and work-righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart, He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbor, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbor.” I would recommend Mr. Stebbins seriously to consider the purport of this language. I have but little doubt that it has already risen up in judgment against him. Though Mr. Nason said many things which I did not think accorded well with the ‘law and the testimony,’ yet I must say that his sermon was, in the main a good one. He made some excellent remarks for the consideration of those who were in the habit of speaking reproachfully of their neighbors. And while speaking on this point, he remarked emphatically, that ‘the righteous man will not take up a reproach against his neighbor.’ The sermon was delivered with apparent good feeling towards every individual in the house. I was on the whole well pleased with it.

At the conclusion of the sermon, singing was commenced, during which, Mr. Stebbins, who had taken his stand in front of the pulpit, gave out frequent invitations for persons to come forward to the altar. During the singing, one of the brethren came along and took a seat in the second slip behind me, and immediately commenced talking with a gentleman who was occupying that slip. Their conversation arrested my attention, as well as the attention of those who sat between me and them. I therefore turned partly around, with others, to listen to their remarks. The singing at length ceased, Mr. Stebbins commenced speaking, yet the conversation continued. Mr. S. probably supposed that some of the disorderly Universalists were keeping up the talk, and remarked with considerable severity, that if those gentlemen did not stop whispering or talking, he should come out and reprove or rebuke them. He then went on to say that members of their church had a right to talk with any member of the congregation on the subject of religion, but that members of the congregation (meaning those who were not Methodists) had no right to hold conversation with each other during the meeting. He was here throwing the blame entirely upon members of the congregation, where I knew it ought not to rest, if indeed blame could be attached to any one. I therefore barely remarked to Mr. S. that it was one of his own brethren who had opened and kept up the conversation to which he alluded: in a very harsh tone, and in a manner quite unbecoming, he replied that he knew what he was about, and that there were some gentlemen conversing who were not brethren. His language was far from being refined and Christian-like. I mention this circumstance because it evidently served to kindle the wrath of this professed Christian teacher into a raging flame. He then went on with his remarks, and gave full vent to his feelings. It was not Universalism that he attacked; but Universalists were assailed, and bitterly denounced in an unsparing manner. Having thrown off his spite upon Universalists generally, and especially upon the Universalists of this place, he commenced a personal attack. He did not speak my name, it is true, yet that he alluded to me could not be doubted. For the space of three or four minutes he thundered forth his invective in language harsh and coarse beyond what I had ever before heard from the lips of any individual in the house of prayer. I was spoken of by this man who should have been governed by that charity that thinketh no evil, as a poor, miserable backslidden Methodist,* as one who had fallen from grace, and was now engaged in leading the people on to hell and destruction. His slanderous language represented me as one of the vilest of the vile. And with such a man as their leader and teacher, he was not at all surprised that the Universalists should busy themselves in opposition to the work of the Lord. In the fullest sense of the expression, his language was personally abusive. He came at length to a full stop. He had probably come to the conclusion that he had abused me sufficiently for once. I felt as though I ought to arise and vindicate my character, and before his own people repel the foul aspersions which he had sought to fasten upon me; yet I determined not to do it there. I did think, however, that I would say to Mr. Stebbins, in the language of Mr. Nason, before referred to,—‘the righteous man will not take up a reproach against his neighbor.’ From the manner in which Mr. S. had addressed me, I concluded he had forgotten that wholesome remark; and to put him in mind of it, I thought might be attended with a good result. I arose therefore simply to repeat it, not designing to say a word farther. But I was scarcely in an erect posture, and had not time to speak, before, in a voice of THUNDER, I was ordered by Mr. Stebbins, to sit down. With a rapid movement of his right hand, which showed plainly that he was governed by the ‘meatax’ principle, he roared out at the top of his voice, ‘SIT DOWN! SIT DOWN!! SIT DOWN, SIR!!!’ Mr. S. then called for the Trustees of the church; and by the time I had uttered what I intended to say, they were at the door of the slip in which I was standing. One of them, a professedly pious young man, said something to me about my creating a disturbance in the meeting. I informed him that it was far from my intention to create any disturbance. Feeling quite valorous no doubt, he ordered me in a very peremptory manner to leave the house or sit down. When ordered to sit down, I remarked to him that I should do so soon. Nothing more was said. Moved by the spirit of his creed, he put forth his hand, took me by the collar, and with the assistance of his equally pious coadjutors, and in strict obedience to the command of Mr. Stebbins, to put me out, removed me with considerable rough handling to the porch. Here I was released.

The reader may have some curiosity to know whether I made any resistance. I did not. I sought to prevent myself from injury as much as possible in going thus hastily out of the slip; but I did not fight; I had no disposition to do so. I do not envy in the least the reputation of a boxer.

The next day a complaint was entered in behalf of the people against Mr. Stebbins, for a breach of the peace. He was tried, found guilty, and fined in the sum of twenty-five dollars. In a few days, as soon as the matter could be attended to by the counsel engaged on the part of the prosecution, Mr. Gilson, one of the Trustees, was tried for a similar offence, found guilty, and fined in the sum of ten dollars. An appeal was taken in both cases.

I have appealed to the law for redress. No individual acquainted with the circumstances can blame me in the least for so doing. A due regard for my rights as a citizen, as a member of the community in which I live, has prompted me to take this step.

Having extended this article beyond the space which I designed at first, I can say but little more.

* I have never been a member of a Methodist society. The doctrines of the M. E. church I firmly BELIEVED until a few years ago, when I became instructed in a ‘more excellent way.’

I regret exceedingly that this unhappy difficulty has arisen. Nothing has occurred in the history of my life since my connection with the ministry that has operated so unpleasantly upon my feelings. I can not deny that I have deeply felt the injury that has been done me. And where is the man who has any regard for his reputation—especially he whose very subsistence depends upon the maintenance of an unsullied character, who would not feel as keenly an injury of a similar kind? To be slanderously spoken of in the house of God—to be shamefully abused by one who claims to be a teacher of religion,—to be treated with utter contempt by those whom an individual regards as his neighbor,—and, having neither said or done any thing wrong, to have violent hands laid upon him by professed Christian men—these are matters that can not be slightly thought of by the individual thus abused.

I look upon this transaction, I say, with painful feelings. And yet I can not but hope that it will be turned to good account. I can not but entertain the hope that it will work a lasting benefit for the cause of Christ. I regard it not as a proof of the doctrine of total depravity; but I do look upon it as a practical demonstration of the pernicious influence of a belief in the doctrine of endless misery.—Yes, I so regard it. When the creeds of men are thrown aside, and the religion of Christ—the religion of love—prevails, such disgraceful transactions as the one I have here recorded, will never again occur. And I believe, though I shall not argue the point here, that the circumstances to which I have called the reader’s attention in this article, will have a tendency favorable to the progress of liberal Christianity. I verily believe it.

Toward Mr. Stebbins I entertain no unkind feelings. My sincere desire is that he may change his course of conduct, and henceforth be governed by the spirit of our common Master. I can not forbear citing his attention to the following quotation from the pen of Dr. Clarke. St. Paul, in speaking of the qualifications of a bishop, 1 Tim. iii: 2-7, says among many other very good things, that he must be ‘no striker,’ verse 2. In commenting on this passage, Dr. Clarke holds the following language:—‘He must be no striker; not quarrelsome; not ready to strike a person who may displease him; no persecutor of those who may differ from him; not prone, as one wittily said,

‘To prove his doctrine orthodox
By apostolic blows and knocks.’

It is said of Bishop Bonner, of infamous memory, that when examining the poor Protestants, whom he termed heretics, when worsted by them in argument, he was used to smite them with his fists; and sometimes scourge and whip them. But though he was a most ignorant and consummate savage: yet from such a scripture as this he might have seen the necessity of surrendering his mitre.’ Mr. S. is also recommended to examine carefully the 13th chapter of Paul’s letter to the Corinthians.

The members of the Methodist church in this place who have treated me with so much harshness, need not be told that they have acted in a manner quite unbecoming. I might almost say they have ‘done despite unto the Spirit of grace.’ They have certainly done that which they ought not to have done. They have trampled upon the most important principles of the Gospel. They can not but feel sensible that they have done wrong—that they have widely departed from the plain path of Christian duty. I am perfectly willing to leave them to their own reflections.

What I have written is now submitted to the public, with the assurance that it is what it purports to be, a statement of facts. The proof is abundant. Aurofa, March 4th, 1846. G. W. LAWRENCE.

WEDDING STANZAS.

BY MRS. H. L. JORDAN.

'Tis come—'tis come! the bridal hour:
And we must yield our precious flower—
Our fragrant 'rose without a thorn'
Another's bosom to adorn.

If long the flowret he would wear,
Then must he cherish it with care:
For 'neath a frowning wintry sky,
The fragile thing would droop and die.

Now one in heart, and hand in hand,
Behold them at the altar stand:
They've breathed the vows which make them one
In weal and wo, till life is done.

The scene is o'er—our gentle dove
Is offered at the shrine of love;
And she must leave the sheltering nest,
To seek afar an ark of rest.

Emotions deep her young heart thrill
At bidding home 'sweet home,' farewell—
Affection claims a parting tear
For parents, brothers, sisters, dear.

Yet go, dear girl, a happy bride,
(Ah, we these truant tears must hide!)
Thy hand another now shall claim—
Thou ownest now another's name.

Though new thy path, and all untried,
Weep not—it ill becomes a bride:
But go, with strong and trusting heart,
To act in life thy drama part.

May peace and calm contentment shed
A halo bright around thy head;
While hope, thy guardian angel sings,
And fans thee with her radiant wings.

When trials come, (for come they will,)
Calm and trusting be thou still.
Should fierce winds howl, and clouds grow dark,
Then may kind Heaven safe guide thy bark.

Though seated on thy young heart's throne,
One idol reigns, and reigns alone,
Yet is there not some little cell
Reserved, where early friends may dwell?

THE MISGUIDED DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

'Gold pays the worth of all things here;
But not of love—that gem's too dear.'

CHAPTER II.

Trusting in the interest which may have already been awakened in the history of Alethea's marriage, and presuming on the curiosity of the reader to know something more of her, if he will bear us company, we will leave her as the rich Mrs. Gardner, in possession of all the enjoyment she can reap from her riches, and go back to learn something of her former life.

Her father—Stanly Morse—was the only inheritor of what was a comfortable fortune, after defraying expenses for excellent educational advantages which he had well improved. Possessing a noble mind and fine feelings, but with the rashness and impetuosity of youth, and becoming disgusted with the sickening parade and heartless formalities of females with whom he associated, he determined to choose for himself, a companion from the lower walks of life. Intent only on this one point, he became fascinated with a young lady of rare beauty; and without waiting for that acquaintance which is so indispensably necessary between those who are about to enter the wedded state, he married.

That she was beautiful in outward appearance may not be denied, but possessed of a mind of little cultivation and less desire for improving it; a vain spirit, and false ideas of true greatness, so firmly rooted as to be impossible to supplant them with correct ones. Suddenly raised from a state of dependence to one of wealth, the transition, instead of prompting her to fit herself for the change, only served to gratify her vanity and puff her up with feelings of inordinate pride. The lower walks of life are far from being the only places from whence emanate minds of this stamp; but they are likewise far from being exempt from them, and it was therefore Mr. Morse's misfortune because of his hastiness, to obtain just such an one as his noble spirit would lead him to shun.

It was natural enough that his wife should endeavor to hide her vanity from her husband, knowing as she did that but for him she would have remained of that class which she now so much affected to despise. But notwithstanding her carefulness and comparative success upon this point, she could not be as successful on others, and he soon saw with regret that hers was a mind unable to appreciate the beauties of science or the hallowed emotions of an exalted morality. We say that it was with regret that her husband learned this, but it must not therefore be supposed that he treated her with a less degree of kindness. But when Alethea, their only child, attained an age to receive impressions, he watched her with the closest scrutiny, lest her mind should be moulded in a form like that of her mother's. Oh! it is a sad thing for a father to doubt the abilities of a mother and therefore fear to trust his child to her guidance. That she, whom nature has seemingly appointed as a moulder of character, aye, and almost mirror for the child's future mind, should be incompetent for the high and responsible work, is a thought to be deplored; but ah! it is a thought of far more sadness and sorrow, that the husband must fear and dread that the child will imbibe the mother's feelings and characteristics. Mr. Morse realized that this was his situation, and he felt it with all the painful anxiety, of which a sensitive heart may be susceptible.

But his watchfulness was in a degree rewarded, and as Alethea neared her twelfth year, he saw with pleasure that notwithstanding she possessed her mother's beauty, yet that upon her heart was the impress of virtue, and within her mind, a strong desire for mental improvement; and had he lived to direct these, or even had no one given a different bias to the impulse already received, she undoubtedly would have led a life of usefulness and peace. But this might not be, for soon after her twelfth birthday she was fatherless. Ah! little realized she the extent of her loss, and when her father on his dying bed, urged her mother to give her every advantage for acquiring an education she little deemed that her guide in this pursuit, would be an 'ignis fatuus, leading to bewilder and dazzling to blind.' Thus it was however; and when at an after day, her mother procured at great expense, French and Latin masters, and teachers in drawing and painting, to the exclusion of all other sources of moral and useful improvement, she did not know but what her mother was acting in strict conformity with the wishes and dying request of her father. In applying herself to master that, which by the want of encouragement, was only a heterogeneous mass, her ideas of knowledge became vitiated and corrupted. Nor was this a course, which of all others pursued by her mother, was calculated to produce the most deleterious effect. Her conversation was ever such as calculated to produce an inordinate love of dress, and to impress upon the mind, the superior worth of those who are wealthy. She even manifested no hesitancy whatever, in praising Alethea's extraordinary beauty, and saying that that alone, not to say any thing of her 'wonderful advantages,' ought to secure for her in marriage, the most respectable, i. e., according to her opinion, the most wealthy man in community.

Such was the manner in which she improved those thousand opportunities, which mothers rightly impressed with their responsibilities, improve in impressing valuable instructions, both mental and moral, upon the minds of their daughters; instruction which does more in the formation of character than whole libraries of advisory books, or years of attendance upon public lectures. It can not be supposed that the continued hearing of such things, without any direct counteracting powers, could be without its legitimate effect on the mind of one so young and so easy to receive impressions. The consequence was, that Alethea attained to womanhood ignorant of those scientific acquirements which beautify the mind and elevate the affections. Vain of her supposed attainments, and with a belief firmly impressed upon her mind, that wealth was the only criterion of true greatness, she was a sad example of the influence which mothers have, in turning the natural channels of thought in the minds of offspring. Grieved indeed must any one be, to speak of the character of woman in such a manner, but should the narration of the evil consequences which followed this example, serve to awaken one mother who may be pursuing such a course, then we feel that we have not labored in vain.

It was a matter of much regret with Mrs. Morse that they were unable to remove to a more public place, where the charms of her daughter could be more duly appreciated; but thanks to her good management and remarkable foresight, the comfortable fortune left at her husband's decease, was so nearly expended, that it was with her utmost tact of management and economy, that they could maintain their superior style of living, even in the quiet little village of T—.

Alethea's social feelings and better nature however, prevented her from secluding herself from society because she could not have such as her mother wished, and she even publicly maintained and confessed a strong friendship for a young lady of about her own age, who, though respectable, was the daughter of a man in moderate circumstances. And it was farther rumored, by those who were not so well acquainted with her feelings as the reader may already be, that one day or other the brother of her friend would convert that relationship into that of sisterly affection. Certain it is, that had she permitted her heart to have spoken its dictates, it would have confessed that in the society of Maylon Gray she received more pleasure, than she would have been willing that the world should have known; but though he was handsome, intelligent and agreeable, yet he lacked that one great superiority—wealth!

JEREMIAH JERRYWELL; OR THE WAY TO PROVE A DREAM.

BY FIXLEY PIGGLETRAP, ESQ.

'A revival of religion,' said old Mr. Pucker, as he carefully knocked the ashes from the bowl of his pipe, preparatory to filling it up the third time within the hour—he was truly a good smoker! There is a wide difference in smoking, or in the various manners of it, and as many different kind of smokers as there are different members in any other sphere. The great smoker, and the good smoker, are different, entirely so. The great smoker is a desperate being. He seizes the pipe in the spirit of a resolute determination, and then falls on, valiantly puffing and blowing and steaming and spitting, seemingly bent upon only two objects; the one, that of the wanton destruction of the precious weed; and the other, to make himself perfectly at home though it be to the expulsion of every decent man from the 'sanctum' where the great smoker may chance to hold forth. He will quote Solomon, and declare that a man should 'eat, drink, and enjoy himself, for who shall bring a man to see what shall be after him?' And sure enough who shall bring the great smoker to see what shall be after him? I am sure that no living being ever will be after him, even old Sootie himself would tremble at the thought, unless he could approach upon the windward side, where he might not be enveloped in a fog in comparison with which, the smoke of the bottomless pit, would be a balmy and sweet scented breeze!—truly delightful to inhale.

The good smoker, is one who smokes philosophically. He fills up his pipe with that gravity which bespeaks depth of thought; applies it to his lip with a peculiar grace, and while the smoke is so gracefully curling aloft, from the deep treasures of wisdom he will bring out 'things new and old'; from the fount of knowledge pour forth a pure, clear, and crystal stream to edify and refresh the minds of those who may be honored with his presence—it is an honor to be honored with such company!—or who may have the pleasure of enjoying the hospitality and converse of a gentleman.

Such a smoker was old Mr. Pucker—blessings be upon him. 'A revival of religion,' said he, as he emptied his second pipe and threw one knee gracefully over the other—revival of religion, is now something of a nature far different from what it was when we were young, Esq.—directing his language to me. 'In the old Bay State, years ago, a revival I do really believe was the work of God, and arose from the power which the blessed Gospel wrought upon the sinful heart. O it did my soul good!' and Uncle Pucker arose from his chair unconsciously, his eye sparkled with renewed brilliancy, he raised his hand and begun to warm up in his subject. 'It was a soul-stirring, a rejoicing sight to see sinners flocking to Zion and enquiring what they should do to be saved. To see them forsake the error of their ways and lay hold on life everlasting. But there was no excitement about it; no tricks of chicanery; no wild and mad pranks were cut up, no! but it was the still small voice, and it went to the heart and the sinner threw himself at the foot of the cross, and ever after showed his faith, not by his words once in each week, but by his works every day, in visiting the fatherless and widows in their afflictions and in keeping himself unspotted from the world, and he done as he wished to be done by.'

'But fashion,' said Uncle Pucker, and a shade of sorrow came over his countenance as he spoke it, and his voice trembled somewhat—but fashion has made strange inroads upon the manners and customs of the world. It was once the fashion to be honest!—but it was indeed a long time ago. It was once the fashion for youth to respect age!—but the idea is obsolete. It was once the fashion for every man to mind his own business in preference to meddling with things which did not concern him!—but it is decidedly unpopular now. 'And Esq,' said he turning his head to me—'Esq, do you recollect of having read in any book, of it's being fashionable for one to love his neighbor as himself?' This was truly a rouser, and after due consideration I was forced to give my opinion that such a fashion never prevailed. Uncle Pucker resumed—'it was once the fashion for men to worship God from the deep feelings of grateful hearts, but alas! alas!' said the old man and his voice trembled much more than before, 'all of these good old customs have passed away and are gone forever.'

'Mark the change,' said he, and his manner grew more spirited; 'now a revival of religion is quite another thing. The church begins to look a little rusty. It must be painted. The desk is old fashioned and it must be taken out and a new one be placed in its stead—a lamp here—a cushion there—yonder a new stove and so on; and perhaps the steeple is not much higher than what some of the members have claims, and it must be lifted up a little; but how shall all these things be done? That's the question. There is no money in the Lord's treasury, and so it is easy enough to see that there must be a revival of religion. Elder Smashall must be sent for. There must be prayer, sermons, scandals, libels, backbitings, and such other like religious ceremonies, and after some weeks of hard-lifting and tight-tugging, in sunshine and in storm, through mud and through slop, by night and by day, the work is done! A great work in the Lord has been done, and the new converts must shell out enough to fix the church and buy Elder Smashall a new coat!'

'Yes,' said Jake Pucker, rising up, for he could listen no longer—yes father, it is all too true. I say it with sorrow; but experiencing religion in olden times and experiencing religion now, are as it were, two extremes. I recollect father of reading it in the old family Bible, and I can show it to you when we go home, of a man's experiencing religion when the Saviour was upon the earth, and I opine that it must have been a real genuine conversion, for you recollect that when the man related it joyfully, the Master said—'this day has salvation come to this house.' And now how did he make it manifest that he had got religion? Did he do it by despising every body who did not believe just as he did? Not by a long shot.

Nor was he overbearing and insolent; not he, but he said, 'the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken aught from any man by false accusation, I restore him four fold.' That man had got religion, and God blessed him.' 'Undoubtedly he did bless him abundantly,' said the old man as a tear started from his eye.—'Now,' said Jake, 'let us listen to Mr. Swackhammer and he will tell us of a modern experience.'

Swackhammer, who had been a silent listener, now commenced his narrative by saying that some time ago there abode near his native town one Jeremiah Jerrywell, a lump of mortality of as much oddity and indifference as ever abode in that being called man. Jerry had long been a possessor of what men call 'a better half,' and by sundry knacks and catches was enabled to get along tolerably well, though his thoughts never had the honor of a journey beyond the circle inscribed by the rotundity of his own bulk. But he knew a thing or two, though it was with a blunder that he ever came within gunshot of any thing in the shape of the truth. And moreover he was afflicted with a dreadful and incurable disease; and for this reason he often found it impossible to make matters come around right. The disease is fatal whenever it fastens upon the human frame, and Jeremiah Jerrywell had got it terrible bad. It was in all probability entailed upon him by hereditary descent; and that you may be kept no longer in doubt, and suspense, we will say that it is commonly called, laziness! It is fatal, it is true, but yet it never kills its victim from the fact that he who is afflicted with it can never muster sufficient resolution to draw his last breath! Owing to Jerry's being thus afflicted he was wont to work at head work, building air-castles and various wild and fanciful vagaries in the shape of divers machines, churns, stump-lifters, perpetual motions and the like, by which he was always just on the point of making a fortune. It was during one of these fanciful reveries that an extraordinary idea pop'd into his head. It was a droll idea sure enough, and he laughed out, though all alone when it occurred to him; it was odd, but Jeremiah Jerrywell was an odd fellow, not an 'independent odd fellow,' but rather of the dependent order, and odd enough in all conscience, and hence no marvel that his ideas should be odd, and this particular one was more odd than all the odds and ends that had ever crept into his imaginative brain; and what think ye that it was? It was no more or less than the idea of experiencing religion and joining the church! He thought that if he could get in as a member of the church, it would be a fine thing because it would be a kind of partnership concern in which he and respectable people would hold joint stock. This would introduce him to places to which he had ever been an entire stranger.

'Now,' said Jerry, as he mused to himself, 'now there is no use in trying to get along in this world alone. If we'd a had to get along alone, then you see that when Adam was created that had been the end of it. But you see Adam could'n't get along alone, so Eve was created to help him along. You can't get along alone, because you see if you try to, you soon drops behind the multitude, and you can't get hold of any thing until every body else has got hold on't, and then you see there aint any room to hold on to't. So you see its plain that a feller should be one of the throng, one of the van guard so as to grab while there is something to be grabbed; for it is as plain as mud that if a feller don't do so he aint thought nothing of. And what can a feller do if he aint thought nothing of? and how shall he be thought anything of if he don't think nothing of himself? 'Think well of yourself and folks will think well of you,' says the apostle Job, I believe. So it is a clear case that I must experience religion and join the church.'

Having thus reasoned with himself, and taken a look at the almanac to see if it was in the right quarter of the moon for such an important change to take place in his heart; the old of the moon you know is the time, for then the noxious weeds of iniquity being cut down will sprout no more. It was in the nick of time, and there being a revival in the church in our village, the next morning Jeremiah Jerrywell was well on his way to the old church, with a face as long and solemn as a psalm tune. Elder Smashall was there, and that day he handed out the word with power, and it was evident to all concerned that Jerry was under conviction. He sobbed and he sighed, he mourned and he grieved, he wept in the church and he wept out of the church, and he bowed himself here and he bowed himself there; and when two long days had passed and when on the third day the candidates presented themselves for membership in the church, Jeremiah was one and when it came his 'turn' to speak, he arose with becoming gravity and related his experience on this wise.

'My friends, I have thought for a great while, that I must seek my soul's eternal salvation, and last night I had a droll dream, and it was this. I thought that I was building wall for somebody and there come away off in the sky, a little black cloud, and it come and abode right over my head. I looked up and a voice spoke; Jeremiah seek your soul's salvation before it is too late, and then the cloud went out of sight. But I have felt changed ever since, and I think I've got religion and got it the natural way too.'

Jerry was much agitated, for it was the first time that he had ever spoken in public, and a shower of perspiration rolled from his brow as he resumed his seat to wait the action of the executive board. Elder Smashall was the first to arise, and he observed that some might think it strange that a man should experience religion in a dream, and he was going on to say that to do so was not an impossibility by any means. But Jerry, being rather thick of hearing, did not understand his object, but supposed that the Elder was on the point of questioning the truth of the story, and about to charge him with dreaming it while 'wide awake.' Quick as thought Jerry bounded from his seat and in a fierce and impatient voice, sung out—'I did dream it, and that is the dream that I dreamt, and I can prove it by my wife, for she slept with me!'

Elder Smashall looked right at me, and I looked right at Elder Smashall, and I certainly did think that he would sink under combustion! But stranger; Jeremiah Jerrywell is a member of the Church Militant, and may be found every Sabbath in the old stone Tabernacle which standeth by the wayside as thou trudgest along Mud street in the far-famed Pixley Village.

AN INCIDENT—TRYING TO BE DAMNED.

Some persons had attended my Sunday meeting from a distance of ten miles, on my way to Jackson: at their request I authorized a meeting to be appointed for four o'clock on Monday, at Mr. Walkers, who kept a house for the entertainment of travellers. The congregation was large, despite the brevity of the notice. Next day, continuing on toward Jackson, I stopped about one o'clock at a farmers house to bait my horse. As is my invariable custom, I soon let my profession be known; this led to a whispered consultation amongst the male members of the family, and to my being asked at length, whether I would consent to stop and preach in their meeting house that night. They were Methodists. I told them that preaching was my only business, and that I was ever ready to attend to it where a congregation could be convened.—'But,' said I, 'your neighborhood seems to be thin, and the time is short; how will you give the notice?' 'We'll manage that,' was the answer, 'say you'll preach, and we'll send out our boys in different directions to give the notice; you may rely on a congregation.'

I consented, of course, and the boys were soon mounted and despatched through the neighborhood: they returned with the report that all the people seemed glad that I had been induced to stop; but one of them was the bearer of a note from their preacher, which read as follows: 'Br. Sherrod—this is to inform you, that I am not willing the Universalist should preach in our church—yours, etc.' Mr. Sherrod however maintained that as he was a trustee of the church, and had given more towards it than any other member, he was equally entitled as the preacher to control it. I preached to a very fair congregation, comprising the preacher aforesaid, who arose after meeting, and in a short address to the audience, attempted to justify his conduct in objecting to my occupancy of the house.

The Methodists are a singular people as it respects religion. Their ideas resemble a bunch of tangled yarn, full of knots and kinks. I am much amused by the questions they sometimes ask me. 'Do your people believe in experience?' 'Do you believe in faith?' 'Do your people ever get sanctified?'

'I tried for eleven years to believe your doctrine,' observed one, 'with all my might; but I could not come it, for I knew I would be eternally lost, if I did.'

'You think, nevertheless,' I replied, 'that you are a free agent.'

'O yes, to be sure I am,' was the answer.

'Well, my friend,' I rejoined, 'should you ever be saved at length, it will be more by good luck than good management; for by your own account you tried hard for eleven years to damn yourself eternally, but you could not make it out.' Truth is, that the mass of the Methodists do not know what they believe, nor why.—[Rogers' Memoranda.]

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

REV. D. SKINNER, EDITOR.

Revs. S. R. Smith, A. B. Grosh, J. M. Austin, A. C. Barry, S. J. Gibson, Cor. Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, APRIL 17, 1846.

ELDER D. HOLMES, AND HIS 'HOUSE UPON THE SAND'—ONCE MORE.

In the 'Northern Christian Advocate,' of the 25th ult., the Methodist paper published at Auburn, Eld. D. Holmes is out upon us in an article of about two of the long columns of that journal. Speaking of his great work entitled 'A house upon the sand,' he says,

'It may not be generally known, that Mr. Skinner had a manuscript copy of the pamphlet above alluded to, in his possession a number of weeks during the last summer, with the understanding that it should be published: It was placed in his hands at the urgent request of Rev. Mr. Brown, a Universalist preacher, and others, who were with him when the request was made, with the express proviso, that I should have liberty to reply in equal space, to any strictures that might be made upon it. But Mr. Skinner was not to be caught in this way. He had probably 'learned wisdom by the things he had suffered'; at all events, soon after the manuscript reached him, he made the wonderful discovery, that it was too long for insertion in his paper, and that the terms of publication agreed upon by the parties, were 'unfair for Universalism.' It was officially decided, therefore, that the sermon could not be published, unless upon terms dictated by Mr. Skinner himself. This, however 'fair for Universalism,' was not deemed 'fair for truth and honesty, hence, the manuscript was withdrawn.'

On the above we remark that with whosoever else the 'understanding' existed that the sermon was to be published, it was never our understanding to publish it on his unfair and unequal terms. And that man must be stupid indeed not to 'learn wisdom by the things he has suffered,' when long years of experience and observation had taught him never to expect of Methodist papers or Methodist preachers, fair and equal terms of discussion. And equally stupid must be that man who can not see that two or three pages of matter are less than seven.—We asked no terms of Elder H. but such as we were willing to accord to him, viz. equal space for both sides. To that he would not agree, but required about three times the space that Universalism was allowed. Query: Did he mean to concede by this, that two pages of Universalism were as much in weight or strength of argument as six pages of Methodism? If he did, then his terms were fair; otherwise not. Let him take which horn of the dilemma he chooses. He says that our proposition (allowing equal space to both sides), 'however 'fair for Universalism,' was not deemed 'fair for truth and honesty, hence the MS. was withdrawn.' By 'truth and honesty,' we suppose Elder H. means Methodism. Hence his meaning is, that Methodism needs three times as much space for its defence as Universalism does! But again Elder H. says of his wonderful production,

'On its appearance in its present form, Mr. Skinner and several others came out in 'great wrath' against the author and his production, in a series of articles in the Magazine and Advocate. Epithets, ridicule, and sophistry, spiced now and then with personal abuse, are among the leading features of their communications. They all agree in characterising 'A house upon the sand' as a very 'weak' and 'silly' production, and yet, for some reason, they have deemed it advisable to devote a liberal share of some six or eight issues of their paper, to the special consideration of the sermon and its author. Not less than fifteen columns, or five whole pages of the Magazine and Advocate, have been filled with the lucubrations of various reviewers. Mr. Skinner himself has given three or four articles, with the prospect of 'more anon.'

Indeed, Elder, are you not mistaken? 'Came out in 'great wrath'—Why, really, we should as soon think of being angry at the rain for falling, when it could not help it, as to get angry at Elder H. for the droppings or overflowings of his pen which, with all his free agency, he could not restrain. No, no, we are not angry at what a man can't help. If in any of the reviews of Elder H. that have appeared in our columns, he is made to appear ridiculous, it is not because of any epithets bestowed upon him, or any sophistry or personal abuse: for none has been employed against him: but it is wholly owing to the ridiculousness of his own positions in his pamphlet. And he should not complain that others have shown him up in his true colors. His 'House upon the sand' is verily a 'weak and silly production,' and judged alone by itself and its intrinsic merits, would be wholly undeserving of the notice it has received. It is the author's name and position before the public that gives importance to the pamphlet. The bantling would be unworthy of picking up, but for the reputation of the father. It is from the pen of the well known Presiding Methodist Elder, D. Holmes, and from this circumstance alone will be sought and read by many as a very important production. But after all, we think there has not been quite so much labor expended in review of the pamphlet as the Elder would have the public believe. In review of the arguments or pretended arguments of the pamphlet, there have been but three short articles, two from the pen of Br. A. C. Barry and one from our own. Several other brief articles from Br. Taintor and others in relation to the circumstances of the pamphlet's appearance, and certain erroneous statements of its author, have appeared in our columns, but not properly in review of the pamphlet, or its arguments. Again he says,

'But perhaps the most interesting feature in the whole performance, is the logic employed.

I believe, Mr. Editor, you have studied logic somewhat in your day; but it is never too late to learn, and I doubt not you will acknowledge yourself a mere novice in the art of reasoning, when you shall have examined a specimen or two from the Universalist school. Take the following. In reply to my argument, that, as the goodness, wisdom and power of God do not unconditionally secure holiness and happiness in this life, therefore, they are no infallible security, that all men will be holy and happy in another life. A Mr. 'A. C. B.' replies, that upon the same principle, there will be 'sick beds and opening tombs' in eternity.

Take an example from Mr. Skinner. The reply to my argument, that the will of God is not always done—in proof of which, I refer to Christ weeping over Jerusalem, because it resisted his will—and to the apostle, who said, 'I would that men pray every where,' &c., Mr. S. remarks—'Mr. Holmes' great blunder in the above paragraph, was, that he represents Christ and the Apostles to be God himself, and their wills, to be none other than his will.' Again—'Is it honest, for him to substitute the will of other beings, and then call it the will of God?'

There, Mr. Editor, beat that if you can. Surely the whole world must be Universalists now, since Mr. A. C. B. has discovered that there is a perfect analogy between a sick bed, and the punishment of the guilty sinner—between the principles of God's moral government, and the laws of the physical universe; and especially since Mr. Skinner has announced, that the will of Christ was not the will of God—that both Christ and his Apostles stood upon the same footing in this respect, and both were liable to be mistaken, thus stripping Christ of his divinity—the Apostles of their inspiration, and the Bible of its infallibility at a single stroke! But these are small sacrifices to make in support of Universalism. Whoever lives a quarter of a century from this, will see greater developments than these, in the same direction.'

On the above extracts we remark, that, notwithstanding Elder H.'s garbling, partial quotations, misrepresentations and affected contempt of the review by Br. Barry and myself, he can not refute, and dare not attempt to refute, a syllable we say. He does not attempt to show why analogy would not as clearly prove that 'sick beds and opening tombs' will exist in eternity because they do here, just as surely and necessarily as sin and misery must exist to all eternity, because, for wise and beneficent purposes God has permitted them to exist here. And when he attempts to throw odium upon us for maintaining that the will of God will certainly be accomplished, why does he quote a single sentence from us before and a single sentence after the proof texts we cited, and not quote or refer to a single text of Scripture which we quoted in proof of our position? Let the reader see above what Elder H. has quoted from us, and all he has quoted and then put in between the two sentences what we said in our review, (in No. 5, Jan. 30,) viz. 'Now the apostle might will, or desire a thousand things and not be able to accomplish one of them. And had our author forgotten that Christ expressly declares, 'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me—I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father that sent me'—that he prayed 'not my will but thine be done?' (Eph. i: 11. Dan. iv: 35. Isa. xli: 10. John v: 30. vi: 38. Luke xxii: 42.) Now why did our pious Methodist Elder leave out all this, quote the sentence before and the one after, and then charge us with maintaining 'that both Christ and his apostles—were liable to be mistaken, thus stripping Christ of his divinity—the apostles of their inspiration and the Bible of its infallibility at a single stroke?' Was he honest in thus garbling my argument and leaving out all my proof? This is Methodist piety and candor is it? Who is it that honors Christ and venerates the Scripture authority—he who quotes and relies on it, or he who intentionally leaves it out of the middle of a quotation because it proves him to be in the wrong? We truly venerate the authority of Christ and the apostles and the Bible, and it is on their authority that we predicate our faith that God 'worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.'

After the above specimen of the honesty and candor of Elder H. the reader will be prepared for the next trick of legerdemain played off by him on the readers of the 'Northern Christian Advocate,' viz: the re-publication of his letter to us, dated Dec. 22 and published in the 2d number of current volume of Mag. and Adv. of Jan. 9th with copious notes of correction from our own pen. He now republishes his letter without any of the notes or corrections, or without even informing his readers that any corrections had been made, when he knows that his said letter, without the notes, was calculated to convey erroneous impressions to the reader! Let our readers turn to the Mag. and Adv. of Jan. 9th, and they will at once see the correctness of this statement.

Appropos to the above course and conduct of honest Elder Holmes, he closes his article thus:

'An acquaintance with Universalism for fifteen years, and some experience in personal conversation and controversy with preachers and others of that belief, together with a perusal of their publications, have fixed the following impressions upon my mind in regard to this theory:

1. That it is essentially anti-christian in theory and tendency.
2. That its supporters pay but slight deference to the authority of the Bible, though they seek to cover the deformity of their system, with scriptural epithets, and evangelical phrases.
3. That its oracles know it can not be sustained by fair argument, in a fair way, and are very unwilling to make the attempt.

D. HOLMES.
Groton, March 12.'

To this last quotation it is sufficient to reply, that, while we have known some really honest and truly pious Methodist people, and a very few of their clergy of the same character, yet such instances are quite too rare—'like angels' visits, few and far between.' but candor and honesty compel us to say that an acquaintance with Methodism for twenty five years, and some experience in personal conversation and controversy with preachers and others of that belief, together with a perusal of their publications, have fixed the following impressions upon our mind in regard to this theory:

1. That it is essentially anti-christian, anti-scriptural, anti-human, and anti-moral, in theory and tendency.

2. That its supporters pay but slight deference to the authority of the Bible—none at all where it goes against their favorite dogmas—though they seek to cover the deformity of their system with scriptural epithets and evangelical phrases.

3. That its oracles know it can not be sustained by argument, in a fair way, and are very unwilling to make the attempt—seldom or never consenting to meet the advocates of truth on equal terms, demanding twice the room they will concede to their opponents, in the columns of the latter, and granting to the latter no room, in their own columns. If proof be wanting of the justice of these impressions and propriety of these remarks, it may be found in the article from Elder D. Holmes here reviewed.

SIGNING THE PROTEST.

The Trumpet of the 7th ult. announces that the Protest against Slavery will be signed by not less than FOUR HUNDRED of our clergy—and that it will soon be given to the world with this long list of names appended. This must be most cheering news to that portion of our denomination (which includes the great majority, I have no doubt,) who believe the time has fully come, when we should cast our moral influence against the institution of slavery.

J. M. A.

Since the above was prepared and sent by Br. Austin, the 'Trumpet' of later date (11th inst.) states that the number of signatures to the Protest is upwards of three hundred. Now as there are about seven hundred preachers in our connection, the presumption is that somewhere in the neighborhood of one-half have signed the Protest. Whether those who have signed, have acted more wisely than those who have declined signing, is a question, and different individuals will have different opinions. Br. Austin's and our own are known to our readers. There is no need of further argument or discussion. We design, from time to time, to announce the simple facts pertaining to the subject.

CAYUGA MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

It has already been announced, I believe, in the columns of this paper, that a Missionary Society was organized, some two or three months since, at a Conference of the Cayuga Association, held in Homer. At that time a Constitution was adopted, officers were chosen, and a general line of operations marked out. But to bring our plans to maturity and get into operations, it was judged expedient to call another Conference, at which there could be a more general attendance of the officers elect. Such a meeting was appointed at Ithaca. Unfortunately, circumstances were such that there were not a sufficient attendance to warrant the adoption of any decisive measures. Since the Ithaca meeting, the matter has remained in statu quo.

In the mean time there is a great call for the labors of a Missionary. In every portion of the Association, the brethren are looking for him, and anxiously awaiting his arrival, and are ready to co-operate in measures that shall give him an abundance of employment. Under these circumstances our worthy Br. A. G. Clark has consented to go on a missionary tour, for the present, on his own responsibility. It gives me great pleasure to make this announcement. Br. Clark is an able, faithful and successful messenger of the Abrahamic faith—he has the utmost confidence of the entire Association and of all our brethren who know him, and is peculiarly well calculated to build up our cause in the waste places of Zion. I trust he will be favorably received by our brethren, wherever he may make an effort to plant the good seed. Let our friends in different parts of the Cayuga Association, who may wish the labors of a Missionary, open a correspondence immediately with Br. Clark, at McLean, that arrangements may be made to supply them. It is also important that auxiliary Missionary Societies be formed by the brethren in the different towns throughout this Association, at as early a day as possible, agreeably to the provisions of the Constitution adopted at Homer.

A meeting of the Cayuga Missionary Society, will be called as soon as circumstances shall permit, when it is hoped measures will be adopted to carry its purposes into full execution.

DEATHS.

At Niagara Falls, March 22d, HARRIET M., only daughter of Mr. James M. and Harriet M. Blanchard, aged two months and one day.

Parents alone can realize the loss of one just blooming into life and beauty and promise. But cheerful may that hope and comfort be which resigns the beloved one into the arms of Him who blessed the infant as a fit emblem of the kingdom of heaven.

In Lockport, March, Mrs. DANIEL VANVALKENBURG, aged 28 years. She leaves behind a loved family of children and a provident companion who watched over her during a long and painful sickness with untiring fidelity.

Mrs. V., as a wife, was confident and amiable, as a mother most faithful and affectionate, as a neighbor and friend highly esteemed by all who were favored with her society and acquaintance. To a vigorous intellect were added moral and social virtues which rendered her an ornament to society, and beloved by her family. She made no profession of religion before the world, but her conduct was well worthy the imitation of every Christian. She possessed an independence of mind which led her to disclaim against all uncharitableness and to maintain sentiments of her own.

During the several months of her sickness, with the consumption, she manifested the most cheerful fortitude and resignation, and was calmly engaged in 'setting her house in order' for her approaching decease. When it was found that there could be no hopes of her long continuance, several well meaning persons became anxious that she should receive religious and clerical counsel, and the Baptist and Methodist ministers of the place were called in, as she had formerly attended the Baptist and the Methodist churches. But to those and to all others of a limited faith, she gave no heed, and requested at last that none of them should be admitted to her room. Dr. Tinkey of the Methodist church had talked to her of death as an awful event and warned her of the necessity of a preparatory change.

About this time she was visited by Mrs. J. P. Smith, an exemplary Universalist, and through her requested a visit from the writer. I visited her several times and found her mind and heart open to cheerfully receive the hopes and comforts of the Gospel, and she expressed the warmest desires to converse on the subject. New light seemed to dawn upon her exit, and she spoke with freedom of her departure. All fears had fled from her mind, and she calmly 'trusted in the living God who is the Saviour of all men.' From the several interviews which the writer had with her, even up to a few hours previous to her last, sufficient evidence was given that she passed away in the faith of a world's Saviour. And may that faith be the source of consolation to the companion and children of the departed, and the virtues of her life be emulated and cherished in sacred memory.

U. C.

At Reading, Steuben county, on the morning of the 26th of March, Doctor ANSON ANDREWS, in the 49th year of his age.

It would be impossible for me to give an adequate obituary notice of Dr. Andrews; to say that he was an honest man, an exemplary and consistent Christian, a constant and affectionate husband, a tender father, an unfailing friend, and a benefactor to the poor and distressed, would be but saying what every one already knows who has enjoyed an acquaintance with him. When alive he was loved and respected, and, now dead, lamented by all. The disease which closed his earthly existence was of about three years standing, and for the last year and a half, at times most excruciating; yet he complained not; nor did he murmur at his lot, or impugn the goodness of God in all his trials. In this world he possessed all that was necessary to endure life to him, but he could look forward by the assistance of that blessed faith which he enjoyed, to that better world, where sin, pain and sorrow shall never enter, but where love, joy and peace shall reign triumphant through Jesus Christ our Lord. Dr. Andrews died as he had lived many years, a consistent and well established Universalist, and as he expressed himself in his last days, 'As his bodily strength failed day by day, his faith in a world's salvation increased.'

Our cause in Reading and vicinity owed much to Dr. Andrews for its present standing, for he in sincerity and in truth loved the cause, and therefore was always in his place at the services of the sanctuary, always liberal in its support, and always encouraging others to do their reasonable duty to God and man.

But he has gone to be here no more with us in this world. An affectionate wife, an adopted daughter, together with brothers and a sister, with other connections and friends, are left to mourn his departure. But thank Heaven, they mourn in hope, being confident that what is their earthly loss is his heavenly and eternal gain.

His funeral was attended at his house on the 28th, and the writer discoursed from these words of St. Paul—'And he, being dead, yet speaketh.' Our prayer to the throne of grace is: that this affliction may be the means to increase in us all a more spiritual growth in righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.

THE PIONEER.

BY E. W. REYNOLDS.

Away, away to the matchless West,
A joyful band, we go,
O'er realms in richest verdure drest,
And realms chained down in snow;
O'er streams that calmly flow—
And o'er wild waters, lash'd to foam,
And rolling madly on,
Above which many murmurs come,
Like voices from deserted home,
To warn a daring son.

What cares the hardy Pioneer,
Though in his homespun clad—
Though hands and visage rough appear,
And his children dress in plaid—
What careth he (no looks are sad)
For the wealth of the eastern zone,
For gems that princes deck?
The wealth he has is all his own—
'Tis in the muscle and the bone!—
He fears no fortune's wreck.

Far away in the wilderness
We'll num'rous cabins rear—
Together join the gleesome chase.
Of buffalo and deer.
No tyranny we fear;
For here our stars and stripes shall wave
In Freedom's gentle breeze;
Ah! they shall float above the grave
Wherein are laid the true and brave,
And ride on all the seas.

And to our God temples we'll raise,
With grateful hearts and strong;
And oft our joyous hymns of praise
Shall echo deep among
The glens, where Nature's minstrels sung.
'Tis meet to offer up to heaven
Our tributes, free, sincere;
For though we tread the prairie soil,
Or on the woody mountains toil,
God guides the Pioneer.

Then away to the matchless West,
A joyful band we go;
The parting hands of friends we've prest,
And dried the tear of wo,
Which must at seasons flow.
Our hearts are light—our prospects bright—
And clear the way before:
Ere centuries are marked anew,
Republics shall the stranger view,
Upon this Western shore!

CONFERENCE AT SALISBURY.

The second Conference of the Mohawk River Association was holden at Salisbury on the 18th and 19th ult. We have had no definite account of it till now: we have just received a letter from Br. J. Douglass, from which we make the following extract.

(Original.)

Salisbury Centre, March 4, 1846.

Dear Br. Skinner—* * * * It is late at night, and I am tired, having just returned from attending a wedding, therefore I shall not be able (as this letter must go early to-morrow morning) to give you much of an account of our Conference, but will drop one or two hints in relation to it.

The storm had been tremendous, the roads were horrible, and such a being as a preacher was hardly to be expected. Tuesday night arrived, and no such being appeared in our midst. Wednesday morning presented few or no hopes—I began to feel as I will not now undertake to describe—it seemed inevitable that I should bear the burthen alone; when, just before half past ten, Brs. Hathaway, Whiston, Philleo, and McMaster came amongst us, as though let down from another world.

We went on—during the day Brs. Hicks and Parker came to our aid—I was relieved—anxiety and fear gave way to joy and gladness. In the evening we had an interesting social and conference meeting, in which several of our lay brethren and sisters took part and added much to its interest.

A Br. who had been a believer in the unhappy doctrine of interminable wo for a portion of our race, told us that he had been a believer in that doctrine seventeen years, during the most of which time he was a member of the Baptist church; but he had just become convinced that it was not taught in God's holy word; and he for the first time arose to tell his brethren that he had unwavering confidence in the love and goodness of God, and glorious hopes for the final reconciliation of all men to God, and the salvation of all the world.

He went on to say more that would be interesting to give you, but it is quite late, my head aches severely, and I must close.

Sermons were preached by Brs. McMaster, Whiston, Philleo, Hathaway, Parker, and Whiston again.

We had quite an interesting meeting. Some of the preachers got snow bound before they got home, and went visiting about on snow-shoes, &c.

Yours truly, J. DOUGLASS.

REV. MR. CONKLIN'S CHALLENGE ACCEPTED.

By the following letter our readers will see that Mr. Conklin has the long desired opportunity presented to him now of discussing the difference between his system and Universalism, for which he has been preparing for so many years. Br. Clark is an honorable, candid and fair disputant.

D. S.

(Original.)

Lockport, April 1st, 1846.

BR. SKINNER—Enclosed I send you a copy of a letter written to the Rev. Mr. Conklin of Warsaw, Wyoming county, N. Y., stating that Br. U. Clark was ready to meet him in discussion at any time or place that suited him, accepting the challenge which appeared in your paper of Jan. 9th, ult.—As I have never heard from the gentleman, I have thought proper to send the letter to you for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, hoping it may receive the attention guaranteed in the aforementioned article or challenge.

Lockport, Jan. 15, 1846.

REV. MR. CONKLIN OF WARSAW:

Dear Sir—I learn through a correspondent of the Magazine and Advocate of Jan. 9th, that you have expressed a willingness to discuss the merits of Universalism, should an opportunity offer, with any well recommended minister, having the confidence of the denomination. It is a matter of congratulation to see an announcement of this character, as a well conducted discussion may afford facilities for the diffusion of truth on a subject of a most thrilling interest to mankind. Your manifest willingness to engage in such a work has induced me to confer with the Rev. U. Clark of Lockport, and he has signified his readiness to meet you, provided preliminaries can be agreed upon offering equal advantages to both parties. Should an eligible location be desired, Lockport would in my opinion be the place; as it is a town containing about 9000 inhabitants, two Presbyterian churches, two Episcopalian, three Methodist, one Baptist, two Friends, one Lutheran, one Congregationalist, one society of Adventists, and one Universalist; the latter at present in a highly flourishing condition, with a rapidly increasing audience, under the pulpit labors and pastoral charge of Mr. Clark. The subject is now creating a lively interest in this place and all the neighboring vicinity, and while other principles are waning, those of Universalism are fast gaining confidence among the masses of the people. If it is your desire to labor against the influence of these sentiments, I know of no better or broader field than this. As evidence of Mr. Clark's influence, I may say that he has been made the subject of reference in the most popular desks of the village, and his labors are looked upon with an eye of jealousy and regret by those who conscientiously differ with him in regard to the Gospel. He has been put forward and sustained himself to the satisfaction of the denomination in several discussions, the most important of which was held in Clinton, Oneida county, in the summer of 1842, which lasted seventeen nights, at which time the principal disputant was Rev. Mr. Dwight, then tutor of Hamilton College, aided by Professors Smith and Bradford of the College, and Rev. H. Whitcher, Baptist, now of Rochester.—Should farther reference be needed, I would refer you to any of the prominent ministers of the Universalist denomination, in this State. Revs. S. R. Smith of Buffalo, D. Skinner of Utica, J. M. Austin of Auburn, J. S. Brown of Perry, A. Kelsey, of Pavilion, &c. The propositions to which he will agree are nearly as follows, subject to any consistent alterations or suggestions you may propose.

Questions.—Does the Bible reveal the doctrine of endless punishment? or, the final salvation of all mankind from sin?—each of these to be discussed separately, until the parties mutually consent to close, allowing each to alternate in half hour speeches, and at the conclusion of each question, allowing each five minutes separate from the regular time to make any corrections that may be necessary. After these questions are disposed of, any others, upon the essential points of difference between Orthodoxy and Universalism may be taken up, provided the parties shall come to terms.—Three moderators shall be appointed to preside at the discussion, one to be chosen by each party and the other to be one who stands neutral. The discussion may take place at any time within the year, that you may suggest. Should you object to Lockport as the place of discussion, you may propose any other place to suit the convenience of both parties. Should you consider Mr. Clark's friends the challenging party, they will be willing to allow you the right of any reasonable proposition you may desire to make.

Hoping that you will give me an answer on this important theme at the earliest opportunity,

I subscribe myself yours, respectfully,

CHAS. A. STEVENS.

THE MISSION OF JESUS.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

'The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.' Luke xix : 10.

The mission of our Redeemer is a subject that can not be too frequently contemplated, or thoroughly investigated. It is a subject every way worthy the most interested attention of every moral, accountable and dependant being, and peculiarly adapted to augment the moral enjoyment, as well as to extend the intellectual improvement of mankind. This, all professed believers in the Christian religion will readily admit. Yet, strange as it may seem, various and conflicting opinions have been and are entertained and zealously advocated, in relation to its nature, design and effect. We would by no means call in question the sincerity of any who happen to differ from us in their views upon this important subject; but we shall, nevertheless, claim it as our privilege to express the sentiments which we hold and delight to cherish in relation thereto. And we indulge the hope that we shall not be considered intrusive or dogmatical in using this common privilege, by any who may not be prepared to subscribe to the sentiments which we shall advocate. That charity which 'vaunteth not itself,' which 'rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth,' should be carefully exercised by all who love the Lord Jesus, and desire the promotion and success of his religion. Careful investigation and unprejudiced examination, are, in the present age of the world, the proper and indispensable means of arriving at a correct knowledge of Gospel truth; as well as of escaping the deleterious errors and oppressive delusions, of a religious nature, which abound in the world.

Without the prompt and faithful application of these means, even those extensive and astonishing improvements in the arts and sciences, which are now so richly enjoyed, would never have been achieved, and the intellectual world would at this time lie crippled and groaning under the darkness, the superstition and bondage which characterized the leaden ages of Popery, ignorance and crime. To raise the hoarse cry of 'heresy' and 'delusion' against any doctrine, particularly one that is not generally understood by the masses of community, whether it be a religious or philosophical theory, is descending to the basest depths of carnal policy, and pretty clearly shows, that those who pursue such a course of practice, especially among Protestants, are closely imitating that despicable conduct which they have so strongly condemned in the Catholics of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Let the good work of thorough investigation, then, go on; and let no one be afraid to hear the declaration and proofs of any doctrine, however new or unpopular. Truth can never be destroyed by error, any more than the sun can be blotted from the heavens by clouds and tempests. It may be obscured for a season in certain sections of the world; but it will soon break forth, when least expected, perhaps like fire temporarily buried in combustible matter, and shine forth with increased effulgence.

The propriety of the foregoing remarks is rendered obvious, by a reference to the moral and religious condition of the world at the time of our Saviour's advent, the powerful and virulent opposition that was raised against him, and the unparalleled success which attended the progress of his religion among mankind. But I will not detain you with any further prefatory observations, as it is necessary that we improve the time allotted us, in investigating the important particulars which appear to be most clearly embraced in the text.

The peculiar circumstances which called forth from the illustrious Founder of the Christian system, the declaration which we have chosen as a subject of discussion at this time, are briefly the following. Our blessed Redeemer, as we are informed, in the progress of his labors of love among his countrymen, 'entered and passed through Jericho,' an ancient city of Benjamin, about twenty miles east north-east from Jerusalem. And it appears that there was there a tax gatherer, or Publican by the name of Zacheus, who was in possession of much wealth. This individual, though despised and hated by the Jews, as were all the tax gatherers who preyed upon the nation by authority of the Roman government, had a very strong and laudable desire to see Jesus, whose wonderful acts had so excited the public mind.—But the concourse of people who pressed around the object of his curiosity, was so immense, and he being a man of inferior physical dimensions, it was impossible for him to obtain a sight of the Nazarene in the ordinary way. He, therefore, made his way in advance of the crowd, and ascended a tree that stood by the way in which the mass of human beings were moving. When our Saviour had arrived near the spot where the Publican had stationed himself, he looked up and saw him, and immediately said unto him, 'Zacheus, make haste and come down; for to day I must abide at thy house.' Upon this, the anxious, and probably surprised Publican, who was impressed, evidently, with higher and nobler sentiments and desires than his countrymen attributed to him, immediately descended from his elevated station, and received the 'Friend of Publicans and sinners,' with readiness and joy. But in a manner peculiar to pharisaic religionists, the multitude, when they saw the charitable condescension of Jesus, murmured and reproachingly said, 'He has gone to be a guest with a man that is a sinner.' But, as is usually the case with Pharisees of all ages and countries, who are groaning under a load of self-righteousness, and inflated with spiritual pride, those censorious religionists misjudged utterly the moral character of Zacheus; for 'he stood and said unto the Lord; Behold, Lord, the one half of my goods I give unto the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four fold.'

Here, my friendly hearers, we perceive the clear and conclusive evidence of a genuine conversion—a desire and determination to be useful to his fellow beings in want, connected with a firm resolution to repair, as far as possible, all former misdemeanors and improprieties of conduct. What a happy circumstance it would be if all religious conversions at the present day were proved genuine in a similar manner! But, alas! it is not our privilege to perceive much evidence of this convincing nature, in respect to the purity of modern conversions. But how was this conversion, in the case of Zacheus, effected? No tormenting fears of eternal burnings; no trembling and quaking in contemplation of the vindictive wrath and merciless vengeance of an offended God, appear in his eyes. He was probably aware that he had indulged a covetous, and perhaps a fraudulent disposition, which he had become convinced was every way inconsistent with the pure precepts and exalted examples of the wonderful personage whom he recognized as the true Messiah; and also with the principles of moral virtue, by which he had long been admonished to deal justly with his fellow men, and to show mercy to the poor. And under the influence of such feelings, his conversion was accomplished. The Saviour approved of it, as we learn from the following reply which he made to the penitent, as presented in the text and context. 'And Jesus said unto him, this day has salvation come unto this house—for the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.'

These are the circumstances connected with the important portion of Scripture selected; and it will be our design to give a plain, consistent and scriptural illustration of the momentous truths embraced in the words of the Saviour, which we have chosen. In pursuance of this design, we shall endeavor to exhibit the true nature and extent of that salvation which the Son of God came into the world to accomplish.

There is no theological subject which, in our opinion, has been more generally misunderstood by the Christian public, than that of Gospel salvation. The great majority of Christian teachers and believers, have for centuries maintained, that the great object of the Saviour's mission, was, to appease the flaming wrath of Jehovah, against humanity, by voluntarily enduring the tremendous penalty of an infinite and broken law, thereby saving the condemned and trembling penitent from all that equitable punishment which his previous crimes have deserved—from interminable wretchedness and despair in the future world, and to raise him, in opposition to the demands of divine justice to bliss and glory immortal. It will be perceived therefore, that the general view which is entertained relative to the design of the Messiah's mission, is, that he came to save such as embrace his religion, from the merciless and endless pains of hell, in the future state, which all men justly deserve, and millions must eminently suffer! But where, permit me to ask, do we find any evidence to support this view of that salvation which Jesus came to accomplish? I am aware that abundant and very conclusive testimony is embraced in most human creeds and time-worn traditions.—But I mean to ask, in what part of the Bible do we find the least degree of evidence in support of this gloomy and unjust hypothesis? I boldly answer, no where. The sacred oracles are as silent as the grave, in regard to any such object of the Saviour's mission. I will not detain you, however, with an exposure of the unreasonableness of the above 'vain tradition,' but will proceed to an explanation, according to the Scriptures, of the nature of Gospel salvation.

That the salvation which Jesus came into the world to accomplish, is a salvation from sin, is abundantly evident from several direct and plain declarations found in the New Testament. We will invite attention to a few of these declarations. From the first chapter of Matthew, we learn that an angel appeared unto Joseph in a dream, and addressed him thus, concerning Mary the mother of Jesus. 'She shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins.' It may be remembered that this angel received his theological education in the matchless institution of heaven, and therefore, the doctrine which he preached to Joseph, should receive our unqualified credence and approbation. What doctrine did the angel declare? Did he intimate that the subject of the Messiah's mission, was designed to reconcile God to his disobedient children—to placate his burning ire; and by his sufferings and death, to satisfy that divine justice which had doomed the whole human race to ceaseless despair and agony—to save the sinner from a flaming, withering hell? Oh no, nothing of the kind! He instructs Joseph what to call the child. He orders a name that at once indicates the office to which he was appointed by the Father Almighty. 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus,' which is by all defined to mean Saviour. And why did he command Joseph to give the child this very significant name? The answer is given; 'For he shall save his people from their sins.'—This looks so much like Universalism, that I can not flatter myself to believe all my hearers will give it their approbation. But it is, nevertheless, the truth, if the angel of God may be relied upon as competent authority.

There is other testimony, however, that must not be omitted in this place. The precursor of our Lord, in directing the attention of his countrymen to the humble Nazarene, uses language which certainly goes to confirm the conclusion, to which the language of the angel has conducted us. He says, on a given occasion, 'Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world.'—What! take away the sin of the world! Does the Baptist mean to teach that this was the design and object of the Saviour's mission? He could have intended nothing else; and he was the greatest prophet that existed before Christ. He declares it, and calls the attention of mankind to the joyful fact. How perfectly this declaration of John harmonizes with the preaching of the angel above noticed. The angel says, 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins,' and the Baptist says, 'Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world.'

Now, if Jesus, in the exercise of his power and authority, given him of God, shall finally succeed in taking away the sin of the world; then he will succeed in saving his people from their sins; then will he succeed in seeking and saving that which was lost, and universal salvation must prove true. But to inverse the position. If Jesus does not succeed in seeking and saving that which was lost; then will he not save his people from their sins; then he is not the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world. And if this position be the true one, what becomes of the teachings of the heavenly messenger, and the great prophet of Jehovah?

But again: it must not be forgotten that an angel appeared to the trembling shepherds, and after calming their agitated bosoms by a tranquilizing 'fear not,' says to them, 'Behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people; for unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour which is Christ the Lord.' And suddenly there were with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men.'

In the preceding citations, the nature of Christian salvation is clearly set forth and described. It is shown to be a salvation from sin, and consequently from condemnation and sorrow. In accordance with this joyous truth, the great Redeemer himself says, in the synagogue at Nazareth, 'The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised.'

In the blessed Gospel of the grace of God, then, we may contemplate a salvation, not from the wrath and vengeance of Jehovah—not from the roaring surges of an ever-burning lake in the future world—not from the punishment of our crimes, which divine justice demands—but from a disposition to violate the righteous institutions of heaven. Such a salvation is in harmony with that law of God, which requires that we should love God supremely, and our neighbor as ourselves, and one jot or tittle of which, shall not pass away till all is fulfilled. Such a salvation meets the wants of our ignorant and sinful race, enlightens their understandings, controls their unruly passions, purifies their hearts, refines their affections, elevates their characters, and transforms them into the moral image of their Maker! Who that has experienced this salvation, even in that limited degree which pertains to the present state of human being, does not estimate its benefits, its assurances and joys, above all price and comparison? Who can be so bound up in the shackles of error and prejudice—so inflated with self-righteousness—so infatuated in the support and defence of religious systems of human invention, as to oppose, or even think lightly of such a glorious and necessary plan of salvation as this? Angels rejoiced in its annunciation to the world; and 'there is more joy in heaven, over one sinner that reforms, than over ninety and nine just persons that need no reformation.' Yes, my hearers; God the judge of all, Jesus the ransom of all, all the blessed spirits that surround the throne of the Eternal, and all benevolent beings in this imperfect state, rejoice in the progress of this all-gracious deliverance from the bondage of iniquity—this moral renovation of human nature.

But it is time to inquire into the extent of this salvation. It is an inquiry by no means new, or uncommon; yet this should not preclude its repetition. It is a subject that will bear to be often pressed upon the attention of the public; and this is a sufficient reason for introducing it here.

Our text informs us that Jesus came 'to seek and to save that which was lost.' We have seen in what manner he is to save the sinner, and now it is important that we should be satisfied in respect to how many he will save from sin, and raise to perfection and spiritual bliss. In our endeavors to solve this momentous question, we shall make a direct appeal to the sacred Scriptures. We might, without doubt, arrive at a just conclusion by a brief process of philosophical reasoning. We might remind the intelligent hearer of the acknowledged facts, that all mankind were in the same moral condition when the Messiah made his appearance—that he came to commend the love of God to sinners—that he tasted death for every man—that he died for our sins, and was raised again for our justification. And from these facts united, we might reason ourselves into the logical conclusion, that if Jesus succeeds in seeking and saving any, he must succeed in seeking and saving all. But I will not detain you with such process in gaining the proposed object; for there is a shorter and more conclusive method of arriving at the truth.

We affirm, then, that the salvation of God, through Jesus Christ, is to be as extensive as humanity, and as lasting as eternity. In support of this position, we may be allowed, in the first place, to refer to the eloquent language of ancient prophecy. The holy prophets, under the enlightening influence of the divine spirit, looked forward to the advent and kingdom of God's anointed, and to the consummation of his mediatorial reign, with holy joy, unwavering confidence, and unutterable rapture. And in their attempts to describe the universal conquest of redeeming love and Gospel grace, they use language like the following. See Isaiah xlii: 1-7. 'Behold my servant, mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my spirit upon him; he shall bring forth judgment unto the Gentiles,' &c. 'He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth: and the isles shall wait for his law,' &c. 'I the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thee hand, and will keep thee, and will give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison and them that set in darkness out of the prison house.' In the 53d chap. same book, we have a very effecting description of the sufferings of Christ—the wickedness of his nation—the benevolent object of his mission, and the certainly of its full and perfect accomplishment.—Among other interesting truths, it is expressly declared, that 'the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hands'—that 'he shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied.' In the 7th chapter of Daniel, it is said, 'I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him: And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.' Again; in reference to the mission of the Redeemer, Isaiah further says, 'In this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees; of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall be taken away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it.'

I will not detain you by quoting any more of the abundant testimony which the Old Testament contains, but will invite your attention to a few declarations of the apostles, in reference to this part of our subject. St. Paul informs us that God 'hath highly exalted him—the Messiah—and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus, every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' If it be asked how this universal conquest is to be achieved, I answer, by a universal reformation and reconciliation. The proof is contained in the following language of the same inspired author. 'He, God, hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence, having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, even in him.' The same apostle also says of Christ, 'who is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world. Peter contends for the 'restoration of all things.' Jesus himself informs us, that 'the Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands,' and that, 'all which the Father giveth to me, shall come unto me; and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out,' giving as a reason, 'For I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me; and this is the will of the Father that sent me, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but raise it up again at the last day.' And Paul affirms, 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive,' that 'God may be all in all.'

But we will not multiply testimony on a subject so clear. The conclusion to which the foregoing evidences, from both Testaments, irresistibly bring us, is in happy accordance with the whole plan of divine grace, the revealed purpose, will and pleasure of God, the ardent desire of universal humanity, and the fervent prayers of all Christians.—Nothing short of universal salvation from sin and sorrow, can satisfy the claims of the divine law, or fulfil the requirements of our Father in heaven! It is as plain as that the Bible is true, that Christ came to seek and save a lost, sinful and perishing world from moral night and ruin, by enlightening their minds, purifying their affections, and giving them that 'eternal life,' and joy, and peace, for which they were created. And it is equally plain, that he 'will finish the work which the Father gave him to do,' and at last, deliver up his kingdom to his Father, that God may be all in all.

Here is a theme that must inspire the heart of every true believer, with the highest degree of gratitude to God and the Saviour—with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Here are considerations which speak directly to the heart, and are wisely calculated to soften the emotions of the soul, and win the moral affections to God and virtue.—We contemplate Jesus as the 'Author and finisher of our faith'—as the spiritual head of every man. And we receive his precepts as being in perfect harmony with the gracious object of his mission, and the will of the Deity, relative to the human family; while to us, his examples of forbearance, forgiveness and mercy, prove him to be the sinners friend and 'Saviour of the world.' Friendly hearer, do you not hope that the conclusions at which we have arrived are according to truth!—that the time is coming when sin shall be finished, transgression ended, universal righteousness forever established, and the prophecy sealed up!—that the revealed will of God may be fulfilled, the dying prayer of Jesus answered, and heaven filled with a redeemed universe of intelligences, who shall live on eternally in joy, rejoicing and divine praise? I am persuaded that this is your ardent desire, at least. O, then, no longer strive against the testimony of God's word, and the convictions of your own hearts. No longer give countenance and encouragement to systems and inventions of aspiring men, which rob God of his declarative glory, the Saviour of his purchased possession, and man of the buoyant hope and divine assurance of a Saviour's love, and grace, and power to save. And while you reflect upon the wisdom and benevolence of God, and his Son Jesus Christ, let the spirit of grateful devotion dwell in your soul, and praises upon your lips.

'Let all the forms which men devise,
Assault my faith with treacherous art;
I'll call them vanity and lies,
And bind the Gospel to my heart.' AMEN.

CHRIST'S CHARACTER.—AN EXTRACT.

 But that image—what is it? Oh, the tongue of an angel would be inadequate to the task, of portraying it by human language in all its fulness of beauty and glory! He constantly went about doing good; pouring the oil of gladness into bosoms, probed to the bottom by sorrow; living a life among sinners, yet entirely freed from sin; being tempted at all points, but rising superior to temptation; suffering contumely and malice, yet meekly bearing his bosom to their barbed shafts; remaining faithful to his filial duty, from the first to the last hour of his life; exhibiting a radiant hope of man, as endowed with invisible powers of progress; giving the world rich instructions of the Father's love-fraught government; bearing his example on earth, a living testament of the beauties of truth and holiness; blessing those even, who piled up their curses and malediction upon him; inculcating lessons of peace on earth, with the devoutest piety and patriotism conjoined; living in accordance with the purest benevolence and justice, those brightest jewels in the casket of time; manifesting to us in himself that high point, at which the refined and spirit-born human character may come;—and finally, breathing forth his whole soul in prayer to God, for the forgiveness and blessing of the greatest of sinners, who had sought his death with a fiendish eagerness for years, who resorted to open perjury and treachery to accomplish it, and who at length pierced him with iron, suspended him on cross-bars between the blue heaven and the smiling earth, and insultingly mocked and tormented him, till his freed spirit winged its flight upward to the blissful realm. Oh, what beauty and sublimity and power of virtue is there here! what inviolable integrity! what a life-like truth! what warm and gushing love! The heavens still smile serenely, but such another life—such another death—the world will never see. Human language is too weak, to express our reverence for that God-like character. Thought rushes after thought, and struggles for utterance; but still deeper thoughts arise, and for want of egress, they cluster around the image of the Saviour enshrined within; and our whole mind—our very soul—bows with fervent reverence before the spotless character of the Son of God.  J. UNION DEDICATION.

The Union Berean Hall recently erected in Honesdale, Wayne co., Pa., was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God on Saturday the 11th inst. A sermon was preached in the forenoon by Elder J. N. Goff, of the Christian Denomination, and another in the afternoon by E. E. Guild, Universalist. Elder William Lane, (Christian) and Rev. Christian Sans, (Lutheran) participated in the services.

The Hall was built by the friends of liberal Christianity of various denominations, but principally by the Christians and Universalists. It is under the control of the latter, but is to be open and free to all sects when not occupied by them. The Hall is fifty-five feet long by twenty-five wide, has a pulpit, a gallery for the singers, is done off in a plain but neat and tasteful style, and is capable of seating from 400 to 450 persons.

The friends of liberality in religion in Honesdale are few in number and limited in means, have suffered great inconvenience in consequence of having no place in which to hold meetings except the school houses in the village. Hence we feel to rejoice that there is now one free house of worship in this sink of iniquity and ignorance, and hot bed of bigotry and intolerance, the doors of which will not be closed against the honest believer in Christ and Christianity, of whatever sect or denomination. EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM BR. ORTON.

Groveland, Mich., April 6, 1846.

BR. WALKER.—Our cause is moving onward in this country: there is a spirit of inquiry abroad in the land—people are getting more willing to hear and receive the word. Many that have sat in darkness are receiving the light and giving the more earnest heed to the things that are spoken.—The soul destroying doctrine of endless misery is only kept alive by protracted meeting efforts, which is about in its death struggle, for the spirit of the age is against it, and it must soon be only among the things that have been. Even so let it be.

AMOS ORTON.

FORCE OF PARENTAL EXAMPLE.—All parents wish their children to be virtuous, respected and happy. Why then will not all parents lead their children in the path of virtue and honor? Parent, are you walking that beautiful way? Do you appreciate the force of your example upon your children? This subject is well illustrated by a simple incident which we have seen narrated in an exchange paper. The writer says,—'About ten years since, I was called upon to help one of my neighbors raise a barn frame, and after the hands were collected, the rum bottle was passed, as was customary in these days, and after the men had drank, the rum was handed to some boys who were collected and looking on. They all took it except one little boy about seven years old, who refused to take any. He was urged very hard to take a little, but all to no purpose. His mind was fixed. He was then asked to give some reason for not drinking, and the little lad bravely replied, 'Papa don't drink, and I won't.''

FAITH AND HOPE.—If, as Paul defines the word, 'Faith is the substance (or assurance) of things hoped for'—can that be the true Christian Faith which contemplates a result in the eternal destinies of any men not hoped for? Can any one hope for annihilation? Nay. Can any one hope for endless misery? Nay. Then Faith in either of those doctrines, can not be the Faith which Paul contended for. Don't forget, reader, 'Faith is the substance of things hoped for.'—[Banner.]

UNIVERSALISM IN THE WEST.—An Orthodox colporteur, or book distributor, writing from some portion of the West, probably Michigan, as published in a late No. of the Louisville 'Presbyterian Herald,' speaking of Universalism, among other things, says:

'Universalism seems to be gaining ground here. The 'Exponent,' published by an Association of Fourierites, the organ of Universalism in this State, is taken, and individuals are supplying themselves with Universalist books with a zeal that shames the apathy of many professed Christians in the purchase of religious books.'

We are exceedingly glad to learn from such a source—the testimony of an enemy, that our sublime Faith is gaining ground in the far West; that the Universalist paper is patronized and read, and that the believers are zealous in diffusing a knowledge of their sentiments by books, etc. The Editor of the 'Herald' is entitled to our thanks for communicating this information to his numerous readers.—[Star in the West. E. M. P.]

Br. E. E. G. your letter is received.

The last number of the Christian Freeman contains the list of the signers of the Protest against Slavery. The whole number, all told, is three hundred and four—less than half of the preachers in connection.

Br. J. B. Sax is informed that we have no recollection of ever receiving the article he says he sent us some time since entitled, 'Answer to L. I.' We think it must have miscarried.

The Christian Contributor and Free Missionary, an Abolitionist Baptist paper, has lately been removed to this city and is edited and published weekly by Cyrus P. Grosvenor. So there are now two Baptist papers, this and the old Baptist Register, published in Utica. The two papers in the same place we think will not tend much to promote harmony among Baptists.

MARRIAGES.

In Deerfield, on the 16th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. JOHN ELLIS to Miss MARGARET JONES.

DEATHS.

In Fulton, Oswego county, March 23d, Mrs. MARY R. JEFFERDS, in the 74th year of her age. The deceased had been a believer in the doctrine of impartial grace and salvation from her youth. And all the trials and afflictions through which she was called to pass during her sojourn in this world, this doctrine imparted to her strength and consolation. During her last sickness, which, though short, was severe, she manifested that calm resignation to the will of the Lord, and unshaken confidence in his goodness and mercy, which gave full assurance, that she was in possession of that hope, which faileth not, 'when life's last embers burn.' She even expressed a desire to depart and dwell where 'the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.' Of such a life and death as hers, it may emphatically be said, 'It is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die.' Her funeral was attended on the 24th and a discourse delivered by the writer from 1 Thess. iv: 13, 14.

L. M. HAWES.

In Victor, March 25th; MISSOURI ANN, youngest child of Lester P. Frost, aged one year and nine months. Innocence perpetuated.

On the 3d inst. in the town of Russia, at her father's house of consumption, Miss CHARLOTTE, daughter of Seeley and Martha Lockwood, aged 18 years and 19 days; she endured for almost nine months the pains and afflictions of her disease with becoming patience and resignation; she retained her reason while life lasted, and gave evidence of an unshaken faith in the doctrine of universal salvation. It was her delight in health, her comfort in sickness, her hope in death. She has gone we hope to a happier world than this, and left us to worship in the sanctuary of our God without her aid, where it was once her delight to be. She was lovely and beloved. All was done by her parents and others that could be to render her stay with them as comfortable as possible, and when the days were fulfilled that were appointed her, she fell asleep without a sigh or a groan; and according to her request the funeral was held at her father's house on Sunday the 5th, and a discourse delivered by the writer to a crowded congregation. J. D. HICKS.

In Venice, March 30th, LOUISE JANE, daughter of Mr. Garra Kimball, aged about 4 years.

In Genoa, April 2d, Mrs. PHEBE KING, aged 19 years.

In Arcadia, Wayne county, March 13th, SARAH M., daughter of Reuben Holton, aged 18 years and 19 days.

Many are the tears that will be shed over the early grave of one, who by her sweet and amiable disposition, her modest and gentle deportment, won the affections of a numerous circle of kindred and friends. She bore her long illness with Christian patience and fortitude, and died a happy and firm believer, in the doctrine of God's impartial grace and infinite goodness. L. M. T.

FRAGMENTS.

Of our Father's vast creation,
Earth's children are as one small group—
The offspring of a Parent's love;
Yet a created, living thought
Of the one living and true God.

Would mind e'en through its clayey veil,
Read the volume nature opens;
'Twould learn and know that much of what
Is, in this our age, mystery,
Ultraism, and heresy,
Is crippled mind, blind bigotry,
And never deems those of God-born truths
Learned on earth, will ope to man a Higher heaven.

If finite thought one gleam could gain
Of great Infinitude's design;
'Twould turn aside and blush for shame,
That selfish pride, dark ignorance,
So long had bound it in their chain.
Know,—simple laws rule greatest ends,
By simple means to men revealed!
'Tis for their plain simplicity,
At them he scoffs and turns aback,
Nor deigns to seek God's deepest truths
In humble walks clear and even—
Quite too clear for human vision—
Though they guide him up to heaven.

Toward all created things man's Regard should be a holy love,
That on the altar deep within,
Glows a pure Promethian fire;
That warms the heart to Christ-like deeds,
Expands the soul with thoughts high-born,
As beings of impress divine,
Worthy of their celestial home
And God their sire. LAY PREACHERESS.

THE MISGUIDED DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

'Gold pays the worth of all things here;
But not of love—that gem's too dear.'

CHAPTER III.

'Oh! mother,' said Alethea as she entered the room in which Mrs. Morse was seated, 'I have just received a note from Mary Gray, requesting me to be present on the occasion of her marriage.'

'Mary Gray to be married! Is it possible! When?'
'On the third week from the present, and who do you think is to be the groom?'

'I'm sure I can not guess. I did not know that she was holding a correspondence with any one. Pray who is it?'

'See here, I will read the note.' 'Friend Alethea:—On the third week from the present, I am to take upon myself the solemn, though I trust, pleasing duties of a wife, and have only to ask—will you be present?—And may I not hope, that knowing as you do, the sacredness as well as delicacy which I have ever attached to subjects of this kind, you will not consider the silence which I have maintained, a breach of intimate friendship? George Graham is the one to whom I have 'plighted my troth.' He may not be such an one as you would have chosen, as a husband for your friend, but as for me, may God enable me to imitate his virtues, and to become worthy of his noble heart. Thine—MARY.'

'And who in pity is George Graham?' asked Mrs. Morse.

'Why, do you not remember that young mechanic who was here last winter? He was second or third cousin to Mary.'

'Yes; and I should choose that he was transferred to fourteenth, rather than become any nearer related! And can it be possible, that Mary Gray, is to marry a mechanic?'

'As much as I should expect of her; such strange notions as she has. Why, I once heard her say, that she should prefer for a husband, a man who had not a farthing if he had energy, a good mind, and strict moral feelings, to one who was worth millions, if on these points she could not rely. These were her very words, and I thought then that some day or other she would be led astray by such feelings.'

'And I should not wonder if you had imbibed some of her notions,' remarked Mrs. Morse, sarcastically.

'Why, mother, what do you mean?' asked Alethea, at once noticing the expression of her mother's countenance.

'I mean that Maylon Gray has something more than friendship in his heart for you, and though you can not fail to see this, yet you receive his visits cordially and seem pleased with his company.'

'But I never have for a moment entertained an idea of marrying him.'

'I am glad to hear you say so,' said Mrs. Morse, taking a chair close beside her daughter. 'I have something to say to you, which as I did not know your mind on this point, I did not know how to commence;' and she went on with a long and ingenious story which we have here neither time nor patience to recount. Suffice to say, that during a visit which Mr. Gardner had of late made to her dwelling, she had consented that he should marry her daughter; and promised to speak with her upon the subject. In this conversation she introduced it to her, as she had ever done in an ingenious manner to him, though she was careful to keep this fact from Alethea and urged her to yield her consent.

'But mother,' said Alethea after patiently listening to her, 'he is so much older than I.'

'Well what if he is older, age is but a fleetly objection in such an instance as this,' she answered accompanying the last sentence with a kind of significant wink.

Alethea sat for a time in silence, while her mother proceeded to recount the many and great advantages which she would reap by pursuing such a course, and to contrast what her situation would be with that of her friend, the wife of a mechanic.

'And do you really suppose,' she at length asked, 'that Mr. Gardner wishes to marry me?'

'Wishes to marry you! yes indeed, and he would treat you like a queen. And only think what a splendid fortune you would have. If you do not improve such an opportunity you will be unlike many young ladies I will assure you.'

Alethea leaned her head forward upon her hand, almost bewildered. Her heart beat rapidly, though she hardly knew why, and almost unconsciously her thoughts reverted to Maylon. 'If he only had the Gardner place,' mused she, but startled that such a thought should enter her mind, she covered her face as if fearful that her mother would read it. During the remainder of that day she could scarcely keep the subject from her mind. The prospect of so much wealth was a dazzling temptation, but when her thoughts turned to the means by which it must be obtained, she involuntarily shrank from them.—Her mother saw her indecision, and fearing the result, resorted to every argument within her reach. She reminded her daughter of the small sum now available at their command, and hinted that the months might be few, ere she would be called upon to labor with her own hands for her support, and then in anticipation portrayed her regrets in case of refusal.

But why speak farther, of the disgraceful course pursued by one whose conduct reflects so dark a shade upon the character of the mother. Ere another day had flown, Alethea had avowed to become the wife of Chauncey Gardner and appointed a day for the ratification of that vow. Her mother commended what she called her daughter's wisdom, and rejoiced in prospect of her situation. She adverted continually to the extraordinary joy manifested by Mr. Gardner, when Alethea made known to him her decision, as a proof of his future devotion to her wishes, and even plan'd visits for her to 'the city,' and to several of the most fashionable 'watering places.' Neither did she forget to mention the anticipated marriage of Alethea's friend. 'She was really surprised,' she said, that Mary would marry a man who she supposed was not worth a penny for she was sure she might have done better, and always closed her remarks by saying—'But Mary is not so much to blame; her mother has always taught her to be so domestic. I'm sure I can't get along with such people's taste.'

LIFE: ITS SEASONS.

Many and varied are the pictures which have been drawn to illustrate the life of man. Sometimes we hear it compared to a dream, which lingers a moment in the mind, and is gone, leaving scarcely a trace of its existence behind. Sometimes to a taper, whose flickering ray seems every moment threatened with extinction. And then again to the tender grass, which 'in the morning groweth up and flourisheth, and in the evening is cut down and withereth.' But there is another, which, though familiar to all, can not with too much frequency be presented to the mind. It is this—The Seasons of the Year.

Spring, with her innocence and mirth comes first. Her green leaves, and delicately painted flowers, her childlike changes from sunshine to shower, and shower again to sunshine—her fragrant breath—her singing birds, and the freshness which her touch infuses into every thing, combine to send a thrill of joy into our hearts, and make us wish that it always, always could be Spring. It is the time when the buds and flowers though sweetest, are most tender, and when all that is green needs most the cheering sun and gentle rain, and feels most keenly the effects of coldness and blight.

Childhood with its winning simplicity stretches out its tiny hand, and leads us on to the stage of life. Its artless smiles, its confiding manners, and the ring of its merry laugh, steal of their 'own sweet will' into the dark recesses of the heart, and pour in a bright and cheering ray. It is in childhood that the seeds of character are sown. Then, impressions imbibed, are indelibly fixed. Then, a kind word or approving smile, may lead the mind from darkness to light, and incite to exertions unknown to all but the child itself. And as gentle words have a more enduring impression in this, than any other period, so also do words of an opposite character. As the former, like the sunshine and shower, cheer and stimulate, so do the latter, like the chilling winds, depress and blight.

Summer, with its rich and gaudy dress comes next.—The flowers have lost their modesty, and each seems striving to surpass its neighbor in gaiety. The waving corn too, wears a gayer garb, and as it basks in the sunshine, seems wishing for a still more golden hue. Each blade of grass thrusts up its bearded head, eager to rise higher than the rest. The birds have forgotten their merry songs, and are busy with their nests. And the hum of the bee as he buzzes past our ear, says what others act, that Summer's days are days of activity and ambition.

Youth is the Summer of man. The simplicity of childhood is thrown aside, and he rushes on with eagerness to the stage of active life. His hopes are the boldest, and in the busy scenes which surround him, he forgets the days that are past, and thinks only of those to come. He feels a longing for something which he himself can not define, but feeling assured that the future is fraught with happiness, he presses forward. Youth is attended with follies, as is Summer with weeds, and as in Summer, the plant may be watered, and the weed uprooted, so in youth, may virtue be nurtured, and vice exterminated.

Autumn with her wealth now follows in the train.—The golden corn is ripened. The rosy fruit is bending the trees. The forest touched here and there so beautifully by the frost, is scattering its nuts on the yellow ground. The earth has completed her vegetable work, and invites the husbandman to thrust his hand into her lap. Every thing has reached its highest degree of excellence. Through Spring and Summer each constantly enlarged. Now they are fully matured, and we know that soon they must shrink and die.

Manhood brings us into the prime of life. From boyhood man has been toiling onward and upward, and looking to the bright future for the fruition of his hopes. Now his thoughts dwell on the present. His bodily faculties have become hardy by continued exertion, and his mental matured by the teachings of experience. It is here we discover what use he has made of the advantages youth threw in his way—how his mind was stored and disciplined—how his passions checked and subdued. If the one has been enriched and the other controlled, we behold him a blessing to friends and an ornament to society. If another course has been pursued, and he is a degraded being, still our simile fails us not, for though in a degraded state, it is his zenith. The remaining steps of life tend downward.

Winter with his searching blasts, comes quickly on.—His breath has nipped even the few flowers that were left. He has killed the once green leaves, and is hurrying them over the frozen ground to their graves. He stifles the voice of the merry brook, and strives to stay its course with his icy chains. And he stretches his cold white robe over the whole earth.

Old age is the last lot of man. The loneliness and dreariness with which it is attended steal unawares upon him. When he was young, time passed so lazily by that his memory noted all that transpired, but now it flies so swiftly, that he knows nothing of the present, and thinks only of the past. His friends, like the leaves, have one by one dropped away. His blood runs so slow, and his pulse beats so faint, that they ever remind him of the frozen brook, and he sighs as he recollects that no Spring to him will ever return, and that death alone can relieve him of his sorrows. Age has furrowed his face, bent his form, and shaken his tread. And as Winter whitens the earth with his mantle of snow, so has old age scattered its silvery locks over the head of man. F.

Utica, N. Y.

We copy the following from a late number of the N. Y. Tribune. It is from the pen of its Editor, and having thus stated the authority, we leave our readers, specially those who may be skeptical upon the subject of Mesmerism, to make their own comments.

MESMERISM AND SURGERY.

At the invitation of Dr. Homer Bostwick, of No. 75 Chambers street, we witnessed on Friday a Surgical Operation upon a patient in the state of Mesmeric Sleep.—The operation was performed at No. 152 Church street, and consisted in the removal of an adipose tumor from the back. The patient was a colored woman named Emeline Brown, a servant in the family of Rev. Dr. Higbie. She was magnetized by Daniel Oltz, of No. 80 Chambers street, assisted by E. J. Pike. After the patient had been thrown into the proper state, Mr. Oltz left the room, but Mr. Pike remained and held her hand during the operation. The object of this, as we understood, was to ensure her continuance in a state of perfect unconsciousness. Only five minutes were occupied in magnetizing the patient. She sat in a chair, her head thrown forward and resting on a table. There was every indication of a state of perfect unconsciousness.

Dr. Bostwick, before commencing the operation, stated that he had been entirely skeptical on the subject, but had desired in this instance to subject the claims of magnetism to a practical test. Mr. Oltz, the magnetizer, had not known the patient until some three days previously, and had magnetized her only some four or five times, at Dr. Bostwick's request. Mr. Pike had never seen her previous to the time fixed for the experiment.

The magnetizer having pronounced the patient in the proper state, Dr. Bostwick (assisted by Drs. Samuel R. Childs and John Stearns,) proceeded with the operation. He first made an incision about eight inches in length across the tumor, and then proceeded to remove it by the usual process. The operation lasted three minutes and required no small amount of cutting. We stood within two feet of the patient and watched her narrowly. There was no muscular twitching and no manifestation whatever of sensibility to pain, or even of consciousness. A physician examined the pulse and said it was quite natural, though somewhat feebler, perhaps, than usual. A dead body could not have exhibited stronger insensibility to pain. The tumor weighed ten ounces. The wound did not bleed near as profusely as such wounds do when the patient is in a natural state. The whole operation of removing the tumor and dressing the wound occupied but half an hour.

The wound having been dressed, and the garments of the patient adjusted, Mr. Oltz awoke her by a few passes, which occupied less than a minute. Her appearance was much like that of a person suddenly aroused from ordinary sleep. Questions were put to her implying that the operation had not been performed, and that she would have to be magnetized again. She said she would rather submit to the operation in the natural state than wait any longer. She was asked if she did not know that the tumor had been removed. She replied in the negative, and with every appearance of perfect simplicity and integrity, declared that she had felt no pain, and was wholly ignorant of whatever had transpired during her sleep.

There were present as witnesses, including several Reporters for the Press, some dozen persons. Among them we name the following gentlemen:—Dr. Eleazer Parmly; Edward A. Lawrence, from the rooms of the Home Missionary society; J. R. S. Van Vleet, from the office of the Courier and Enquirer; E. A. Buffum, Reporter for the Herald; Dr. H. H. Sherwood; Dr. Edward Spring; Oliver Johnson, Assistant Editor of the Tribune. There were others whose names we did not learn.

We have no comment to make upon the facts thus stated, except to express our perfect conviction that there was no collusion. In fact we see not how deception could have been possible under the circumstances. The most obstinate skepticism must yield in the presence of facts like these.

We should think the following report of the Committee to examine the religious faith of the convicts in the Michigan State Prison, would lead some of our reasonable Partialist brethren, to think at last, that Universalism does not engender all the evil that exists in the world, and that all the State prison birds are not hatched in that nest. This report is taken from the Primitive Expounder.

STATE'S PRISON RELIGION.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE THE RELIGIOUS FAITH OF THE CONVICTS IN THE STATE PRISON.

The Committee visited the prison on the morning of Feb. 15th, and in order to expediate the examination divided into two parties, and visited and questioned each prisoner separately in his cell. One of the Committee, (Mr. Irish,) afterwards examined those he did not when the Committee were present. His report embodies the whole.

I attended with the Committee and heard the examination of 88 of the prisoners, of whom only one ever mentioned or alluded to Universalism—he said that he had never made any profession of religion, that one of his parents was a Universalist, and that he had been brought up under the influence of that doctrine, and believed it as near right as any.

R. THORNTON.

As one of the Committee appointed by the State Convention of Universalists, in Michigan, to ascertain the religious sentiments of the prisoners in the Penitentiary at Jackson, I herein present the following results of my examination.

I questioned 38 of the 126 men confined as convicts. My questions to each individual were, 'What were your religious sentiments previous to your imprisonment?—What were your religious teachings? What religious meetings did you prefer?' I found 15 who were brought up Methodists, and preferred the Methodist meetings, 2 Episcopalians, in the same way, 2 Presbyterians, 3 Roman Catholics, 3 Baptists, 4 Deists, 5 who said they had no religious faith whatever, and 4 who said they preferred to attend Universalist meetings; but had read little or nothing concerning Universalism, had heard very little preaching, knew very little of the doctrine, and cared little or nothing about it.

One young man, the son of a Presbyterian clergyman, sentenced for 20 years, was so certain the doctrine of endless misery was true, that he appeared to feel himself insulted when I asked him if he believed it. He said, 'Do you mean to ask me if I believe the Bible?' No, I told him I meant to ask him if he believed the Bible taught it? 'Yes, of course it does.' C. P. WEST.

In company with Mr. Titus, the Agent of the Prison, your Committee would say that all the convicts were questioned as to what their religious faith was. And we find that they stand in the following order. We find that 67 are not professors; and 26 are Methodists, 4 Presbyterians, 11 Roman Catholics, 1 Shaker, 1 Congregationalist, 5 Baptists, 1 Dutch, 1 Dutch Reformed, 2 Lutherans, 1 Christian, and 1 Greek.

There were no Universalists; but one was found who acknowledged that his mother was a Universalist, and he believed that doctrine as right as any; at the same time he said he had never made a profession of religion.

RIAL IRISH.

Br. THORNTON:—Br. Irish has been with Mr. Titus and examined the prisoners that Br. West questioned, and he has the authority of Mr. Titus for the foregoing.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The entire movement of the present age, if it be not indicative of advancement, is at least clearly enough one of innovation. It has attacked almost every thing, and in some instances overthrown institutions and usages sanctified by time, and rendered inveterate by long habit. Individuals and even multitudes have thought, who never thought before; and men have narrowly and cautiously looked into subjects—some of which have been regarded as beyond their sphere, and others too sacred for human speculation. When, until within a quarter of a century past, has the major portion of the whole community, seriously and earnestly considered the importance of properly educating and training the young? When, except within the same period, has the public mind evinced any direct interest in the treatment of the guilty, or the discipline of the prisoner? When, until the present age, have men presumed to think or say, that the infliction of the mildest forms of punishment, infallibly tended to the diminution of crime? These are now among the most important and absorbing subjects of public consideration.—But never before have they so much as moved the surface of the public mind. Individuals have at different times, thought and acted with a view to draw attention to them, but their efforts and their views have extended little further than their personal influence, unless we regard these as the germs whose development was reserved for the present age.

From all that appears then, we are warranted in believing that this widely-diffused spirit of inquiry and investigation has produced the best practical results. Truths have been developed, which if not absolutely new, were not generally known nor acted upon. It was not so much as imagined by the multitude, that children could be governed, or induced to behave respectfully, without being occasionally beaten and punished severely. And so effectually was the general mind imbued with this idea, that children themselves seemed to deem it necessary, and usually took care to deserve the infliction. But parents or masters are no longer thought delinquent in duty who venture to treat them more like rational beings, and extend to them a more uniform kindness and tenderness.

It was not known to past generations that the insane could be restrained and controlled without the aid of strait-jackets, whips and chains. Men theorized upon the successful operation of kindlier measures, till theory ended in experiment. And the experiment has demonstrated that in nearly all instances, the most intractable as well as irresponsible of all the classes or individuals of our race, submit with affectionate gratitude to the harmonizing influence of kindness, and assume a respectable and even wonderful self-control. It has been proved that it is no longer necessary to crush the temper and the violence of the maniac by the weight of physical power—and that to do so, is to confirm and render hopeless an evil that philanthropy seeks to cure. So obvious has all this become, and so generally is it understood, that it would be difficult to find a community that would not be horror-struck at sight of the treatment formerly—and even lately employed for the management of the insane.

Immemorial opinion and custom, have endeavored to maintain, that penal laws were effectual, only in the ratio of the severity of their sanctions. Hebrews and heathens, Mussulmen and Christians, have forever entertained the same views and acted upon the same principles—and still crimes have been committed in the face of impending torture, with a recklessness and frequency that bid defiance to terror. Thefts, robberies and murders have been committed in the very presence of the administrators of the law; and in sight of the gibbet, where yet trembled its guilty victim in the agonies of death! It was therefore evident, that the experiment of all past time in the use of extreme punishment for offences—had failed to prevent crime or to ensure the safety of society. And there were those, who convinced of this great and imposing truth, called for the experiment of milder laws and mitigated punishments. The inquiry was sent abroad throughout the community—whether it was expedient or safe, to trust to the efficacy of sanctions and measures less stringent and terrible? And a response has come back, that shows how true humanity is to its sympathies; how certain it is, that right and truth are alike consistent with our reason and our feelings; and how surely the death penalty will be ere long, erased from the catalogue of human punishments in the Christian world.

By whatever name we designate these general movements, this truth is manifest—that views in relation to some of the most important subjects which interest society, are now not only prevalent, but popular, that only a few years since, would have been deemed unworthy of toleration. Opinions and laws, that twenty five years since, would have been regarded as preposterous or dangerous, have been proved to general satisfaction to be—neither visionary nor unsafe. And unaccountable as it may appear to some, it has been satisfactorily demonstrated by experiment, that even the abolition of capital punishment has been succeeded by the diminution of the crimes for which it was inflicted.

I have been led to make the preceding remarks, by an incident, which I deem worthy of public consideration; and commend to the special regard of those who legislate for the American people.

During the past winter, after giving two public lectures on the subject, I had occasion to spend a few hours in circulating the State society's memorial for the abolition of capital punishment. I took the principal, or Main street in the city of Buffalo, passing up one side and down the other about one third of a mile, asking subscriptions of all without reference to religious opinion or party politics. The result was alike gratifying and surprising.—For out of one hundred and fifty men to whom application was made, only fifteen refused to give their signatures! At the same time, a very large proportion of the talent and worth of that part of the city, will be found to have sustained the Memorial. And that district probably includes a majority of the professional men of Buffalo.

We may not perhaps, assume the above proportion, as the standard of public opinion in the State of New York, on the subject of capital punishment. If such were the fact, it would prove—what without a majority of ten to one is probably proved, that the masses are generally in all public reforms—in advance of their rulers.

LETTER TO BR. GROSH.

MY DEAR BROTHER—

It was with no little sorrow and regret that I observed in the Magazine of the 3d inst., a letter from you to our mutual friend A. S., relative to the question of License or No License which is soon to be decided by the voters of the various towns of the state of New York; whether we shall or shall not longer be sufferers by the continuance of that system which by law privileges houses to sell that which, for the time being, ruins both the souls and bodies of men. At the present crisis we are in need of all available aid, and hence regret deeply indeed, to see so strong an influence thrown against us as the name and opinions of our respected friend; and as some parts of your letter seem to be based upon misapprehension, the privilege is humbly begged of submitting a few remarks for your serious and candid consideration, fully believing that were you upon the ground and acquainted with all the circumstances, those fears so frankly expressed would certainly not exist.

I. Temperance men have not abandoned the old ground or forgotten the principle of moral suasion. We have ever acted, and do now act, upon this principle so powerful in its nature to reclaim our poor and unfortunate brother who has become addicted to habits of intemperance. We yet go to him in kindness, friendship and love, and take him by the hand as a brother man, and use the utmost persuasive efforts to lead him back to the pathway of rectitude and sobriety; and he who states that we have abandoned this ground, is either ignorant of the purport and direction of our labors or wilfully deceptive and an enemy to that glorious reformation, which during the last few years has blessed, and is now blessing, the inhabitants of our beloved land. Nor are we going to establish a law compelling our brother, who may be addicted to habits of intemperance, to live a life of sobriety. There are now in various parts of the state, laws punishing men with imprisonment for being found intoxicated in the streets, and yet laws protecting those whose influence and traffic make the said men drunken! We declare this to be upon the wrong principle, and our labors are being put forth to reverse this order of things, and we have yet to learn that this is in opposition to, or not in perfect agreement with, the great principle of the Washingtonian reformation.

II. When we look around for the reformed inebriate where do we find him? We observe him exposed to temptation by men's standing at the corners of the streets, and there supported and sustained and backed by the law of the land, endeavoring to induce him to return once to the intoxicating bowl; and those who have a knowledge of the strength of that appetite within the reformed inebriate, at least for a long time after the period of his reformation, know that it is almost if not quite impossible for him to resist that temptation. Let one fact speak for itself, and there are a thousand such facts or more, within the boundary of the state of New York. In this town, during the temperance movements of 1841 and '42, some twenty inebriates were reformed, and for a long time maintained their integrity; but now we find but two or three of them who have withstood the powers of those who are licensed to sell ardent spirits. All but two, have fallen victims to that temptation placed before them by those men who can plead the sanction and aid of law in enabling them to undo what temperance men have done. In this state of things what shall be done? and what can be done, but to bring in law to protect the reformed inebriate from falling a victim to that traffic which for a few dollars and cents may send him to the common jail and his wife and children to the county alms house? If our esteemed friend can devise and convince us of better means, which can be adopted, to accomplish this work, we shall most assuredly be ready to follow the course pointed out, but until that time comes, the banner which has been unfurled must float aloft in the breeze, its motto to be read by foe as well as by friend, viz: 'Moral suasion for the rum-drinker, and legal suasion for rum-seller.'

III. Another reason why the publication of that letter is a source of regret, is that the law has already been passed and referred to the people for their decision, and that decision is soon to be made, and one or the other party must triumph; and which party would our friend wish to see in the ascendancy? Would he rather see the friends of the venders and drinkers triumph, than the friends of temperance? I can not believe that he would, and hence why give those opinions which are to weigh so heavily against us at the polls? Had those opinions been published to the world before the enactment of the law, no complaint would have been made; but why, on the eve of the election as it were, throw those opinions before the public which are to exert so powerful an influence against the progress of the temperance cause? It seems to me that this is a course highly inexpedient and unwise, and I believe that upon due consideration my esteemed friend and brother will so acknowledge it to be.

Trusting that the above remarks will be received as they have been penned, in friendship, kindness and love; and hoping that the Editor will close the columns of this paper against all farther discussion upon the question soon to be decided at the polls, I remain, as I ever have been,

Affectionately and fraternally yours,
Oxford, April 5th, 1846. SCHUYLER J. GIBSON.

[Original.] INQUIRIES.

BR. SKINNER—I have been a reader of the Magazine and Advocate (when I could get it) ever since I came to America, which is now upwards of twenty years; but now I am a subscriber, and the perusal of it has taught me to believe, that when the Son has given up the kingdom to the Father, the whole of the Adamic family will then bask in the sunbeams of His glory. Of the general plan of this great salvation I am now clearly satisfied; (for I no longer grope in Calvinistic darkness, of which doctrine a brutal mind can only entertain such an idea and a savage only defend it); yet there are expressions made use of in prayer the meaning of which I am at a loss to comprehend, such as, 'May our sins be all washed away through the blood of Christ,' comparing the cleansing to the removing a spot out of a garment by the use of a liquid; and as this can not be the meaning, I have lately thought it might mean, by the doctrine which Christ preached while on earth, and as a manifestation of the truth thereof, he sealed it with his own blood on the cross. But if I have got a wrong view of the expression, I sincerely wish to be corrected. Again, we sinners are told to come boldly to a throne of grace, and yet this is only to be done in the name of Jesus. This I must confess I do not thoroughly understand. Dear Sir, if you will make a few remarks on the above, it will be truly gratifying as it will save me from exposing my ignorance at home and for the same reason I only give you my initials.

R. Mc.

REMARKS.—The expressions noted above are Scripture phrases, as we read of Christ, that he hath 'washed us from our sins in his own blood.' Again, 'These—have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.' And again, 'The blood of Jesus Christ—cleanseth us from all sin.' Rev. i: 6: vii: 14. 1. John i: 7; and in many other passages, similar phraseology occurs. The language, like much of the ancient Hebrew and other Oriental languages, is highly figurative or metaphorical. Yet its meaning is not difficult of apprehension to those who attentively study it, and compare scripture with scripture. When Christ said, John vi: 53, &c. 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.' &c., his meaning was not obvious to his disciples, and gave offence to them.—He then said in explanation, (verse 63), 'It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life.' The idea was, not that the literal flesh or blood had any efficacy in themselves, but as the blood is the life of the body, so the words or doctrine communicated by Jesus were the life of the soul. This doctrine being pure, and the doctrine of life, cleanses the soul from impurity and gives it new life. Our correspondent had nearly arrived at the true meaning of the expression he quoted.—Christ's doctrine was not only life-giving, but was sealed by the life-blood of Christ.

The next expression noticed by our correspondent, about 'coming boldly unto the throne of grace, and only so in the name of Jesus,' we conceive will need but little explanation. Peter declares, Acts iv: 12, 'there is none other name (or power) under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved.' And Jesus declared, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me.' He being properly the mediator, and the only mediator, between God and men, the only true way and life, it is therefore only through him, that we can truly come to God, and as he has revealed God as a kind and beneficent Father, we are exhorted to come boldly, or with filial confidence, to God through Christ, or in his name, spirit and power.

An attentive and prayerful perusal of the Scriptures, and a careful comparison of one portion with another, will obviate many seeming difficulties and obscurities, and make the Bible appear, as it truly is, a most consistent and glorious revelation of truth to man. D. S.

The following notices of Br. Sawyer's recent visit to New York, and of Br. O. A. Skinner's settlement in the Orchard street church, and Br. Harris' re-engagement with the Elizabeth street church, we doubt not will be interesting to our readers generally. We copy from the N. Y. Christian Messenger.

A VISIT FROM BR. SAWYER.—Last week the numerous friends of Br. Sawyer, in this city, were gratified with a visit from him—his first since he removed to Clinton, in Sept. last. And in truth, it partook of old times, to see him in the Orchard street pulpit, and to hear his voice once more from thence.

At first he thought it would be impossible for him to remain over Sunday, as the new term of the Institute was to open on the 8th inst., and there was much labor on his hands in preparing for it, so notice was given for a lecture from him on Thursday evening, 2d inst. This was necessarily limited, so far as his old congregation was concerned, as their house was closed on the Sunday previous in consequence of some repairs that were going on. Nevertheless, a full house greeted him, and he gave them some earnest and wholesome advice on the subject of Education—exhibiting the great importance—the absolute necessity, even—of more attention to this subject on the part of Universalists. And to show, in some slight degree, the appreciation of his remarks, by the audience, at the close of them, a collection was taken up amounting to One Hundred and Fifty Dollars! This money goes to the Theological Fund, from which he is to receive his salary of $500 per annum for superintending the Theological Class. It is proper for us say, that he knew nothing of the plan of taking up this collection till it was announced at the close of his remarks. And when it is understood that there were not over twenty individuals—probably not over twelve—in the house, who knew anything about it, it will be regarded a very creditable thing to the audience, and must be a gratifying testimony to Br. Sawyer of the feeling existing towards him in this city, in his present responsible position.

Br. Sawyer was finally persuaded to tarry over Sunday. He preached to a very crowded house in his old church, on Sunday afternoon, and to the Fourth street society in the evening.

The visit has been a gratifying one to his many friends here; we doubt not it has been equally so to himself—we hope so, at least—and it will be productive of great good. He will visit us again, in May, to preach Br. Skinner's Installation sermon.

BR. SKINNER'S SETTLEMENT.—We have before announced Br. Otis A. Skinner's acceptance of the pastoral charge of the Orchard street congregation in this city, late charge of Br. Sawyer. He was here, and entered upon his duties as pastor, last Sunday; preaching in the morning upon the Duties of a Minister, and in the evening upon the Duties of the People. Somewhat after the fashion of the incident we have somewhere read of a minister's preaching to the old, and the young, and the sinners, of his congregation, we attended in the morning to hear of the Minister's duties, but let our other self go in the evening to listen to the people's duties! (However, we could not both attend.) The morning discourse we know was a capital one, and we are assured that the evening discourse was also capital; so if both minister and people heed the instructions, they can not but get along capitally. Indeed the society has now a fair prospect of a season of prosperity. If all concerned but do a simple duty, it will be abundantly realized.

Br. Sawyer, as stated elsewhere, was happily present, and preached in the afternoon. To more than one it was a pleasant coincidence that they thus met together; and heartily was the new pastor commended to the love and confidence of the society, by one who had labored so long and so faithfully before him. It would be needless to follow out the long train of reminiscences which the occasion was calculated to call up in some minds. It is sufficient, that the sun of prosperity (to a cause which alone can afford hope and consolation to man) is rapidly gilding the horizon, and just in proportion as that sun approaches the zenith, will all the attendant gloom of trial and sacrifice recede and finally disappear.

Br. Skinner will be absent two Sabbaths this month—possibly three—when he will be permanently settled down.

THE ELIZABETH STREET SOCIETY.—This society at its late Annual Meeting, extended a unanimous invitation to Br. Harris to re-engage with them as pastor of the society, which he has accepted; his former engagement only filling out their regular fiscal year. The prospects of the society are now, so far as we can learn, quite encouraging. At the late letting of their pews, we understand several hundred dollars worth more than the usual amount, were taken up the first evening; and the amount now we believe ranges considerably above the whole amount they have generally let heretofore. So let the good work prosper.

CHRISTIAN LIBERALITY.

On Friday, the 20th ult., I was called to attend the funeral of an interesting daughter of Br. Smith, of Weedsport. The Methodist clergyman of that place, Rev. Mr. Dunning, kindly consented to open his church for the exercises. He received me with the politeness of a gentleman and Christian—accompanied me to the church, and willingly took part in the services. I take pleasure in recording this act of Christian liberality. It stands in marked and beautiful contrast with the illiberal and Pharisaical proceedings at Morrisville, on a similar occasion a few weeks since. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.'

DEATH OF REV. DAVID BIDDLECOM.—By a letter from Br. H. A. Goss to the Editor of the Luminary, dated the 3d inst., we learn with surprise and regret that Br. D. Biddlecom has gone to his grave. We had not heard before but what he was in perfect health. Br. G. says,

'Our brother David Biddlecom, has gone to his long home. He died at his residence in Phelps, Ontario county, this morning at six o'clock. I was with him when he died. Last Sabbath a partialist preacher called to see him, who was requested by Br. B. to proclaim to the world, this truth, viz., that he died as he had lived, a firm and happy believer in the doctrine of God's impartial grace and unbounded love. The funeral will be attended to-morrow.'

THE STAR IN THE WEST.—No. 1, Vol. ix in the enlarged (folio) form, has made its appearance. It is now about the size of the Trumpet. Two dollars a year in advance, or $2.50 after six months. Success to the Star.

The March and April (double) number of the Ladies Repository is issued and is as good as usual.

Harpers Publications.

Nos. X and XI of their new Miscellany is DARWIN'S VOYAGE OF A NATURALIST, in two Vols., 12mo. one of 350 and the other 312 pages, neatly put up in cloth. It is a 'journal of research into the natural history and geology of the countries visited during the voyage of H. M. S. Beagle round the world, under the command of Captain Fitz Roy, R. N.' By Charles Darwin, M. A., F. R. S. Want of time to give these volumes a proper examination for the present forbids us giving experimental testimony of the value of the work, but the tables of contents lead us to judge that it is both a highly useful and instructive, as well as interesting narrative, to admirers of descriptions of natural history and adventure, in wild and uncivilized countries and among similar inhabitants.

ELIZABETH BENTON, or religion in connection with fashionable life, is a neat 12mo. volume of 187 pages.—As we have not time to read it we give the reader the preface entire and leave him or her to judge of the merits of the book by that and its title.

'The imagination was not given to man in vain. Rightly used, it may yield an innocent enjoyment, and give illustration and enforcement to important truths. The following tale is an essay toward its appropriate use.—With respect to the success of the essay, the public must decide.'

Nos. 75-76 of the ILLUMINATED SHAKESPEARE is published and contains a large part of 'Coriolanus,' with notes and commences the tragedy of Julius Caesar. It sustains its character for beauty of execution with former numbers. 25 cents at Beesley's.

No. 79 of the Library of Select Novels is the COMMANDER OF MALTA, by Eugene Sue. 25 cents at Beesley's.

Br. George Rogers who has been very dangerously sick in New York for some time past, we are happy to learn by the Christian Messenger, is now convalescent, or at least considered by his physician as out of immediate danger.

The Committee on Capital Punishment in the Legislature of this State have reported in favor of the abolition of the death penalty. The Editor of the Tribune thinks they have neglected the matter so long, or rather that it is now so late in the session that nothing will be effectually done in relation to the matter during the present session.

THE WATER DROP AND THE OCEAN.

The mist, from off the mighty main,
Arose high in the air,
And in a little time it formed
A cloud of beauty there.

The cloud was wafted far away,
'Till o'er the mountain tops,
Then on them gently sprinkled down
Its shining crystal drops.

Then in the crevice of a rock,
A drop its fellow met;
These gathered more as they coursed on,
And formed a rivulet.

The tiny stream a fellow met,
In ev'ry rocky nook,
And in the vale beneath they formed
A pretty limpid brook.

The little brook ran dancing on,
With many a merry leap,
'Till lost amid the waters of
A mighty river deep.

The river then rolled proudly o'er
Its broad and rocky bed,
'Till lost within the ocean broad,
The water's fountain head.

Thus we may trace the water drop
From out the wat'ry main,
Throughout its rough uncertain path,
Back to its home again.

So will it be with man: for like
The drop of water bright,
Will he return to God, the source,
And reign in living light.

IT IS ENOUGH.

That the false doctrines and creeds which have been promulgated—by those who have been the professed teachers of truth, are a fruitful cause of unbelief we think is self-evident to every thinking and reflecting mind. In order therefore to win over our fellow men to a belief in the truth, is it not our duty to present such evidence to their minds as shall be best calculated to do away their former errors and prejudices, and relieve them from those dismal apprehensions respecting futurity under which they are suffering. By referring to the account of the mental sufferings of the ancient patriarch Jacob on account of the supposed death of Joseph by being devoured by an evil beast, we may form some faint idea of the sufferings of those who suppose that many of the human family are to be tormented world without end by their imaginary beast or devil. But when the truth was presented to Jacob that Joseph was still alive and Governor over all the land of Egypt, and the evidence came with a force that could not be resisted, (by the sight of the waggons that Joseph had sent) then it was that the spirit of Jacob revived, and he said, it is enough, Joseph my son is yet alive I will go and see him before I die. Now if those of our brethren whose faith is limited to the salvation of only a part of the human family, could be brought to a full and firm belief in the final salvation of the whole human race from sin and misery, and raise them to holiness and consequent happiness, would it not be enough to satisfy the most enlarged desire of any rational and good being? This is what all true Christians pray for—all of every Christian denomination are laboring to accomplish it. And could they believe that the object for which they labor could be attained, and their prayer answered, we think they would exclaim with the good old patriarch Jacob, it is enough to satisfy the desire of every human being.

But let us look at this subject in another and different light. If the popular theology of the present day were true, is it enough to satisfy even those who are its most zealous advocates? If they could be sure of their own salvation (of which according to their theory they cannot be,) are they sure of the safety of their near and dear connections? Does the husband possess a faith which will embrace the wife of his bosom in the arms of everlasting love, or does he feel assured of the salvation of his own children; and if he could be sure of the welfare of even these, is this enough to satisfy him? And could his faith even embrace all those of his own religious creed, would this be enough to satisfy his desire, or to buoy him up in his passage through the dark valley of the shadow of death? Can the truly good man depart in peace, whose religion teaches him that millions of the offspring of God will be doomed to excruciating torments as long as time shall endure, or the throne of God stand?—Methinks this sentiment would not be enough in the hour of death.

Again, there are those who believe that death closes our existence; that man is ushered into this short state of being for no other purpose than to live out a short period of time in this world, while his mind is impregnated with a longing desire after immortality, a desire to form near and dear relations of life, all to be forever extinguished in death. That God has implanted in him reasoning faculties which raises him far above the brutes, only, for the purpose of sinking him in the dark gulf of annihilation. That he is to be parted from all that is near and dear to him, to lie down in an endless sleep. And can it be said that this theory is enough to satisfy this longing desire after immortality? We know that many have been led to embrace this opinion, in consequence of the false garb in which Christianity has been presented to their minds, by those who have been its professed teachers.

Have not they represented the author of all things as an unworthy and implacable being who has forced us into an existence under circumstances that will prove an endless curse to millions of his offspring, instead of representing him as 'good unto all, and his tender mercies over all his works?' This no doubt has been a fruitful cause of unbelief, and has driven many to the cold regions of infidelity, and to discard the truth of divine revelation. And is it not enough to rend asunder every tie that binds us to earth, and drive us to the frigid regions of infidelity and despair?

But thanks be to God, it is enough to know that we have a spiritual Joseph who is yet alive, and is at the right hand of God; one who can have compassion on the ignorant, and those who are out of the way, who is acquainted with our infirmities, and whose last prayer upon the cross for his enemies was, 'Father forgive them for they know not what they do.'

FREE AGENCY AGAIN.

On reading over again Br. Scott's reflections upon the doctrine of free agency, I have determined to write one more short article, and should it appear to Br. Scott as an emanation of the most obtuse intellect he will excuse me from all culpability, seeing that I could not avoid willing to do so. In Br. Scott's first article, he tries to reduce the doctrine of free agency to an absurdity, by showing that 'a father who desired the happiness of his children, would not grant them the free use of intoxicating drink, knowing their inclination to use it; nor would he give his child its choice between a cup of milk and a glass of alcohol.' Why? Forsooth, because it would give the child liberty to sin, or to transgress a law that exists in his own nature. 'This would be to charge the parent with inconsistency, to say the least.' Now I ask Br. Scott, what would be the charge against the father, if he should hold his child, and pour the whiskey down his throat against the will of the child? or, if by circumstances over which the child had no control, the father should determine his will to drink it, and he could not avoid willing to do so? Br. Scott says in current Vol. No. 13, 'God is a sovereign; he doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth.' Right; but is it his will to govern man by coercive power, or compelling influences? or by moral law, originating in principles of moral fitness, that are found in the divine nature and may be assigned as reasons for the enactment of such laws? And if man has not the power and liberty to obey or disobey, the laws which constitute the instrument of divine government over him, where is his power to form a moral character? How can moral turpitude attach to his acts or volitions or 'motives'?

Again, our author says, 'God declareth the end from the beginning.' Right. We believe that God always knew what use man would make of his free agency; that he would transgress when he ought to obey and might do so; that Judas would betray his master for thirty pieces of silver, and then repent and carry back the money; and also that the Jews would crucify the Saviour, &c., and therefore he inspired the prophets to predict those events and others, and these predictions are standing monuments of the truth of divine revelation. But an apostle says, that 'had they known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.' How will you make them criminal for an act done through invincible ignorance? If God's knowledge of events amounts to a decree, then there is not a moral agent in the universe; God himself acts by this necessity, for he can no more change the foreseen events than the weakest being in the universe.—Now what is the practical difference betwixt having no God, or one that can not make one hair white or black? Some have looked at the foreknowledge of God, until they have so strained their mental vision that they are like the old lady gazing upon the ocean, who exclaimed, 'I can a-l-m-o-s-t see a ship.' The conviction to my mind that my moral actions are free, is as clear as the consciousness of my existence. I have as good evidence of the former as of the latter. If I am deceived in all this, then I am not the actor or agent, and God is the author of all human actions. God says, he is not the author of confusion, but there is confusion. He can not lie; but there is lying. He tempteth no man with evil; but men are tempted with evil, and do evil. Now if mankind are deceived in this matter, Br. Scott will do the world a great favor by undeceiving them; he will absolve every conscience from all sin, at once: there will be no more remorse, shame, fear, or penitence; he will effect the salvation of all men from sin at once, by fathering all sin (if man acts can be called sin) upon God. This may look like a short and easy way to save the world, to some, but it will find some difficulties to encounter in the consciousness that man bears in his own bosom, that he ought to acknowledge the paternity of his own sins and not charge them upon his heavenly Father.

REVENGE.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

Christian charity will not permit us to revenge; that is, to injure others because they have injured us. Here let me point out the distinction between vengeance and justice;—between revenge and punishment. Revenge is inflicting evil and pain upon another just for the sake of injuring him; punishment, or chastisement consists in inflicting pain for the good of the punished. See Heb. xii: 10. Vengeance demands the former,—justice requires the latter. The former is inflicted for the purpose of making a man more wretched; the latter for the purpose of reforming him, making him better, and consequently happier. A kind, doting father might inflict pain upon his beloved child, if he was persuaded that pain would be for his child's good; but he could never do it for revenge, or just to make his child miserable, without any prospect of doing it good. I will appeal to every parent, if I am not right in this matter? You will answer unhesitatingly that I am. Well, just so Christian charity, which causes us to love our fellow men as we do ourselves, must permit us to punish an offender, if he was under our authority, and if we were certain that said infliction of pain would be for the good of the punished. Yea, charity would demand the infliction of this punishment, under these circumstances; but it does not demand, and it will not permit us to inflict pain upon our brother just for the sake of injuring him,—making him wretched, without any prospect of doing him good. This I need not stop to prove—no Christian will deny it.

There are many, even among professing Christians, who frequently disregard this rule. They say of a neighbor, he has done so and so to me, and I will do thus and so to him. He has injured me, and I will injure him. And they will do it; inflict pain upon a fellow man solely for the purpose of injuring him, and without intending to benefit him thereby in the least. Now, this is the very conception which we have of the infernal. What do we understand by the term devil, as commonly employed, unless we mean by it a being who delights in inflicting evil and misery upon other beings, merely for the sake of injuring them, and not to do them good? We may also attribute to them other traits of character, but I would ask if this is not the first thing we think of when the character of a devil is mentioned? And when we hear of a man who is very cruel; who delights to torture others just to make them wretched, and not for their good, do we not always characterise such conduct by the term infernal? that is, resembling the actions of devils? Be sure we do, and justly.—Then shall any of us be guilty of the same conduct? Shall we inflict injury or pain upon our fellow men, without hoping or intending to benefit them, or ourselves by so doing? You will all answer me no—charity will never permit it. We must do unto others as we would that they should do unto us. We must not inflict upon them any evil, merely for the sake of making them wretched—that is for revenge. Then pray God, my friends, that we may keep these righteous resolutions always. That we may never be found disregarding the requisitions of Christian charity; I am sure you must all admit the correctness of the foregoing propositions and conclusions; you must all admit that charity requires of us never to inflict pain upon a fellow man, unless we know it will be for his good.

Now apply this principle to theology, and what will be the result? If the little spark of love which we as Christians ought to possess, will not allow us to inflict pain upon our fellow men, further than we see it will be for their good,—will that infinite flame of love divine, forever burning in the bosom of our God, permit him to torture his own children, any farther than infinite wisdom shall see it will be for their profit, in making them partakers of his holiness? If that drop of charity, which came down from heaven, and took up its abode in the Christian heart, will not allow us to inflict pain unless it will benefit the sufferer,—can God, the living fountain of all charity, punish without intending to reform the sufferer by the punishment? and if he intends to do it will he ever be disappointed? Who will dare say that even a charitable, benevolent man loves his brethren better than God loves his children? better than that God who is all love and mercy? Or that we are required to deal more kindly with one another, than he will deal with us? Who dare say it? Not one durst?—What Christian charity requires us to do to our neighbors, our heavenly Father will much more abundantly do for us; and what charity forbids us to do to them, he will never do to us.

But charity forbids us to inflict pain upon our fellow men, any farther than it shall be for their good. So God can never inflict it upon us, only to benefit us thereby. Now endless hell torments can never benefit us; indeed, to suppose that the torments of hell would ever produce any good to the damned, would be to contradict the scheme itself. Therefore God can never inflict them upon a single human being: it would be like the cruel act of an earthly father, who should burn his tender child to death in a fiery furnace, because it had disobeyed his law. A God of infinite love will never do it! But love will not only permit but require him to inflict upon us such punishment as infinite wisdom shall see will be for our good, in reforming us, and making us partakers of his holiness and happiness. This he will inflict. But this is Universalism, precisely. We believe that punishment is one of the means in the hands of Christ, under God, of saving the world from sin. Love will permit the infliction of such punishment, and no other; therefore Universalism is most certainly the truth of God. And it is a glorious happyfying truth! May it triumph!

JESUS CHRIST THE LIGHT OF MAN.

Before the appearance of our Lord and Saviour, darkness covered the land, and gross darkness the people. They were wandering up and down in the earth without any light, save that of nature, to guide and direct them. It is true that in the far-reaching distance of the past, the children of Israel had been guided by a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night; also by direct communication with God, after which they were taught by the inspiration of the prophets. But by their perverseness, these lights had been darkened and they left without a luminary to guide them. The sun of the moral heavens had become thickly clouded over, and dreariness hovered around the mind. Unless this cloud could be overblown the world must sink in ruin.

It was when such darkness as could be felt brooded over the mind, that Jesus came upon our earth, as had been foretold of him, to shed a light upon man, to brush away those clouds which had so long hung between him and the sun, and thereby infuse new life into his very being. The light of which he shed upon the world was through his life, hence it was said, 'In him was life and the life was the light of man.' For this he was denominated 'the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world.' He was the true light, in that he was the 'light of life.'

In every act of his life, Christ gave instruction to man; a light to guide and direct him in his journeyings here below. This light was that of example. And being tempted in all points like as we are, his example must be the true, and worthy of being followed. But look at his temptation in the wilderness, where the adversary, in his members, would lead him to forsake his high work and exercise his power for the purpose of supplying his temporal wants. He resisted the temptation, recognizing the fact that man was to live 'by every word that proceeded out of the mouth of God.'

Here is seen an exercise of trust and confidence in God, that he would supply his temporal wants without the exercise of that spiritual power which had been imparted to him. See him also as a friend, at the time the lewd woman was brought before him. In this case he exercised the true principles of a friend in rebuking that spirit of inquiry which existed in the mind of her accusers, and in reproving her by implication, for her conduct, exhorting her to forsake her course and pursue that of virtue and right.

A strict obedience to the laws of the land he ever yielded, so far as it could be done without violating the principles of right. This was seen at the time he sent Peter to take up a fish from the sea from whose mouth he should take a piece of money to pay the tribute required of them.

Wherever he found sorrowing and distress he was ready to comfort and alleviate. Just as readily did he heal the daughter of Jairus as he raised Lazarus from the dead. The hovel of the poor, nor the palace of the rich, forbid his rendering aid. None of that spirit of arrogance and pride which characterizes the world was seen in his life nor was guile found in his mouth.

Retaliation was not known in his whole life; but when smitten on one cheek, he turned the other. This was seen in the last crowning act of his life, when groaning in agony on the cross, being tormented out of existence, jeered and taunted by those who surrounded him, insulted in being crowned with thorns, and when athirst, mocked with vinegar and gall. All this he bore with perfect calmness, still praying, 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do.' Well was it said, Socrates died like a philosopher, but Jesus Christ like a God.

Do we wish to learn our duty in reference to any point, we have but to refer to the life of Christ, and there we shall behold it engraven in lines of light, 'the light of life.'

Let us take this light as our guide, that we may walk in all truth and die in triumph. A. SCOTT. Lyman, N. H., March, 1846.

IMMORTALITY.—IN A LETTER TO A FRIEND.

Your doubts expressed to me when at our house on the completeness of the evidences on the subject of the immortality of the soul, have been the occasion of my reviewing some of the most prominent evidences, on that rather perplexed subject; being rather an object of faith and hope, than of demonstration.

Matter, in the general acceptance of the term, includes any crude unwrought substance, one of whose properties is inertness. It is lifeless, has no inherent power to change its form, or powers of locomotion; or powers to increase its bulk; and where it falls it settles forever.

Although these are its inherent properties, yet it is the material of all that is grand, beautiful or useful. It rises into temples, capped by the clouds; bursts into fruits, and flowers; and affords aliment for the stomach and clothing to shield from the inclemency of the seasons.

But it has an antagonist principle in creation, known as vitality, or a principle of life. Of what is the essence of life nothing is known; all that is known of it, or perhaps that will ever be known of it, is by its effects.

It is not matter, but it has a great affinity for it; and without which it can not exist as an active principle; but from its influence on inert matter the most astonishing phenomena are exhibited.

Vitality is that subtle hidden property which resides in all seeds, which by being deposited in the crust of the earth, generates motion in what was before, lifeless, and at rest, and assimilates matter to its own use, and nourishment; and thus enlarges to the stately tree, the luscious grape, or the gay sweet scented flower. It resides in all seeds, and in many roots, cuttings or graftings, it is not a general but a specific principle, has different traits, and functions to perform, which are constant, and perpetual. Hence a cucumber, and an onion will grow side by side, retaining their opposite qualities for ever.

Animal vitality is not less wonderful, by which inert matter is changed into locomotive powers, in the form of beings, who range the earth, swarm in the waters, or are buoyant in the atmosphere. Vitality by an assimilation of atoms, increases the bulk of the animal until it arrives at a maximum called maturity, where it decreases, diminishes its activity and becomes defunct. But not before it has communicated its vital energies to other of its species, by the laws of generation, or propagation. Thus the offspring of vegetables and animals partake of the peculiarities of the parent, by laws immutably fixed, and ever active; established by the great First Cause.

When the animal dies, it returns to its constituent particles, waiting to be reanimated by any other vital principles, in perpetuity. It lies down to rise no more for ever.

Man is an animal, subject like all others to the same laws, and to the same vicissitudes, ever changing his substance, and renewing it. But man has, by the special gift of the first great cause, a principle or tact, superadded to his vitality, as a gift, called intelligence, reason, soul or mind. What is the specific nature of mind we know not; all that is known of it is by its effects, as it is recognised by none of the senses. Mind overcomes matter, and subdues it, and converts it into steam engines, and printing presses, musical instruments, &c., &c.—There seems to be a mutual affinity between matter and mind, so as to make matter the great field of operation, or manifestation. And matter has a controlling influence over mind; so that it flees, and resigns its abode in matter by the overwhelming influence of fire, or water, by sudden concussions, or that derangement of matter called disease. This peculiar, superadded gift, or endowment in man is an emanation from the great Parent spirit, who only has immortality as an essential attribute; and thus we infer the emanation to be an immortal principle. It is a progressing principle, fitted for infinite improvement in knowledge, and virtue; it can be enlarged by education, and purified by virtue; or deteriorated by vice, and debased by ignorance; nevertheless, it retains a capacity of renewing its pristine vigor, or its original purity; for if the cause is removed, the effect ceases. These are the privileges of civilized man. To the present highly favored race of humanity, known as the Anglo-saxon it is a communication of the highest grade, but valued, and improved by each individual in exact proportion to his knowledge. No animal, as far as is known, except man, has a fear of death, or knowledge of a previous existence, prior to the passing moment; or has any idea or comprehension of time as past, or future.

Induction is the derivation of a principle, from known parts, and is a sure method of arriving at truth.

Now the mutual adaptations of the several parts of the fabric of animals are a certain indication, of the scale they maintain; and the peculiarities they are destined to exhibit in future. Thus the form of teeth and claws in the tiger or cat evidently point out their carnivorous habits, and modes of catching their prey. The teeth of herbivorous, or herb-feeding animals, are evidently formed for grinding their food, and the lodentia or gnawers, like the squirrel or rat, have cutting teeth, to eat through tough boards, or the shell of nuts.

The parrot has claws adapted to climb trees, water fowls have web feet, to enable them to swim, &c.

Let us apply those facts by the laws of induction to discover the future destiny of man by the facts, of the hope, the expectation and anticipation of an Anglo-saxon of virtuous habits, and a highly cultivated mind, to a state of being after death.

Does the thirsty hart, panting for the water courses, when arrived at the cooling stream, the cause of solicitous search for miles, find an incapacity to imbibe the welcome fluid, through a malformation of structure, or want of natural organs to enjoy the luxury? What a tantalization of malignant nature should we call it?

And is the Anglo-saxon, who is placed by the author of his Being at the head of all terrestrial animals, the most perfect representation of his species, doomed to thirst after the pure waters of knowledge, and find an incapacity to quench his thirst at the fountain? He has faculties to comprehend, and retain all the mutations of his species through the page of history; and is he doomed to be finally deprived of his knowledge by a defect of retention? He has a knowledge of cause and effect, predicts the constant recurrence of experiments in philosophy, and by which he can foretell events, time has not yet revealed. It has powers to lift the veil of nature, and see wonders just enough to raise an intense desire to behold more of the hidden secrets of nature; just enough to excite an inextinguishable thirst after manifestations the discovery of which is to him the waters of life.

And is he doomed like the ill fated hart, through malignant destiny to approach the streams, feel his impotency to enjoy them, and languish in sight of the gratification of the high hopes he had formed?

But the hart has an organization of body to partake of the cooling fluid, or the desire would not have been given.

And man has powers given him to survey the past through the medium of well authenticated history, and has seen the slow progress of his species from ignorance and barbarism, to knowledge and civilization, and recognized their present standing. He surveys the earth he inhabits, and obtains a knowledge of the heavens he views, and with rapture observes the harmony and beauty of all he sees, or comprehends; and finds to his astonishment he has only discovered a minute part, a mere needle's point in comparison of the exhaustless whole: But enough to excite desire by observation and stimulate inquiry, to thirst for farther discoveries for which he feels life is of too short continuance, and thus lead to expect a longer period for investigation, and enlarged powers to carry out the pleasing pursuit.

Will powers to quench that thirst be suspended? Will the waters of knowledge, those living waters to a literary mind, be suffered to approach the lips of hope, and then like poor Tartarus, shall man find that they flee away, and recede from view when he has natured and acquired powers to be refreshed? The hart has powers to drink and be refreshed. And highly cultivated man whose highest reason bids him hope for an extended period in which to explore the scenes for which his nature is adapted, and which are designed to excite ardent hopes in his bosom—will all his powers be finally extinguished like the snuff of a candle blown out, and that too, frequently, when the flame burns most bright and clear.

Thus the hands of induction demonstrate the immortality of the human mind; that the mind once illuminated by knowledge, can not be extinguished. These laws reveal to the soul the beauty and harmony of the Eternal which is adapted to fill us with high and holy thoughts, to call into exercise our best affections and loftiest aspirations, and elevate us above the terrestrial things of life, and give a foretaste of that high destiny we are instructed to hope for as our portion hereafter. And if the highly gifted, civilized, virtuous Anglo-saxon has these indications and proofs of immortality, does it not follow that all the Anglo-saxon races are legitimate expectants of that high destiny? for they all possess faculties which only want cultivation to place them on that high standing.

These are arguments drawn from nature, from the eternal fitness of things, and are to me conclusive. But they acquire prodigious force by adding to these reasons the declarations of Revelation.—That our heavenly Father raised again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, to instruct, and to assure us, that he will raise us up also to die no more; and that our religion is a communication from the Father of Lights; its exact adaptation to elevate the mind of man, and to purify the affections, by a practical adherence to its precepts, demonstrate.—And thus it follows that our immortality, and the delightful knowledge, and anticipation of it, is no illusion, but a substantial fact; demonstrating that the Deity has covered the earth with gay colors, and scented it with rich perfumes, and shows us by the plan and order of his works, that he has given to man something better than a bare existence, and scattered over his creation a thousand superfluous joys, which are totally unnecessary to the mere support of life.

A COUNTRY PASTOR'S INFIDELITY IN DISGUISE.

BR. SKINNER.—When I read in the Advocate, a few weeks ago, 'A Country Pastor's' dolorous forebodings, lest disguised infidelity should insinuate itself into families truly pious; I confess I had not yet read, 'Combe on the Constitution of Man.' The work had been in my library for more than two years; and yet, my other engagements and duties, had prevented me from progressing farther than to the middle of the third chapter. So far as I had read, I regarded the book as containing an elevated system of philosophy, in connexion with the Christian Scriptures, concerning the nature and constitution of man, and the adaptation of the Christian religion, rightly understood, to supply his moral and intellectual wants. Judge then of my surprise on seeing such a work arraigned, and condemned as an infidel production, unfit for the perusal of pious religious professors. I own, that my surprise abated considerably, when I found that such works as, 'Austin's voice to Youth,' and, Smith's 'Causes of Infidelity Removed,' were also condemned with it. I confess, I felt almost prepared to find any thing, and every thing condemned, by such a censor, which did not come exactly up to the length and breadth of his own peculiar views. For, it seemed as though he would fain make the world believe that all is infidelity, which does not square with his own selfish and bigoted creed. However, lest I might judge too hastily, in regard to this Pastor's censoriousness, and be unwittingly harboring among my books of a more evangelical character, the 'snaky fangs' of a viper, that might, before I was aware of it, sap the foundations of my own, and the faith of my family, in the truthfulness of the sacred Scriptures, I resolved to go immediately to my desk, and boldly take down the aforesaid, 'Combe on Man,' and to look his snaky majesty full in the face. So, having laid my Bible on one side of me, and my hymn book on the other, I opened at the 25th page and read as follows:

'To the best of my knowledge, there is not one practical result of the natural laws expounded in the subsequent pages, which does not harmonize, precisely, with the moral precepts of the New Testament. Indeed, this work has been characterized, by some individuals, as the philosophy of Christian morality, because they regard it as exhibiting the natural foundations of the admirable precepts, which, in the New Testament, are taught only dogmatically.

Now, surely, thought I, this does not look much like infidelity:—teaching principles, which harmonize precisely with the New Testament! But, may be this is only 'the gilded scales' of his snakeship, by which he intends to charm us into his fatal coil! Let us then look at these principles—the 'deadly fangs' themselves! So I turned over to the 103d page, and read:—'The grand object of the moral and intellectual faculties of man, therefore, ought to be, the study of God and his works. Before philosophy can arise to its highest dignity, and shed on man its richest benefits, it must become religious.' I see no 'deadly fangs' in such principles as these:—Philosophy must become religious—the 'grand object' of our intellectual powers, 'the study of God and his works!' Is this the 'deadly slime' that is 'worming itself into our bedrooms' to spoil our 'baptized offspring!' Let us try again.—page 37. 'Neither do I intend to teach, that the natural laws, discernible by unassisted reason, are sufficient for the salvation of man without revelation. * * * My object, I repeat, is to investigate the natural constitution of the human mind and body, their relations to external objects and beings in this world, and the courses of action, that, in consequence, appear to be beneficial or hurtful in this life. Man's spiritual interests belong to the sphere of revelation; and I distinctly repeat, that I do not teach, that obedience to the natural laws is sufficient for salvation in the future state. Revelation prescribes certain requisites for salvation, which may be divided into two classes: first, faith or belief; and, secondly, the performance of certain duties, not as entitling to salvation, but as the native result of that faith, and the necessary evidence of its sincerity.' 'Gilded scales!' 'Deadly slime!' 'Infidelity!'—What does this 'Country Pastor' mean by denouncing such sentiments as infidelity? Does not this come just about as near to the sentiments of his own 'creed, as he himself could fix it. But let us try once more.—page 104. 'While reason and religion are at variance, both are obstructed in producing their full beneficial effects. God has placed harmony between them, and it is only human imperfection and ignorance that introduce discord! Ah, ha! Here it is! reason and religion, in harmony with each other!! Was there ever a greater heresy? A more infidel sentiment? It is certainly beyond all orthodox endurance. If this sentiment be suffered to pass, then every religious doctrine of the church must be judged of by its own intrinsic reasonableness; and be accepted or rejected accordingly. Now what think you, reader, of bringing the principles of modern orthodoxy to the test of reason? Why, they would be dispersed like the mist and fog of the morning, before the bright beams of the rising sun. Hence, reason, and sound philosophy must be denounced as infidelity; that the unreasonable and incomprehensible absurdities of modern orthodox doctrines may pass for revelation! Can you make any thing else of it? I can not.

But let us look once again.—page 26. 'True philosophy is a revelation of the divine will, manifested in creation. It harmonizes with all truth, and can not with impunity be neglected.' Which, as I understand it, amounts to this:—that, what God has revealed to man in the natural world, must, and does agree and harmonize with what he has revealed in his word; and consequently, if aught be presented, as the teachings of God's word, which is in contradiction to nature, reason and the fitness of things, it must go by the board as a mere absurd pretension. And such would be the inevitable fate of modern orthodoxy, if subjected to such a test. This, then, is what constitutes the infidelity of 'Combe on Man.'

But, again on page 24.—'On the ground that organs and faculties have been given to us by the Creator, (we) are entitled to maintain, that a philosophy of morals correctly deduced from their constitution, must accord with all correct interpretations of Scripture. Otherwise, religion can have no substantial foundation. If two sound interpretations of the divine will can, by any possibility contradict each other, we can have no confidence in the moral governor of the world. As then, all real philosophy, and true religion must harmonize; there will be a manifest advantage, in cultivating each by itself. * * * We may then advantageously compare them, and use the one, as a means of elucidating, or correcting our views of the other.' Now if this be true—if such a system of morals can be deduced from the 'organs and faculties of the mind; what becomes of the doctrine of their innate depravity and total corruption? It falls to the ground; and the whole superstructure of the doctrine of endless misery tumbles to ruin with it! Don't you see the 'deadly fangs'? They fasten upon 'the very vitals' of both creed and catechism. Oh then what will become of the 'baptized offsprings'?—Sure! 'Won't' they come out, reasoning, thinking beings? But still, worse and worse! Just look on page 39.—The theological doctrine of the corruption and disorder of human nature, joined to a want of knowledge of real science, have probably been the causes, why the professed servants of God have made so little use of his laws, as revealed in creation, in instructing the people to live according to his will!!—Did you ever—!! Now if this is not infidelity, then modern orthodoxy is sheer hetero-doxy. J. GAGE 2nd.

THE POWER OF CHRIST.

The trying hour, when Christ was to make an effectual offering of himself upon the cross, once for all, had arrived, when he encountered all the agonies of that tremendous scene, without a murmuring word; for he knew that he was suffering for the emancipation of a sinful and dying world; and at the same time, was advancing the declarative glory of his Father and his God, by giving ocular demonstration of the love of the Supreme Being to the human race.

In view of that trying scene, he exclaimed; 'Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou has given him.' These words were uttered, just before he sealed the new and better covenant by his own blood, which gives to the whole subject a deep and thrilling interest.

He who had left the realms of glory, where he had walked high in immortality, in cloudless climes of bliss, was now clad in a mantle of earth, touched with all the feelings of human infirmity, and alive to all the sympathies, sufferings and temptations of man, and clothed with all the attributes of humanity!

He had sojourned on earth as an exalted and sinless example of moral virtue. Had taken to his confidence a few warm-hearted, but imperfect friends, whose minds he had been laboring to prepare, not only for the important duties of the ministry of his gospel, but for the severe conflict and disappointment to which his approaching death would shortly expose them. And now, on the very eve of his indescribable sufferings, he approaches and addresses the throne of infinite majesty in language worthy of perpetual remembrance. 'These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father the hour is now come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son may also glorify thee. As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him. And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.' St. John 18th chapter. The whole chapter is replete with instructions most sublime, both in theory and as an example, because it teaches us how to submit ourselves to the will of God, under the most trying circumstances.

Our design in this communication is to treat of the power of Christ; the design for which it was given, and to attend to the inquiry, will he exercise that power according to the design for which it was given?

In speaking of the power of Christ, one fact is perfectly clear to every mind that considers the unequivocal language of Christ—that it is universal. 'Thou hast given him power over all flesh.' Now for the object of this gift; that is also expressed with equal clearness.—'That he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him.' 'The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands.' That this power was given for universal exercise, is evident from the trust reposed, and the character of him who received it—namely, to give eternal life.

That Christ is the image of God, is evident from his whole character; and that he came to benefit mankind. Now the most effectual way in which he could benefit the world, is to punish transgressors until they are weaned from sin, and by this and all other means of discipline and grace, and pleadings of his love, draw them to virtue and to God.

Jesus came to do the will of God: Hence he can not be opposed to that will! What does that will embrace? Why St. Paul tells us that 'God will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth.' Has he power to fulfil this will? Certainly; for 'all power in heaven and on earth is given to me,' saith this wonderful Teacher in Israel.

It would reflect the highest disgrace upon the Son of God, to say that he would exercise or employ this power which was given him to save, in destroying the subjects whom he came to rescue from the bondage of sin and death! Then we may look forward to the welcome period, when he shall finish the great work for which he made his appearance: For 'he shall not fail nor be discouraged.' 'And the pleasure of God shall prosper in his hands.' D. PICKERING.

THE IMAGE OF DEATH.—A CONTRAST.

BY MISS M. E. TILLOTSON.

It came in childhood, like the ruthless form
Of raving demon 'mid the raging storm:
It came with visage frowning vengeance dire,
And flashing eyes of red, sulphuric fire;
With poison dripping from the wreaking blade,
Its right, relentless arm in triumph swayed!
With gesture stern, vindictive deed to fit,
The left hand pointed to the lurid pit,
Where wailing, writhing, wild despairing hosts
Were chained in quenchless flames, by gnashing ghosts!
Its ponderous feet a cloven aspect bear,
As quick as lightning cleft the murky air!
Frighted and fainting, from the sprite I fled,
Praying some friendly rock might shield my head.
O! was it strange that fancy thus should draw
The herald Death, and shrink from it with awe?
Ah, no! for teachers rose, on every hand,
Proclaiming death and danger through the land.
Most horrid thought! that man should so pervert
The holy word, and wither the young heart—
Should fabricate a fiend, potent to tear,
From the puissant One, his offspring dear!

It now comes placidly, as angel bright,
Soft gliding down to earth on beams of light:—
It comes with face of smiles, and tones of love,
And eyes more tender than the turtle dove—
With downy wings to fold me to its breast,
Where I, at last may rest, forever rest.
It comes with air of such enchanting grace,
I gladly yield to its endeared embrace:—
Not young affection's sweet, ideal shrine
Is pictured half so perfect, so divine!
One cherub hand my weary head supports,
And one points upward to the glorious courts;
Then gently presses on my trembling heart.
While with its throbs, all fears and pangs depart.
So sweetly fair it comes. And is it strange,
A score of years should thus the image change?
Nay! I have learned for what, on sinful earth,
The lovely Son of Light had lowly birth—
Learned that the world he ransomed, freely gave His priceless blood for all—defied the grave:—
That he declared with lips that could not lie;
He'd draw all souls unto himself on high.
This is enough;—yet speaking nature brings
Proof of the same intent in countless things,
That Gospel charm fills her harmonious whole,
And, lofter still, 'tis felt within the soul!

THE MISGUIDED DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

'Gold pays the worth of all things here;
But not of love—that gem's too dear.'

CHAPTER IV.

Time sped on. Three weeks soon winged their flight and the bridal morn of Mary Gray was ushered in with unclouded beauty. Alethea was present as requested, and saw the hand of her friend placed within that of the humble mechanic. True, he was a noble looking youth, and one would think that when she saw the heartfelt joy which beamed in Mary's every look and the confiding and devoted affection which spoke in both their glances as their eyes met, she would have sickened in prospect of her own approaching union. At one moment nature did triumph, and a pang shot through her heart, and a tear unbidden started from her eye, but she hastily brushed it away for she had been educated in a delusive manner, and through deluded eyes again looked on her friend.—'Ah,' thought she, 'when Mary sees the fortune which I have at my command, while she is compelled to struggle with comparative poverty, she will wear a less happy face than now and look upon her husband with less confidence and pride.'

She had resolved not to follow Mary's example; and maintained silence on the subject of her engagement, not so much that she did not feel a willingness to confide in her, but she well knew that with such 'strange notions' as Mary had, she would not speak approvingly and although she was scarcely aware of the fact herself, she felt that she could not bear one discouraging word. The day following her marriage Mary, with her husband, left home on a visit to some friends at a distance, and did not return until the day prior to that upon which Alethea's marriage was to take place. But when immediately on her return she was informed that on the morrow Alethea Morse was to become the 'bride of old Chauncey Gardner, she was wholly taken by surprise, and on further reflection her warm and affectionate heart bled in contemplation of such a sacrifice, for though she well knew that the heart of her friend was the seat of some pernicious errors, yet she believed that her mother had strengthened them by a long system of cultivation, and she had no doubt that by proper treatment they might be eradicated and Alethea become a noble and useful woman. The more she reflected upon it, the more she felt that she could not have her friend sacrificed and though fatigued by her journey, determined to visit her the same evening and if possible dissuade her from such a dangerous step.

She was received with much coldness, for the object of her visit was more than half suspected by both mother and daughter. At first she was somewhat daunted by such unwonted treatment, but she remembered the importance of her mission and soon made it known. Mrs. Morse was immediately offended and when Alethea could not answer her arguments and persuasions satisfactorily to herself, she intimated that her 'acquaintance' was much interested in business not her own. Mary saw that there was no success, and more than ever pained for Alethea and disgusted with the sinister motive of Mrs. Morse, she gave up the object of her visit and returned home. She thought that she should say nothing more, but when on the next day Alethea was about to proceed to the altar to become the wife of a man of more than thrice her own age, and one with whom it was impossible for her to love, she could not resist the promptings of her heart to make at least one more appeal. With the answer returned, and with what followed, the reader is already acquainted.

THE LOAF OF BREAD.

BY JANE WEAVER.

'Buy my matches—O! do buy them, sir,' said a plaintive voice.

The person addressed, clad in a heavy overcoat, was breasting a sharp wind of a December day; his throat was muffled up, leaving only a portion of his mouth discernible, but his dress bespoke one in comfortable circumstances.

'I don't want your matches, my lad,' said he.

'But do buy them—six boxes for a fip.'

'Get out of the way,' said the man sharply, for the lad half stopped the path.

'O! do buy some,' said the boy, detaining him by the skirt of his coat, 'mother is sick, and I've had nothing to eat to-day. Do buy a fip's worth.'

The man hesitated. The natural impulses of his heart were for good; but he was one accustomed to think the world worse than it was.

'Pshaw,' he said; 'that is the old story; get out of the way, you young scamp, or I'll have you arrested.'

The boy meekly drew back, but a tear froze on his cheek in that bitter blast, though the rich man saw it not, for he had hurried on.

It was getting late, and the streets would have been pitch dark, but for the lamps which, at long intervals, lit up the night. Few were abroad in that wintry weather, and so the boy stood shivering at his post for a long while before a second passenger came by. Poor fellow! he was thin clad, and his lips were blue with cold; yet he kept his station, vainly offering his matches, but finding no buyers.

Ten o'clock struck, and, with the tears falling fast, he turned his footsteps towards the cellar in which he lived.

He had been out all day and sold nothing, not a morsel of food crossed his mouth since the night before. But he thought more of his sick mother than of himself. The little capital had been exhausted in the purchase of the matches, and they had not a cent remaining.

He paused, for at that instant the light from a baker's shop streamed across the street. The baker was just shutting up; his back was turned, the door was invitingly opened; and within reach lay a pile of loaves. A sudden impulse seized the boy. An hour previously he had vainly begged at the same shop, and that man had roughly ordered him away. He had never stolen before, but now an irresistible temptation befel him. Should his mother starve, when a single loaf might save her? He rushed in, grasped the prize, and dashed down the street.

'Hillo!—stop thief!' said the baker, turning around just in time to see the act.

The boy heard the cry, and trembled all over; fear lent speed to his feet, and he ran swiftly on, now and then turning back to see if his pursuers gained on him.

'Stop thief! stop thief!! stop thief!!!' was the cry that rung from as many pursuers as, looking from their shops, they caught sight of the fugitive and joined in the chase.

The boy's heart beat wildly; he mechanically turned his steps toward the cellar where he lived; the narrow alley, in which it was, opened into the street just ahead, and he strove desperately to gain it. The watchmen's rattles were now heard, in front, behind, all around.—Like a hunted stag, panting and frightened, he gained the end of the alley and dashed into the dark thoroughfare. But at that instant, a man sprang out of the corner house and seized the fugitive.

Ah! you young thief, you were nearly off, were you? come along—I am a magistrate—you shall go to jail; and with these words he dragged the culprit into his office.

The boy burst into tears.

'O! sir,' he said, 'let me go. I only stole a loaf of bread, and I wouldn't have done it, but we are starving. Mother and I haven't eaten any thing to-day, and mother is sick. I never stole before. Let me go and I'll never do it again.'

The magistrate's office was now full of people, the baker being among the number. The boy was sobbing piteously. The magistrate ordered lights, for hitherto the room had been dark.

'The young villain—so early in crime—these match boys should all be sent to the house of refuge,' said one.

'I have seen the rascal prowling about my door for the last hour,' said the baker.

'Stop crying,' said one of the watchmen, giving the boy a violent shake. 'You're done for, young un—so no whimpering.'

The glare of the lights that were now brought in, fell full on the face of the magistrate, who had taken his seat, and then shot their brilliant glare across the group of spectators, until it rested on the weeping child. At that sight the magistrate started. He got up and looked over the desk more closely at the boy.

'The lad really seems in want,' said he with a kinder tone, leaving his chair and advancing to the culprit, whose hand he took. 'Are you not the match boy I met to-night?'

The lad looked up, and the recognition was mutual.

O! yes, sir—and what I told you was true. Mother lives up the alley, No. 16, in the cellar. You may go there and see. Don't send me to jail; it will break her heart. Indeed, indeed, I didn't mean to steal—but we are starving.'

'This must be inquired into. Good God, I thought the child was a cheat. But his lips are blue—he is shivering. Here, boy, eat that.'

He broke off a piece of the loaf as he spoke, and gave it to the lad, who devoured it with an avidity that convinced every one of the truth of his story. In a minute a watchman came in, who said he had been to the cellar the child named; a sick woman was really there, in a state of real desolation. She was sobbing for her absent boy, who ought, she said, to have been home long since.

'Heaven forbid we should punish the child, then,' said the magistrate fervently. 'How fortunately he was arrested by me; it saved him from prison; for no one else would have believed his story. Gentlemen, I will see to the boy's wants. I suppose you dismiss your complaint,' he added, turning to the baker.

'O! yes, sir,' said the man, 'he is welcome to the loaf. I wouldn't have refused any one who really was in want; but there are so many cheats about.'

'Ah! there it is,' said the magistrate with self-reproach; 'we think all beggars deceivers, and never trouble ourselves to inquire into the truth of their story. Had I done so for this boy, he had not stolen your loaf.'

The magistrate kept his word to the lad. Immediate relief was administered to the mother's necessities and his; and subsequent regular, though humble, employment obtained for each. They are now comfortable, happy and trust-worthy. Would they have been so if the boy had been sent to jail?

Reader, this is no fancy sketch. Such incidents occur almost daily in our great cities. 'Go thou and do likewise.'

ANECDOTE OF DR. LYMAN BEECHER.

The Philadelphia North American relates the following anecdote of the celebrated orthodox divine, Dr. Beecher, as one which has never been published. It well illustrates how pride, as regards outward appearance, can be utterly subdued by the development of intrinsic realities:

When, in the early years of his life, Dr. Beecher was living in Litchfield, something caused him to spend a Sunday in New Haven. He was dressed with homely simplicity, and was diffident in conversation, so that it was no easy matter to judge of his quality. Dr. Strong was then settled over the Congregational church in that city, and professional usage required that he should entertain Beecher at his house, and invite him into his pulpit. He looked distrustfully upon the plain country pastor, and lamented the terrible necessity. But there was no alternative but in the violation of courtesy. Beecher sat meekly in the pulpit through the morning and the afternoon, but was not asked to take any part in the services. In the evening, Strong intimated to him very coldly, that if he chose to do so, he could preach for him, and was shocked by his instant acquiescence. 'A man who will accept an invitation tendered in such a way as this,' thought Strong, 'can not preach a sermon fit for my congregation to listen to!' He was mistaken, however. Beecher had hardly less pride than genius, and he felt keenly the chilling coldness of the great man, as Strong was then considered. The evening came on; the church was brilliantly lighted, and thronged with the beauty, fashion, and intelligence of that home of gentleness and learning. Strong had offered the opening prayer, and was sitting in stern ill humor, while the choir were singing the hymn to precede the sermon. Beecher became restless, and his face was flushed with sudden excitement. He turned to Strong, and inquired in a low and hurried voice, if the sermon could be a few moments deferred—he had left his manuscript in his chamber. 'No!' said the Doctor, with exultant but ill-natured sharpness—and grasped a Bible to select a text for himself, glad that an accident was to relieve him and his congregation from the mortifying infliction he had dreaded. He was too fast. Beecher had been stung to the heart by his manner, and recognizing the words of the last line of the hymn, sprung to the desk, and ere Strong was recovered from his astonishment, had announced his text for an extemporaneous discourse. 'It is the will of God!' thought the vexed and humbled pastor, and prepared himself to listen with Christian resignation. For a few moments the young preacher spoke with slight hesitation, as if while giving his introduction, he was revolving in his mind an extended argument. Soon his voice rang clear and loud, his sentences came compact and earnest, and his manner caught the glowing fervor of his thought. All was hushed but his impassioned tones; the great assembly was as still as death; and, leaning forward with blended wonder and admiration, the pastor felt stealing over him from the hushed air, the rebuke of his Master, for his harsh judgment and cold treatment of his young brother. In after life he used to relate the story, and confess that he had never heard such eloquence as that of the home spun young Beecher.

POVERTY.

Start not at the labor-doom of honest poverty; it is to poverty that we are indebted for the discovery of a new world; it made Franklin a philosopher, Hogarth a painter, and Napoleon the conqueror of Europe. The mightiest minds that ever astonished the civilized world, were nursed in the vale of poverty; that was their incentive to action, their stimulus to glory and immortality. Pine not, then, at your lot, if you be poor and virtuous; a large fortune to a giddy youth, is the most painful judgment an indulgent Heaven can inflict upon a man. The inordinate love of wealth, so fatally prevalent in modern times, when with a great majority, riches are a test of respectability and cash a token of worth and virtue, a cloak to screen from crime—is worse than blear-eyed famine, more fatal than the festering folds of the purple pestilence.—Mourn not, then, that you are poor—push your faculties into a holier sphere, and reap abundant stores of mental gain in the extended field of an enlightened mind.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1846.

'HE IS NOT THE MAN FOR US.'

That tastes should be various with various individuals, societies and communities, is a matter of no great surprise, because turns of mind are as different and many as there are different and many individuals. Thought and reflection are not one and the same with all, but possess many different shades of fancy; many colors of various hue; running in all degrees from the calm and 'sober second thought' to the fanciful realms of the ideal. But while this truth is readily acknowledged, it will also be admitted that the tastes of many are fastidious, possessing that affective nicety which renders them not only disagreeable, but absolutely intolerable, and from such we can in truth and sincerity pray, 'good Lord deliver us.'

The observation made upon the different societies in our denomination, and the success both ill and good of many of our preachers, have awakened a train of reflection upon the progress of the cause of Universalism in many places, and these thoughts together with a fact or two, may not be unprofitable if considered as they should be, in the light of candor and sincerity. And to commence, we will bring forward the 'young preacher,' who perhaps has but just gone forth as a herald of the cross, to labor for the purpose of rolling away that cloud of darkness which superstition has thrown upon the human mind; to publish the 'good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people'; to point the sorrowing children of men away to a haven of rest and peace after the toils and sorrows of earth are over. And how is he greeted by the laymen? Why he has committed one of the most abominable of errors; one of the most grievous of all sins; an iniquity absolutely unpardonable! And what is it? Why he is young! Impious and Heaven daring man! How could he be so unwise! He should have made his appearance, with locks somewhat whitened with frosts of many winters, and with a mind greatly experienced and practised in his calling. We want men of more depth of thought. We, whose thoughts seldom stray above the produce of the field or the merchandise of the shop; we, our profound selves, must have a sage of thought full deep and meditation such as the world seldom meets with. Such is the man we would have to discourse to us, for none but such can bring forward things worthy of our consideration!

We have often been amused, at our conference and association meetings, to see the up-turned nose, the pitiful sneer, when a young preacher had finished his discourse. Even now we can see a man going through the door into the porch, reproaching himself because he did not possess sufficient wisdom to have enabled him to have staid at home; and he is vexed, that his brethren should allow the youthful advocate to lift up his voice at such a time and upon such an occasion. And why? Was not the subject well-timed? the composition eloquent? the thought creditable? and the delivery fair? The subject! 'gude fath,' the idea had never entered the mind for a moment! The speaker was a young man! and we went there under the expectation of hearing a man of wisdom, or at least of a great name, and of age and experience. 'He is not the man for us!'

Heigh, ho! so the world goes, and now ye young men who have of late entered the ministry; ye are grievously in the fault. Ye have committed 'the unpardonable sin'—by not having an old head upon your youthful shoulders; a head bald with the peltings of many a furious storm, and a mind stored with the wisdom and experience of the aged veteran! It is indeed strange that ye should be so short-sighted as to place your feet upon the threshold in entering the temple, when it is plain that one should commence at the farthest extremity of the innermost hall. It is a source of wonder that God had not so ordained it, that mankind should have been born at the other end of human life, or never born at all! But onward ye young heralds of the great salvation. The pathway is open before you, and after ye have been subject to years of scorn and contempt and abuse and contumely, and many other blessings attendant upon the ministerial profession, ye shall have a little rest—in the grave!

A fastidious taste in a society, respecting the age and peculiar talent of the preacher, is far from being conducive to the prosperity of the society or to the progress of the cause of the free and boundless grace of the living God. We now have in mind two societies of our denomination, both of which shall be nameless, the tastes of which are directly opposite; or perhaps we should say, that while that of the one is of the utmost nicety in every particular, the other is a taste of an order far from that which makes every thing bend in obedience to it, based upon a sound, judicious, and commendable judgment.—And the standing of each, and the influence exerted, are as different as the tastes of the two. One was composed at first of but very few individuals, but they were not at all afraid of their popularity. With quite a young man for a pastor, meetings were commenced under circumstances not very promising in their nature. But a few years have rolled away and we find that society at present in possession of a fine and beautiful house of worship; a large and respectable congregation may be found there every Sabbath, listening to the words of life and salvation; and in fact, the genial beams of prosperity have been and still are, upon them, and that society and its pastor are firmly united in the bonds of friendship, love, and affection. Nor is this all; but from other denominations, the members receive that respect due to those who endeavor to walk worthy of the Christian name, and an influence, strong in its nature, has been, and still is, exerted in all of the surrounding country in favor of the doctrine of the final salvation of the whole human family.

The members of the other society were more numerous at first, and their expectations certainly of no humble order. They could in no wise listen to the discourses of a young man, though those discourses might have been of no ordinary nature, and well worthy of greater heads; but ability was not so much the object in view as the name. Whenever a young preacher wandered that way and delivered his message, there was only one expression, in fact it had become stereotyped—'He is not the man for us.' They looked higher, and for awhile employed the first talent in the denomination; but in order to accomplish this desired object, they incurred debts and at length neglected to pay their minister. He left them; some became discouraged; others, indifferent, and the result stands out as a warning to all societies who look with contempt upon young preachers. That society is dead, dead, DEAD! A sermon has not been preached in the place for more than a year. Nor does the evil stop here. But the hands of the enemy have been strengthened; the unworthiness of some of the members has been a cause of much contempt from other societies of different faiths, and throughout all the surrounding country these transactions have only brought disgrace upon the doctrine of the great salvation. These are facts and they should teach a lesson by which those professing a belief in our principles of faith should endeavor to learn wisdom.

We know of other places where there is abundant ability for the support of the preaching of our order, and where large and respectable congregations could in a short time be gathered, but they are waiting for 'the man for them' to come along. Cursed with a few leaders who care more for gold and popularity than they do for God and religion, they will wait, and wait yet awhile longer, and accomplish nothing in the end. Reader; do not say that you are not the one which we have in our 'mind's eye,' for if you live in a place where preaching is not supported because the right man can not be found, and acquiesce in this decision, then you are just the man we mean, and you are just the man whom we despise with our whole mind, might, and strength; and you are held in utter contempt by every real and true Universalist of the land; for all regard you as an unprincipled, contemptible, and unworthy being. And though you may roll in your gilt-covered carriage and gingle your gold and silver and pride yourself upon your superior standing, yet you are easily seen through and the heart throbbing within your breast is a heart foul and black with hypocrisy and deceit. And God grant that you may soon be reformed, or the denomination never more cursed with your presence or profession.

There is a principle much to be admired, and we often find it in the course and actions of many who have professed a belief in the salvation of all men, and that principle is a love for the cause; a desire for the success and welfare of the denomination which never bows and gives way to individual fancies and desires, not to say individual whims! With such, so far as the cause of pure and undefiled religion is concerned, there is but one thought, but one feeling, and that is for the onward progress of our principles of faith. They may have, it is true, their choice in men, but they never let this choice be the cause of sacrificing the freedom of religious opinion but manfully sacrifice that individual wish to the good of the whole.—Of such professors well may the denomination be proud and to them be most grateful, for it is upon such men that the order is dependent for its existence. And when the time comes, if it ever does come, that all professors act upon the same principle, then Universalism will go onward in its power, carrying blessings unbounded to the members of the human family. S. J. G.

CLERICAL DERELICTION.

The Greenfield (Mass.) papers state that another of those villainous cases of seduction and desertion, by which so many females are disgraced, and the hearts of their friends made to bleed, has come to light in that county. A little more than a year since, a young man named Warren D. Tobey came to Northfield, in this county, very highly recommended from the Seminary at Wilbraham, as a preacher of the Methodist Episcopal church, and was stationed as a preacher over the Methodist church at Northfield. Among the members of his church, was a very respectable and worthy young lady, by the name of Stratton, with whom he soon became acquainted, which acquaintance soon ripened into love, apparently, and they were soon engaged to be married. Soon after their engagement, the villain began to eff'et her ruin, and under a profession of the most ardent affection and fidelity, and an assurance that they were already married in the sight of Heaven, and that human ceremonies were of little consequence, her conscientious scruples were overcome and her ruin accomplished. A short time after he had accomplished his villainous purposes, he left Northfield, and is supposed to be now preaching in this or some of the neighboring States. The above facts have been held from the public till the present time, in the hope that Tobey would be brought to justice, but as all hopes of the kind are now given up, the young lady's friends have come to the determination to unmask the hypocrite and publish his true character to the world. Tobey is of middling size, dark hair, black eyes, and is 26 or 28 years of age.

We copy the above from the N. Y. Saturday Emporium. It is far from being pleasant to read or see recorded, such acts of licentiousness and villany of our partialist brethren as the foregoing, but when they claim all the piety, godliness and decency, and are continually prating about the licentious tendency of Universalism and laying at its door all the causes of crime and wickedness, it is well enough perhaps to place before the public now and then, these records, that it may be known that the very restraining influence of the doctrine of endless misery does not always prevent its believers and public advocates, from plucking and tasting the forbidden fruits of sin of the most degrading character.

Wonder what friend Joseph Hartwell (who by the way will not acknowledge Universalists as Christians, nor allow that a Universalist priest has even 'courtous modesty') will think of this act of his clerical contemporary? Will he call that a specimen of a M. E. priest's modesty? W.

AN EXPLANATION.

In the Magazine and Advocate of the 13th of February last, appeared an inquiry from me, respecting Rev. J. M. Graves of Middletown, Conn., recently a convert to the truth from the Baptists. That inquiry had reference alone to the business transactions of another, in which Br. Graves became involved through the dictates of friendship. I have great pleasure in stating that since the inquiry was made, I have had an opportunity of thoroughly investigating the matter, and of receiving full explanations, which have resulted in the most satisfactory manner. Br. Graves stands entirely acquitted of any disposition or attempt to do wrong in discharging the pecuniary obligations for which he had unfortunately become responsible. It is evident he has from the commencement, exerted himself in the most honorable and praiseworthy manner, to render all their dues, as becomes an honest man.

I trust this explanation will reach as far as the inquiry to which it responds, and wish it to remove entirely any prejudice against Br. G. in the minds of the public, to which the inquiry may have subjected him. His explanations are perfectly satisfactory.

As Br. Graves was formerly pastor of the Baptist church in Auburn, there was a strong desire in our brethren to hear him proclaim his new message. At their solicitation he tarried last Sabbath with us, and preached with much acceptance to a crowded house. I sincerely trust he will soon be called to a favorable field, and become very successful in building up that cause of truth and love, which he so long labored to overthrow. Will our editorial brethren at the East, copy the above explanation. J. M. A.

DEATH OF BR. BIDDLECOM.

In our last we announced the sudden death of Br. David Biddlecom. Since then we have seen the following further notice of the event and its attending circumstances in the New York Christian Messenger, which we copy from that paper.

'Br. PRICE:—It becomes my painful duty to announce to you, and your readers, the death of another ministering brother. DAVID BIDDLECOM, of Phelps, Ontario co., is no more. He breathed his last the 2d inst., and yesterday we deposited his remains in the narrow house appointed for all. He was a good man, one of the excellent of the earth. He was respected by all who knew him, and by all with whom he was intimately acquainted, he was beloved. Whether in or out of the desk, among his family, friends, or strangers, he ever showed the spirit of a true Christian. He loved our holy cause with an ardent love, and was ever ready to defend it.

'But what shall I say of his death? Every Universalist will anticipate the manner of it—that he died in the full triumphs of the faith. His sickness was short, but extremely painful. He was attacked two weeks ago Saturday with the Bilious Cholera, and to the time of his death, a period of eighteen or nineteen days, his pain was excruciating. He soon became satisfied that he must die; and made such arrangements for his funeral, and the support of his family, as he wished carried out.

'Last Sunday morning I saw him for the first time since his sickness. As soon as he saw me he said, 'Br. Locke, I am glad to see you. I have got nearly through my journey. My time has come, I know that my Redeemer liveth. I want you to pray with me.' I spent a short season in prayer, at the close of which he responded 'amen.' I shall never forget that word. It seemed to come from the spirit-world. I can hear it now while I write.

'Sunday evening I was there again, and spent the rest of the night at his house. Monday morning we indulged a faint hope that he might recover. But he had no hope. He would say, 'I am going home! I am going home! My Father calls me!' In this state of mind he continued till his death.

'At his funeral there was a large gathering of friends. The services were conducted by Father Ackley, Br. Goss, and myself. Heaven bless his mourning relatives. Opposer, as you read this, remember what you have often asserted, that Universalism: will do to live by, but not to die by.

Newark, N. Y., April 4, 1846. E. W. LOCKE.'

The following notice we hope will be read and heeded by all the friends of Sunday schools throughout the State, and that each school will be fully represented both clerically and laically. Ed. Mag. and Adv.

STATE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The annual session of the N. Y. State Universalist Sunday School Association will be held at Newark, Wayne county, on Tuesday, May 26th. Every minister of a Universalist society to which a Sunday school is attached, is a member of the Association; and each Universalist Sunday school is further entitled to two delegates. It is hoped that a large council will be in attendance. Br. John Moore was appointed at the last session to deliver the Occasional Address; and Brs. Sawyer, Skinner and Morey were designated a committee to consider the propriety of publishing a series of books, adapted to the capacities of Sabbath school children, between the ages of five and ten years.

It is respectfully requested of each minister and superintendent in the State, that a report be forthwith transmitted by mail, addressed to me at No. 82 Cliff street, N. York city, of the statistics of the several schools, embracing the following particulars: 1. The date of their organization. 2. The number of scholars, male and female, with the average attendance. 3. The number of teachers, male and female, with the average attendance. 4. The number of sessions, and whether continued in the winter season. 5. The number of volumes in the library. 6. The books used as text-books, hymn books, &c., with suggestions as to the wants of the schools in this respect. 7. Any other suggestions as to improvements which may be made, or of difficulties which are encountered, in the management of the schools.

Let those engaged in schools be careful to make immediate choice of delegates, and also that reports corresponding to the above be furnished without delay. It is important that the information asked be received within a few days, so that a proper report may be presented to the Association. G. L. DEMAREST, Cor. Secretary.

Part XIII of popular lectures on SCIENCE AND ART, by Dionysius Lardner, is issued by Greeley & McElrath, N. Y. STATISTICS!!!

The Universalist Register for 1847:

To Standing Clerks, Editors, and Ministers of the Universalist denomination, generally.

BRETHREN—I am again at my annual begging. I want the Register for 1846 corrected and altered, to suit the present period. I want all additional information suitable for its pages next year—list of preachers, with their post offices, new societies, churches, associations, conventions, Sunday schools, &c.—their location, number of members, pupils, teachers, library books, &c.—in short, any thing and every thing in the shape of statistics that you think I should have, and can use for the Register. I would like a complete list of Universalist societies for every State—that we may know how many we certainly have. Brethren, do please aid me all you can in this important work. Publish the results of your labors in one of our papers, and send me a copy—or, write to me directly, at my expense, (postage is cheap now,) and I will be very grateful for the favor; and, if you wish it, will send you one or more copies of the work by mail, as soon as published.

All information should be here by the middle of June. But let each one send as early as they can collect their statistics to together, provided none sends later than so as to have it reach me by the fourth of July next. That is the latest day. What reaches me after that day, may be inserted; but most probably will be too late.

I hope that as this call comes but once a year, our brethren will oblige me, and aid our common cause, by a prompt and earnest attention to it. Our Editors, also, will please publish this call, (and each send me a copy of their papers that I may notice properly,) and much oblige their fellow laborer and brother,

A. B. GROSH.

Reading, Pa., April 15th, 1846.

Removals.

Br. H. B. May the connection be lasting and mutually profitable.

Br. A. Abbott has removed from Sutton to Spencer, Mass., and Br. B. W. Tingley has taken charge of the society in Sutton.

Br. Joseph Hemphill has removed to Swanzy, N. H.

NEW MEETING HOUSES.—The Universalists of Brentwood, N. H., are about to erect a new meeting house.—The Universalist society in Sutton, Mass., have purchased and fitted up a convenient public Hall for purposes of worship.

The Star in the West says, 'Br. A. Labertew, of Bloomington, Ind., is building a meeting house at his own expense. He is a Universalist indeed; and his zeal is according to his knowledge and means.

DIFFUSION OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE.

THE PENNY MAGAZINE:

A reissue of which commenced in May, 1845. This splendid and useful work contains 4000 imperial octavo pages, and 2000 engravings!! and forms a complete Library within itself.

THE PENNY MAGAZINE was originally issued under the direction of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and is unquestionably the most entertaining and useful of all the popular works which have ever appeared in any age, or in any language. Its pages embrace every subject in the wide field of human knowledge, and as every article, whether on Science, History, Biography, Literature, or the Arts, passed the careful scrutiny and critical ordeal of a committee of learned men, the work may be placed in the hands of the youth of the country, without danger or distrust. In England more than 80,000 copies of the monthly parts were disposed of during the first year of its publication. In the United States, the work has acquired great popularity, and since the commencement of this reissue, the demand for each succeeding number has increased with unparalleled rapidity, so that a second, third, and even fourth edition of the early numbers has been called for. It is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable and entertaining family work, for all classes, which has ever been published. The original cost of the stereotyping and engraving to the London publishers was $25,000. The American reissue is printed on good paper, and well done up in handsome paper covers, and issued in 24 parts at 25 cents each.

The parts average 170 pages each, and will in future be published on the 15th of each month. It is an exact reprint of the London edition, without alteration or abridgment, being printed from the London stereotype plates.

New York, 1846. J. S. REDFIELD, Bookseller, Clinton Hall, N. Y.

Mauder's TREASURY OF HISTORY, No. 6, continues the history of England from 1625, a period of 169 years, during the reigns of Charles I and II, James II, William III, Queen Anne, George I, II and III down to the year 1794. This number contains 107 closely printed pages octavo. 25 cents per number at Beesley's.

The Harpers have just published a neat little 12mo. volume of 179 pages, entitled UNCLE JOHN, 'or it is too much trouble,' by Mrs. Mary Orme. This lady is the author of several good works and this one seems to be written in a pleasing and interesting vein. The moral is good, and the sequel of the tale exemplifies the good, resulting from the Washingtonian plan of reforming the inebriate.

PEERS AND PARVENUS, by Mrs. Gore, is No. 78 of the Harpers Library of Select Novels. 25 cents at Beesley's.

¶ We call the attention of our readers to the prospectus of the PENNY MAGAZINE in this number. There is not a doubt that this work is one of the most comprehensive and useful in the way of giving a concise knowledge of all the subjects treated of in it now extant; and it comprises nearly every subject as far as science, history, biography, literature and the arts are concerned that can be truly useful to community generally.

The profuse wood cut illustrations, of men, animals, birds, edifices, curiosities in nature and art, are life like and can not fail to impress upon the mind the reality and truthfulness of the descriptions to which they are attached. The very cheap form in which this work is now published, places it within the reach of almost every one. Twenty of the numbers are already issued, and may be had at the publishers price of G. N. Beesley, this city, or of the publisher, Clinton Hall, N. Y. Buy it, buy it.

Br. J. Stebbins should be addressed at Canadea, N. Y., instead of Hume.

Br. S. E. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

STATE CONVENTION AT NEWARK.

The Universalist society of Newark, Wayne county, have selected the following individuals to act as a committee of arrangements, during the session of the Convention, viz:—E. T. Grant, D. F. Luce, Daniel Kenyon, L. N. Straw and William Payne. This committee will be found at the Eagle Tavern kept by Gen. Barney, on Monday and Tuesday, and will promptly attend to the wants of all who come from a distance. DEATHS.

At Little Falls, April 1st, Mr. JAMES H. MATTESON, aged about 33 years. Br. Matteson had long been a firm believer in the doctrine of God's impartial grace and goodness. He was uniform, consistent and practical in his moral deportment—he lived in conformity with the dictates of that faith in the Gospel, which he cherished as the truth of God. He was a member of the Universalist society at Newville, who deeply mourn his loss. He was ardent and warm in his attachment to his friends, (and he had many). All who knew him, esteemed him—yea loved him as a man, a citizen and a neighbor. He was kind, courteous, humane, benevolent, generous and liberal in his intercourse with mankind. As a son, as a brother, a volume might be written, commending his acts and doings in the highest degree, as a pattern and example worthy of imitation. As a husband and a father, he was ardently affectionate and devotedly attached to his family. As a husband his devotions were fully appreciated and as warmly reciprocated. He leaves a wife and two small children to mourn his loss; and they mourn deeply and sincerely, yet they mourn not as those who mourn without hope. And a whole community does not only sympathise with the bereaved relatives, but mourns, and deeply too, the loss of one so worthy its best consideration.

JUVENILE HYMNS.

I.

OPENING PIECE.

We come not as the mighty come
Who seek for high renown,
Whose deeds of valor all are done
To win a glorious crown.

We toil not for a sounding name
As many vainly do.

We have a higher, holier aim,
And nobler paths pursue.

We come a band of children free
As are the winds of heaven;
To virtue and to knowledge we
Our every power have given.

One boon alone we ask of you
For all our toil and care,
And you will grant, for you are true,
A blessing and a prayer.

II.

THE SEASONS OF LIFE.

Oh, Life has its Spring-time of sunshine and showers
When the heart is the dwelling of joy,
When thoughts of the birds of the streams and the flowers
The moments of gladness employ.

Life, too, has its Summer of beauty and roses,
When breezes are laden with balm,
And rapt, the bright eye of the spirit reposes
On scenes that are joyous and calm.

And life has its Autumn, when flowers that we cherish
Are touched by the breath of the frost,
And hopes that we deemed all too sunny to perish
Feel the blight of the winds and are lost.

And life has its Winter, cold, gloomy and chilling,
When the heart's solemn beating is slow,
And thoughts of the charnel the bosom are thrilling,
Through whose portals the spirit must go.

III.
SINGING.

We love the Spring,
Who comes to bring
Us gifts of bright and fragrant flowers.
She spreads her wing
O'er every thing,
And makes all fair this world of ours.
Oh, it is joy,
Without alloy,
To breathe the scented air of hers',
It sends a dart
To every heart
That feeling's deepest fountain stirs.
And then her blooms,
And their perfumes,
A thousand gentle lessons teach,
Which written lore,
With all its store,
Has ever failed the heart to teach.
Her beauties tell
To all that dwell
In this unfriendly sphere below
Of glorious Spring
Unwithering
That reigns where flowers immortal blow.

IV.

GOOD NIGHT.

Good Night!
May your slumbers be all blest,
When you close your eyes to rest,
May the holy angels keep Vigils o'er you while you sleep.
Good night!

Go rest!

Darkness now its pinion spreads
Over earth and quiet sheds;
Stars are keeping watch above,
Like unnumbered eyes of love.
Go rest!

Go sleep!

Dream of all things fair and bright,

Blessed homes of joy and light,
Dream of those abiding there,
Free from every earthly care.
Go sleep!

Good night!

Sleep till rosy morning comes
With its light to bless your homes;
Sleep till balmy rest prepares
You for all its toils and cares.

Good night!

THE SPIRIT-BIRTH.

That God foreknew who would be Christians, there can be no doubt; that he predetermined Christ, as the first one fully born of the spirit on earth, is equally clear; and when 'the sons of God shouted for joy' at the morn of creation, he doubtless saw, in prospect, his own pure spirit pervading, progressively, the rising, deepening, spreading generations of men. God sent his spirit forth over the broad waters, and over the fruitful earth, among his ancient people. It had its designed influence, in lighting up the darkened minds of a noble phalanx of prophet-priests; these again sent forth their borrowed spiritual radiance, which served to dispel in a measure the thick spiritual darkness of the people; and last of all came the One that should come—the Shiloh of ancient prediction—the Messiah long promised of the Father—the Son of God—the Saviour of the world; exhibiting to the world's gaze the first one fully born of the spirit—the first on earth bearing fully the image of the King eternal—the one in whom centred the fulfilment of the ancient hope, and through whom should be diffused widely on every hand that spiritual life, which is pouring in upon the human race in copious showers of benediction from the Father's throne.

Look aloft to the heavens for a beautiful symbol. Let darkness now cover the face of the earth; as gross darkness then covered the face of the people. Above, star after star appears to our view, each shining with greater brilliancy than any that came before; like the increasing spiritual light of each succeeding prophet. Soon, all beneath the blue dome of nature is lit up with a full twilight, and stars innumerable pierce with their mellow light down through the hazy ether; symboling forth the general spiritual advance of the people. Anon, the queen of night issues forth, and rises above the horizon, gilding at first the topmost mountains and hills, spires and roofs, with a flood of borrowed light, which, gradually spreading, lights up at length the deepest dell and penetrates the densest forest; answering to the broad and brilliant though borrowed spiritual blaze, which first became visible to human gaze at the nativity of Jesus Christ, and which must spread wider, and still wider, until every mind shall see its light and every heart feel its warmth. And still further, as the borrowed light of the moon which encircles the earth in the still night time, is swallowed up by the broader and denser original light of the sun following; so the intensest light of the Gospel on earth, will be succeeded by the heaven-encircling halo of eternal Day beyond. Such is the symbol, such its application, and such the heavenly lesson it contains.

That Christ should be the first of spiritual-birth among men, is what God foreknew and predestinated ere time began. And Christ was to be the standard of spiritual perfection, bearing the express image of the Father, through earth's coming ages. God is the divine Original; Christ is his visible image on earth; and the followers of Christ—that progressing company of the faithful, which shall in time overspread the face of the earth—are spoken of as being conformed to his image, implying of course that they are also conformed to the image of the great Original. THE LAST PRAYER.—A SERMON.

BY REV. J. J. AUSTIN

'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.' Luke xxiii: 34.

In this text is exhibited the SPIRIT of the Christian religion: a jewel whose value is far above rubies; a diamond glittering with the wealth of Heaven; the pinnacle of the Christian temple, reaching above the heavens, and crowned with the blaze of light divine. It bursts forth in its fulness in the last, dying, agonizing prayer of Jesus Christ, the immaculate Son of God, the Saviour of the world. The circumstances under which 'The Last Prayer,' ascended to the throne of the Eternal, are undoubtedly familiar to each of you who hear me. It was uttered, not for those who were endeared to him by the common ties of kindred; not for the fond father and tender mother, who had watched over his infant hours with parental affection; not for a gentle sister and manly brother, who were bound to him by a thousand tender ties of fraternal love; not for friends, who had stood by with soothing words, and kindly deeds, when affliction's mantle was thrown heavily around him; nor yet for those who, without any especial regard for, had never done him injury—but it was breathed forth from a soul full of love, in behalf of his most bitter and relentless enemies, who had sought his death gloatingly for a long time, and who at length, as was purposed in infinite Wisdom, had succeeded in bringing him for crucifixion to Calvary's bloody brow. The people, and rulers, and soldiers stood around, deriding him with bitter taunt, and revelry, and jeer, while his hands and feet were spiked to the elevated beam; and instead of heaping curses and maledictions upon those who were so deeply guilty in the sight of Heaven, and who had persecuted him all his life long, he could only raise the last, deep, tremulous tones of his voice in accents of mercy and forgiveness; and while the life-blood was streaming to the ground, the Godlike prayer ascended from his lips—'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'

It is to us a source of deep pleasure, in looking over the record of the world, to see here and there an instance of that exalted patriotism, which shrinks not from death in its worst form for the good of a nation; of that enduring friendship, which will brave even death in defence of one beloved; and of that undisturbed philosophy, which repines not when death draws near. Instances like these might easily be pointed out. But where, on the record of things, that were, can you find an instance of that compassionate love, extended to enemies, which is brought to our view in the language of the text? It can not be found. In the whole range of ancient Heathen, or Jewish, or modern history, for an instance so fraught with God's eternal love, you search in vain. And this alone—independent of the love, seen in the life, teachings and miracles of Jesus Christ, and of the great and good design of his crucifixion and resurrection—is sufficient to challenge the belief of a world in the divinity of the spirit of his mission. Yes, when I see the tear of pity that flows for human woe, I must regard its origin divine; when I see a pure example of paternal, or filial, or fraternal love, I must believe its source divine; and why should I not, when I behold an instance of forgiveness and blessing, extended to an enemy, consider it the offspring of Him, whom we love 'because he first loved us'?

It is a well known fact, that the nature and object of Christ's mission were very much misapprehended by the Jews.* Notwithstanding prophecy had foretold his coming several hundred years in advance, and notwithstanding he was daily and hourly expected, at the time of his advent; yet when he came, he was at once rejected by the chief priests and rulers, and the indignation of the people was stirred up against him. And why was it? It was because the nature and object of his mission were misunderstood. The Jewish nation was then subject to the authority of the Roman power, and was severely oppressed by the Roman governors. The ecclesiastical institutions of the Jews remained; and they of course were very anxious to throw off the Roman yoke entirely. Under circumstances like these, it can but appear evident that their disappointment was great, when the Messiah they were expecting proved to be an entirely different personage from what they had hoped. Their civil power was gone! And they were looking for a temporal prince, who should enjoy a marked degree of the divine favor, and who should break up their Roman bondage, and restore to them their former independence. But their hopes proved illusive! For instead of assuming the civil government and power, and striking at once a panic in the camp of the Roman legions; Christ went about lifting up his voice in their synagogues, in the streets, by the sea-shore and on the mountain-side; overthrowing their pompous rites and ceremonies; teaching the spirituality of his mission; instructing them of a Father's love, and of their duty to love Him and their fellow men; healing the sick, cleansing the leprous, raising the dead and casting out the devils. Instead of being the temporal saviour of the Jewish nation, he was to be the spiritual Saviour of the world; he was to save the world from sin, both of doctrine and practice; and the work is gradually going onward to its fulfilment. The disappointment of the Jewish people was very great. And although their prejudices and prepossessions against him would have been removed, had they listened to his exposition of the truth, and were removed so far as they did so; yet his doctrines and precepts struck terror to the rabbins and rulers, because in part, they believed him to be not the Messiah they were looking for, and in part, because they saw that their own power and influence would be overthrown. Hence then the lengthened, and portentous, and deceitful opposition, which they brought against him. They resorted to every artifice they could devise, to incense the populace against the innocent and God-like Saviour, and to every stratagem their ingenuity could invent, to bring upon him a felon's punishment. And when at length, as was foreseen by prophecy ages before its accomplishment, he was condemned and stretched out upon the cross—and all to bring out a noble purpose of Deity, yet hidden in the future—the heavenly prayer was uttered for his vilest enemies, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'

Their sin was great in the sight of Heaven.—Like the eleven brethren of the patriarch Joseph, who sold him a slave to the Midianite merchantmen, they little dreamed that their present evil purposes would be overruled for good. There was undoubtedly a feeling of justification in the hearts of some, on the ground that he was an impostor worthy of death; but those more immediately concerned knew, as was declared by one of their rulers, that he had done nothing worthy of death, though he answered not their expectations of the promised Messiah. They were guilty, deeply, darkly guilty; and Christ in his dying moments prayed for their forgiveness. He prayed not for the remission of the punishment of their sin; but he prayed for the putting away of the sin itself.—Punishment, justly incurred, can never be forgiven; it must fall upon the head of the guilty sinner.—But Christ prayed for the forgiveness, or remission, or putting away of their sin. They were ignorant of God's purposes, which were fast unfolding, and he would have them enlightened; they were sinful in the sight of Heaven, and he would have them reformed. And to this end he prayed, Father, remove their errors and their vices—'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'

They knew not what they did. They were not aware that their agency in the crucifixion of the Saviour, would eventually redound to the glory of the world. They little knew that the part they were performing was an important feature in the establishment and triumph of the Christian religion. It was not yet revealed to them, that they should crucify the Son of God, the Saviour of the world; who should arise from the dead, carrying captivity captive, and giving gifts unto men; whose life, and teachings, and death, and resurrection, should exhibit the principles by which the world is to be reformed, and purified, and blessed. Hence the deep and fervent prayer of the Saviour on the cross—'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'

Permit me now, brethren, to put the question to every believing soul, Will they not be forgiven? Christ prayed to the Father for the forgiveness, or freedom from sin, of his most bitter and malignant enemies,—those who were guilty of deeply sinning against the Holy Ghost, or the holy spirit of love, which was the moving motive of every thought and deed of his whole life. And will they not be forgiven? will not their sins be put from them, and they be assimilated to the purity and holiness of the life of Christ, the express image of the Father? What Christian can doubt for one moment upon this point? The Saviour himself declared, that those who spoke against him, though guilty of all manner of sins and blasphemies, should be forgiven; while those who spake against the Holy Ghost—against the spirit of love which pervaded his life, and teachings, and deeds—should not be forgiven in that aion (age), nor the aion (age or dispensation) following; but that they should eventually be forgiven, is evident from the NATURE of the sin, and from SCRIPTURE TESTIMONY upon this very point.

The sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, consisted in ascribing Christ's good deeds to the power of evil,—as some of the Jews said, 'This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of devils.' Now as Christ was believed to be an impostor; and as they must account for his good deeds in some way; it seemed quite probable, in their view, that an impostor would be none too good to cover over evil with an appearance of goodness. We must therefore suppose, that they really believed what they said; and admitting that they believed it, the conclusion follows, that when they become convinced to the contrary—when their unbelief is removed, whether in the present life or the future—their sin will be forgiven or put from them. Such is our conclusion, drawn from the nature of the 'unpardonable sin,' the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost; and such is the opinion of the best commentators, among whom are the celebrated Wakefield and Dr. Adam Clarke.

But the Scriptures are by no means silent upon this point. In the 11th chapter of Romans, St. Paul speaks of the nature and object of the Jewish apostasy, and of the coming in of the Gentiles; and he shows most clearly, that when the Gentiles shall have been converted, the Jews shall also be brought within the fold of Christ. Concerning the Jews he says, 'Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them (the Jews) to jealousy. Now if the fall of them (the Jews) be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness.' The Jews were doubtless permitted to fall, and the Gentiles to supply their place, that the spiritual pride of the former might be humbled, and to convince them both that God is no 'respector' of persons, or tribes or of nations. Again he says, 'For if the casting away of them (the Jews) be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?' Again to the Romans or Gentiles he says, 'Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God; on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness; if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.' It is worthy of notice here, that being 'cut off,' and being 'grafted in,' signify nothing more nor less than being excluded from, and being accepted to, belief in the Gospel. Observe the language, 'and they also (the Jews), if they abide not in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graft them in again.' And he farther says, 'For I would not, brethren, that ye shall be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits (or proud as the Jews were); that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved:—what, those who committed the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost? Yes, for see it is written, 'There shall come out of Zion the Deliver, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.' Ungodliness, in its broadest sense, signifies sin of every kind and degree; and the Deliver is to 'turn away ungodliness from Jacob. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins.' This taking away sin, is the same thing with the forgiveness, which Christ invoked upon the heads of his murderers. St. Paul then said, that although the Jews were for the present enemies to the Gospel, yet they were still beloved by the Father who would finally bring them in. 'As concerning the Gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the Father's sake. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through thine unbelief; even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.' And in view of the generous purposes of God, thus fairly opened to our view, St. Paul breaks forth in strains of gratitude and praise. 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory forever.'

Thus do the Scriptures harmonize with the conclusion, drawn from the nature of the sin against the Holy Ghost; and if that sin shall be forgiven or put away from the remnant of Israel, after the Gentiles shall have come in, who will affirm that other sins shall remain? And if all sins shall be put away, in the triumphant progress of Christianity, will not the prayer of the Saviour on the cross be answered—'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do?'

In the present condition of the Jewish people, we also behold collateral—yea, prophetic evidence, of the truth of the doctrine of St. Paul, and of the final fulfilment of Christ's dying petition. The Jews at this day, in fulfilment of an ancient prediction, are scattered abroad throughout the wide world. And while Christianity is rapidly spreading among other nations of the earth, they remain almost with one consent firm in their unbelief. This proves what? Not that they will always remain so; but as a portion of prophecy is fulfilled, before our eyes, we have no right to infer that the remainder will not be. Quite the contrary. And in addition to the conclusion, drawn from the nature of the grossest of the Jewish sins; and to the testimony of St. Paul; we have the present condition of the Jewish people, in proof that the whole prophecy will eventually be accomplished; and if accomplished, Christ's prayer to the Father was not in vain.

And here allow me to say, that the fulfilment of ancient prophecy, in the present and the future, is to my mind a demonstration of the Heaven-derived mission of Jesus Christ. It is a progressive miracle, independent of finite man, and having its beginning, continuation and end, in the infinite power, wisdom and goodness of God. This is an argument that infidel sophistry has never, and can never, invalidate in the least degree.

Thus, brethren, do we respond to the question, Will the prayer of the Saviour ever be answered? by reference to the nature of the vilest sin of the Jews; by reference to the testimony of St. Paul; and by reference to the gradual spread of Christianity, and the fulfilment of prophecy before our eyes. But what is the answer of him, who believes in the endless perpetuity of suffering and sin? He gives the question a decided negative. And why? Is not Christ, the petitioner, according to his view, the very one who will answer the petition? Is he not God in the flesh? And would the Deity ask himself to do, what he has no disposition to do? Or if God wills that it should be done,—that his enemies while he was on the cross, should be forgiven because of their ignorance,—has he not the power, nor the wisdom, to accomplish it, by removing their sins? What is the reason, that Christ's prayer will not be answered? Did he not pray as he should have prayed? Is God opposed to it, or Christ, or angels, or good men? Oh, reflect upon the question,—ye who believe, if any such are before me, that the vilest and most sinful of earth's children will never be forgiven—will never have their iniquities washed away, by the refreshing and vitalizing dews of grace which fall upon the mountains of Zion,—pause, I entreat you, ponder well the question, and then decide, Will the last, the dying prayer of the Saviour, which ascended to Heaven from the bloody brow of Mount Calvary, never be accomplished?

I pass from this point by observing, that this incident of the Saviour's life should be deeply impressed upon our minds, and should go with us all our lives long. Every feature of Christ's life and teachings, was given for our example and admonition; but this one seems to be especially worthy of our attention. We behold Christ resisting temptation, in all its alluring forms; we behold his life crowned with meekness and humility; we behold him firm in his integrity and truth, though beset by a thousand enemies; we behold his ever gushing love for the most sinful of the human family; we behold his perfect resignation in the hour of death, enabling him to exclaim, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit;' but the crowning excellence of his life was visible only in death,—in the last prayer he ever offered, invoking forgiveness and blessing upon those, who were cursing and reviling him in the last bitter agonies of death—'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'

Oh, my brethren, we need the same strength against temptation; we need the same meekness and humility; we need the same integrity and truth; we need the same expanded and ever expanding love; we need the same calm and dignified resignation, in all the allotments of life, and in the hour of death; and especially do we need that spirit of forgiveness and blessing toward enemies, every day of our lives, which adds such lustre in the dying hour to the luminous life of Jesus Christ. May this prayer ever be our example! Are we conscious that we mean well, however wrongfully our words and actions may be misconstrued? Let us rely, then, upon the integrity of our motives; and if others judge us severely, let us remember that we may do wrong, although we mean right; and let us every day pray for wisdom from above to guide us, and for blessing upon those who pour out malediction upon us. This is by far the better course, in every point of view. St. Paul has said, 'Be not wise in your own conceits. Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight of all men. If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men.' As though he had said, see that your own feelings and conduct are right; but if, as may sometimes happen, you are unjustly condemned, 'recompense to no man evil for evil;' otherwise you make yourself guilty, and sink to a level with your enemy. 'Dearly beloved,' he says, 'avenge not yourselves; but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head'—which in the end penetrate, and warm, and subdue the heart! By doing good to those who do evil to us, we reprove them in a way that will stir up the deep fountain of the soul, overcome their enmity, and make them our warmest friends; while by rendering evil for evil, the first aggression is repelled with interest, the aggressor feels justified in renewing the attack, which is again repelled with increasing vengeance—and thus defiance, and insult, and injury is hurled from enemy to enemy, and the battle can not cease until the combatants are ruined! Oh, as you love your own happiness, brethren, discard this principle of action at once and forever; inscribe high upon your shield the Christian maxim, 'Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good'; and even through life, whenever an insult or injury is offered you, cast it not back, but repeat the prayer of the Saviour on the summit of Calvary—'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'

And passing from private, to public religious life, the prayer of the text should be constantly before us. There are those, who regard our faith as an engine of evil, and as either wilfully ignorant or knowingly wicked. They do not understand it; having been taught by its enemies. And whenever we hear, as we frequently do, ourselves denounced as infidels and heretics, and our faith reprobated as a false and dangerous machination of the devil; we must not be offended—remembering that the same charge was brought against Christ; and if they called the 'Master of the house Beelzebub,' why should they not those of 'his household'?—Nay, my hearers,—those of you who profess our holy faith,—'be not overcome of evil'; repel not this charge, for the purpose of casting it upon your neighbors; but even pray for them, as you justly can, in the language of the Saviour—'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'. They need forgiveness; the mists before their eyes need to be dissipated; the false opinions in their minds need to be removed; the wrong impressions in their hearts need to be eradicated; 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'. They know not, that they oppose the will and purpose and oath of Heaven; they know not, that they traduce the character of the infinite and ever glorious One; they know not, that they array Scripture against Scripture, and make the Word of God its own murderer; they know not, that they build up a fortress, behind which infidelity cowers to escape the shafts of pure Christianity;—in short, they do not know, that in their zeal to build up the Saviour's kingdom, they are directly engaged in tearing it down; in trying to root up the tares, they root up the wheat also—'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!'

Oh, the wealth of a Saviour's love! Look at it with a fixed gaze for one moment! It is the life beaming in every feature, and irradiating the whole character of Christ; the life visible in all the kindly deeds and miracles of the Saviour; the life breathed forth in blessing and forgiveness for his murderers, from the blood-crowned summit of Calvary; the life coming down from above, and filling the soul of the earnest follower of Christ; that life urging the Christian on to deeds of benevolence and mercy; the life breaking in showers of benediction upon all from God; the life expressed under the simple yet rich titles—Goodness, Holiness, Love! May this spirit—this life—ever be ours, brethren!

May it melt the icebergs of selfishness within, and cause them to flow in rivers of kindness! May it make us meek, and lowly, and humble, in view of our many transgressions! May it inspire within us all that is true and holy, in thought and life! May it fit us for the effective discharge of every duty! May it cheer us in our upward and declining progress toward the tomb! And when the twilight of life shall have faded into the darkness of death, may it go with us through tears and lamentations to Heaven!

THE IMPORTANCE OF ACTION.

Never, perhaps, has there been a time, when Universalists were so loudly called upon to act as the present; and never a time when so much could be accomplished by right action. Partialism has rapidly declined for some time past. The fires of modern revivalism have ceased to burn upon her altars; and are fast burning down her temple. The ruins of her proud edifice, are filled with the mangled bodies of its slaughtered victims. The air, around it, resounds with the maniac's wild cry.—The smoke of the torment of the damned, rises from its deserted walls—while the multitude stand aghast at the sight of such horrid scenes; or turn with rapid strides towards the dreary regions of infidelity. Universalism is the only remedy for these evils. That alone can lead the skeptic to hope in Christ—the awe-stricken to see the hand of God in scenes of woe. That alone can stay the suicide's hand—restore reason to her lost home—and kindle the fires of true devotion. And will not Universalists be up and doing?

We give place to the following article as an act of simple justice to the writer. We take no part in the differences or difficulties mentioned; and seriously deprecate the evils attendant thereon. The article from Br. S. published in our last volume was free from personalities or any thing that could reasonably give offence to any one. For in it he says he was unjustly assailed and slanderously treated in a neighboring journal, and then refused a hearing of any vindication against those unjust imputations. It has always appeared to us that when any man, possessing a character, is assailed publicly by the press, and his character and motives impugned, he ought to be allowed the opportunity of being heard in his own defence through the same medium. But perhaps, not being acquainted with all the circumstances, we may not be competent to judge in this case correctly. We take no sides, no part, in the controversy, but simply allow Br. S. to speak for himself. Of his communication the public must judge.

Ed.

TO THE PUBLIC.—A CARD.

It may seem a needless work to those well acquainted with the circumstances, that have from time to time brought my name before the public, in a manner not very pleasant to its possessor, nor very satisfactory to many as to the why and wherefore, the explanation now given. But I deem it my duty to give it—leaving others to judge of its propriety. Twice has my name been placed at the head of editorials in two of the Universalist papers of the State—once by Br. Skinner, to vindicate it from a false and malicious attack made upon it by a writer in the Western Luminary, and once by Br. Hammond to call the same attack complimentary; and render to me a little praise for justice. Evidently one of these brethren had a wrong view of the matter; and certainly the public will inquire which, and look to me for an answer. This I will give. The article not called out these editorials in part, was published in the 49th No. of the Western Luminary for 1845, over the signature of V. B. M. (which means V. B. Mix,) and was affirmed by I. B. Sharp, in apparent reply to an article published in No. 45 of the Magazine and Advocate of the same year over my signature. I felt aggrieved at the article of V. B. M. (which, if true, implicated me with falsehood—littleness—vanity and self-arrogance) and have just succeeded in inducing Br. Hammond to say he doubts not I feel injured; albeit he considers complimentary what I have assured him (offering to furnish proof) was false and slanderous, and calculated to injure the cause of Universalism, if suffered to pass unrebuked. I have long been silently laboring to effect an arrangement of the matter. I have been refused a hearing in the Luminary and treated with dignified silence—after having the word of its Editor pledged to me that I should have a hearing—and after sending him an article that one of his associates pronounced suitable for publication. And but for the position I occupy I might now pass the whole affair over with the silent contempt its despicable character merits. Injustice to Br. Skinner, I wish now to say, once for all, that he was right in supposing that I had been attacked with malice and falsehood. The article of V. B. M. is well known in Hume to be false and slanderous. Neither its writer nor affirmer dare qualify to the truth of some of its statements. I honestly believe that these Rev. gentlemen intended to injure me by the publication of the article in question, which injury I would willingly bear did not Universalism here languish in the faint struggles of death, by reason of falsehood and slander being found when truth and good will were looked for. And while, for reasons that follow, I leave this subject and all concerned to their own reflections, with the assurance that I shall ever cherish a spirit of good will towards them, to pursue the way that seemeth unto them good; I would say to the committee of discipline of the Allegany Association, you have solemn responsibilities resting upon you, which may God help you to discharge rightly, and to the dead society and church in Hume; you have a weight upon your grave that must be removed before you can rise to spiritual life.

I will now define my position as a minister of the reconciliation. I was introduced to the public by the New York Association of Universalists. I lived over a year within the limits of the Central Association, and during that time, received from the chairman of the committee on fellowship and ordination a letter of fellowship; but from causes that belong to the C. A. to investigate, that letter was never laid before it, and I am now registered 'not in formal fellowship.' I have been in Allegany more than 17 months as a stated preacher; and intend to continue to preach whenever opportunities present; of which there is no lack at present; believing it my privilege to be excused from participating in all affairs pertaining to our denomination as an organized body, so long as I am thus isolated and alone. And I hope, that, asking no praise—no commendation for my humble labors—unmindful of coldness and disrespect—and thankful for all the fellowship the good and true may grant me, I may be fortunate in escaping the calumny of professed friends. I expect if I can get enough of Allegany currency into transferables—to take the hands of many old friends at the State Convention and at the meeting of the Central Association. Respectfully,

J. STEBBINS.

EXTRACTS

From a letter to the Editor, dated St. Albans, Vt., March 23d, 1846.

I here mail you $1.00 for the Magazine, which I should like from the first of February. * * * There is no paper advocating the doctrines of our faith, which I more highly esteem than the Magazine of Utica. It is the first that ever came in my way regularly—and gave me a knowledge of the character and condition of our denomination—beside opening to my understanding many of the religious principles which I now dearly cherish. It is about ten years since I formed my acquaintance with that journal, and from that period, down till within a few months, I have been its constant reader.—You may therefore form some idea of my attachment to the Magazine and Advocate—and understand the reason why I long to behold again its familiar features.

I rejoice, Br. Skinner, that the editorial charge of the paper has at last returned to yourself—its original owner, for care and keeping—believing that in your hands, it will lose nothing in value.

* * * Here I am 'way up in Vermont,' as people say sometimes, where johnny cake, maple sugar, and sheep, are among the principal commodities. As it regards maple sugar, we have not commenced making, as the spring has not been very favorable. We hope to have freezing nights and sunny days soon, for you know (as you formerly lived in New England) such is the kind of weather we need for that business.

I am situated not quite among the hills, but where I can see them 'high and lifted up' on the east.—St. Albans is a lake town. It lies on the beautiful lake Champlain—nearly opposite Plattsburg, N. Y. Steam boats run on this lake from Whitehall to St. Johns, a distance of 150 miles. From St. Johns to Montreal it is only 23 miles. Hence passengers can go from Whitehall to Montreal the same day—and feast their eye as they travel.—There is not in the Western world a more beautiful body of water upon which to sail.

I have been here since last September—and therefore feel very well satisfied with my new home. I find that the people have heard of Universalism here as well as in western New York, where I formerly lived. It is not altogether a stranger among them. Some dare even believe it—and not a few neither.

In St. Albans we have a good house—society—congregation—and the prospects are bright for the future. I think, on the whole, that our cause prospers in this section of the country as rapidly as we could well expect.

My health has been very good since my return from the South, for which I truly feel to thank God. And I am determined to devote my life more to His service, than I have heretofore done. To preach Christ and him crucified, in my humble and feeble manner, shall be my greatest pleasure, 'for I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ my Lord.'

Yours affectionately,

W. J. G.

TO J. A. AND F. ASPINWALL.

Reflections, on reading the obituary notice of their son's death, in the Magazine and Advocate.

Here, through this whispering pine, with melancholy wail,
The winds a requiem sing; sad notes our ear assail;
Sad tales of buried joys, of tender cions cleft;
How from the parent stem, one lovely bud is left,
Transported to a better—fairer land, to bloom;
No blight to fear from this, our wilderness of gloom;
Engrafted on the boughs of everlasting truth,
To thrive forever there in green immortal youth.
Ye moon-beams, centre here, with soft and silv'ry light—
You solemn vigils keep, all through the live-long night—
The night that rules the grave, where sleeps our cherub boy—

But yesterday so blithe, so full of health and joy.
Each morn, the sun's first rays will calmly, sweetly shine.
T' illumine the sacred mound, beneath this growing pine—
Where, tears with dew drops blend, at morn and dewy even,
And sighs, and moans, and prayers, ascend to Heaven.
Hark! even now a sound of grief, a low faint cry—
'Oh! must my beautiful—my bosom's cherish'd, die?'
Even so! for life is like—an evanescent flower—
In beauty buds, and blooms, and withers in an hour!
Dear mourners, dry your tears, your loved one is at rest,
From suffering, pain and grief, with angels ever blest.
That jewel of your heart, your once embosom'd gem,
A ray to Heaven return'd, to grace a diadem.
You prized it highly here, enhanced in value there—
More rich a thousand fold, and oh! surpassing fair!
Your priceless treasure now—deposited in heaven,
Secure and happy there—a Father's pledge is given.

THE MISGUIDED DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. S. ELIZA GIBSON.

'Gold pays the worth of all things here;
But not of love—that gem's too dear.'

CHAPTER V.

It was near eleven o'clock of a balmy eve in early May.
All without was hushed save the minstrelsy of frogs as they swelled

—'their speckled throats
By the constant piping of tender notes,' and the gentle rustle of new-born leaves as they were stirred by the fitfully passing breeze. The stars looked calmly down, not brightly indeed, for a foggy atmosphere that seemed as a mist of tears which they had shed on beholding the frailties and imperfections of humanity, partially obscured their brightness. Still it was such a scene as saddened hearts might look upon with pleasure. Within a room richly carpeted and costly furnished sat a lady, of appearance no more than two and twenty years of age; mournfully beautiful, though her beauty now only seemed to be a wreck of what it had been in former years. She was engaged in reading at a small centre table which but an hour before was overspread with books in gilded binding, but these were now removed to the farther side, and in their stead were placed a number of others of far less beautiful exterior and in appearance of far greater usage. Now and then she would raise her book nearer the light, as if to decipher the pencillings on its margins, and again resumed her reading. Page after page was turned down, till at last she turned to a printer's half-blank which was filled out with penciled notes. Closely she held the book to the light, and after varying its position several times she seemed to comprehend what was written, and then closing the book she leaned her head upon her hand.

Half-stifled sobs escaped her and tears in quick succession fell upon the table. At length she spoke—'Oh! my father, would that thy life had been spared, for then thy daughter would have been less erring; less faulty and oh! how much less miserable. Or would that she had known the value of the boon that thou didst leave, for then—she continued as she cast her eyes around her—'would she never have been surrounded by these hateful testimonials of her folly! But oh! my mother; it is to you that I owe my folly, my error, my misery; to you I listened and to your delusive guidance did I fall a sacrifice!—She paused for a moment and again resumed—'but I will not now condemn thee; thou hast gone I trust to a realm where errors can never enter, and where sorrows such as attended thy last days here, can never intrude; and oh! if the spirits of that blessed abode are permitted to look back upon this erring world, may I not feel that thou and my father are watching over me?'—She arose and going to the window opened the blinds and looked out upon the night-scene. Pale Luna was fast sinking to rest, but her light, like lingering smiles, still rested on 'hill and dale and opening flower.' To her the scene was beautiful beyond description, and while she stood gazing upon it in silent admiration, her heart arose in thankfulness to the great Author of beauty, for awakening within her, an appreciation of such loveliness, and in silent aspirations to the Father of spirits, that he would give her submission and direction while treading the rugged pathway of her life. Soon a clock in an adjoining apartment struck the hour of twelve, and gathering up her books, she took the lamp and left the room. Need the reader be told that this was Mrs. Gardner? she who was first introduced as the beautiful and admired Alethea Morse? or need he be told that though three years had scarcely passed since she bowed at the hymeneal altar, she had tasted often and deeply too of sorrow's cup, and learned that wealth is far from being the true magnet to the abode of peace and happiness? These need not be told, but the reader may ask why she had thus deeply drank of the cup of sorrow? and what had rendered her thus keenly alive to the true sources of her sorrows? Read on and thou shalt know.

For a time after her marriage, the lovers of display might have supposed her happy, but ere two short months had fled away, such an opinion was far from being a correct one. True, certain apartments in her rich abode had been fitted up with new and more fashionable furniture. Parties, composed of company of her own selection, were made, and she was decked in all the trappings of fashionable life, but was this all? Ah! no. She knew before her marriage that Chauncey Gardner was not highly esteemed, but now that she was brought more nearly in contact with his mean spirit, she detested him, and though he was her husband yet she utterly loathed the sight of him, and sought in other society companionship which his did not yield. But even appearances of happiness were not long to last.

Mr. Gardner had spent his whole life in pursuit of wealth, and though he was not possessed of a miserly disposition—inasmuch as he was desirous that his possessions should shine forth and dazzle the beholder—yet he was penurious, over-reaching in his deal, even with the poor, and was never known to spend a farthing which was not absolutely necessary, or which would not make a display of his taste upon which he prided himself exceedingly. He had lived a bachelor, but now that he had reached 'the sear and yellow leaf' of life, he felt how pleasing it would be to have one who would be mindful of his wants; whose interest would be the same as his, and in whose society the hours of age would pass less drearily away. He grasped eagerly at the suggestion of Mrs. Morse, that Alethea might become such an one, for in appearance 'she was all that his fancy painted' as the wife he would select. Young, beautiful, and gay, he felt satisfied and proud too when she entered his dwelling a bride. All her wishes were gratified, and did she desire any improvement, expense was not spared in the gratification of that desire; but when he saw that his devotion was not reciprocated; that other society was sought in preference to his, and that she shunned his presence, though he were sick and lonely, he was displeased and his revengeful feelings were aroused. He spoke to her tauntingly, of how her mother who could no longer support her had palmed her off upon him, and at length he forbade all company his house, and threatened to disown her entirely if she sought company elsewhere. Alas! unhappy Alethea; of what avail was now her wealth or her splendor? Or of what value the decorations of riches? Did they purchase peace or confer satisfaction? Ah no, these were gems for which a far different price must be given!

All society was forbidden her, and the only alternative left, was solitude and her own reflections, or the company of a childish old man with his taunts and jeers. The former was of course chosen, but no well stored mind offered subjects for reflection and no deeds of merit gave peaceful recollections. To her it seemed that her life had been one continued round of sorrow and folly, and bitterly did she lament that she had not heeded the few warning words of her friend.

She now remembered her father's library, in reading which he had spent so many pleasant and agreeable hours, and she was determined to procure a part in hope that she too might reap a little satisfaction. He had often told her when she sat by his side a happy child, that when she became older she would find much in his books that would be interesting and valuable. But after his decease, Mrs. Morse who said she did 'hate to see so many leather covered books around,' gathered them into a chest and placed them in the garret, making the case henceforth a repository for her china, declaring that she thought the change a great improvement and one that showed far more taste.

It was something more than a mile from Mrs. Gardner's to where her mother resided, but one moonlit evening, when she thought that her absence would not be discovered, she stole silently out and proceeded on foot to what had once been her happy home. She found the chest of books as she had anticipated and looked them over for a selection. There were works of history and those treating upon the sciences, together with some which might furnish a pleasant and agreeable mode of passing now and then an hour, by furnishing subjects for fanciful reflections. Most of the works had been faithfully perused by her father and contained many penciled passages and remarks. She made choice and returned home, little knowing the value of that boon which they were to confer. The most of her time was now passed in reading, for though she commenced more particularly for the purpose of diverting her mind from sorrow, yet only a short time was necessary to convince her that she had opened upon a field which promised the most precious and valuable treasures—the field of knowledge. She seemed to have entered upon a new era in her existence, and to have caught the glimmering of a light which awakened a desire that would not be satisfied, until that light had dawned in the fulness of its splendor upon her mind.

Naturally alive to inquiry and of a warm and ardent temperament, she soon formed a resolution to persevere in her study and had soon transferred the whole library to her own room. But alas! what grief took possession of her soul, that she had so long remained ignorant of the many precious lessons therein inculcated; and how justly in her heart might she have condemned her mother who had directed her in so wrong a path-way. When in the society of her husband, he still continued to heap abuse upon her head, but she had schooled her heart to forbearance and received it as patiently as possible, while she felt keenly that she partially deserved such treatment.—But other sorrows were in store for her.

Mrs. Morse's extravagance had involved her so deeply in debt that her creditors, who considered themselves imposed upon, levied upon the comfortable little cottage which had so long been her home and it was sold. And now it was that Alethea had it so completely in her power to provide for her mother, but how grieved and mortified was she when peremptorily told by Mr. Gardner that not one farthing of his should be expended in her support. 'It was she,' said he, 'who has been the cause of all my sorrow.' Oh, what may not the dark spirit of revenge prompt one to do, when awakened in a breast of kindred passions! And what were Alethea's feelings? Surrounded by all the blessings of wealth, and her only remaining parent an outcast upon the world! Possessed of her stored hundreds and her mother a 'county pauper.' More unendurable than they would have been, had she been obliged to toil in poverty for her maintenance. But she needed not even the sympathy of her daughter long. A few short months put a period to the existence of the misjudging and broken-spirited woman. But we will go on to the conclusion of our sad story. After her mother's death, time dragged even more heavily to Alethea than before and she spent most of her hours as on the evening described at the commencement of the present chapter. The sight of her possessions had become hateful in her eyes, and the sound of her husband's voice an almost terror to her heart.

The two friends Alethea and Mary—the latter having removed to a neighboring village—had scarcely met since their marriage, but they had occasionally exchanged letters, and Alethea knew by the tenor of Mary's that her life was one of happiness. Report too said that George Graham though a mechanic was highly esteemed. Alethea's resolution was formed. She had strove long to bear up under the weight of trial and she could do so no longer. Again she wrote to Mary, but we have only room for an extract—

'Yes Mary, she who once exulted in prospect of a station so much superior to yours, now begs a place at your hearth. She who once thought that she should be happy enough, because her abode was to be one of wealth, now sues for a shelter under your roof. I ask it not for a long time, for I feel that ere many weeks have fled away, I shall be in that better land—where the wicked cease from troubling and where the weary be at rest.' I can not bear the thought of lying down to die where no friendly hand is ready to smooth my pillow, and where no sympathetic eye, will watch my passage to the tomb! Grant my prayer then and the father of the orphan, and friend of the afflicted will reward you.'

Mary did grant her request and sent a friend to bring her to her own happy home. But Alethea's predictions were soon fulfilled. Three weeks had scarcely passed ere she was numbered with the dead. But she lived to see her name in the public print in connection with—'all persons are forbidden to harbor or trust her on my account;' and this disgraceful notice was signed by him whose fortune she once supposed would make her happy. Thus passed away one whose heart might have been made the home of the warmest affections, and whose mind might have been the treasury of the most brilliant and sparkling of gems.

Reader; our tale is done. We have not studied beauty of expression or elegance of style, for these would but please the ear or tickle the fancy. A higher aim and a nobler object have been held in view, that of awakening the thoughtless to reflection. Look then to the moral. Art thou a young man?—let the perusal of this story teach thee to seek a companion among those in whose hearts there is an answering tone, and in whose minds dwell a capacity for knowledge, rather than a desire for extravagance and display. Art thou a young lady?—read and let it be a lesson which shall teach thee to beware lest in the bestowal of thy hand thou mayst be too much dazzled by the glitter of wealth. But art thou a mother? Then indeed have these lines attracted the eye of one for whom they were more particularly intended. Thou hast here learned the fate of one whose life might have been a life of usefulness and enjoyment, and whose death but as the passing away of a lovely dream to the awakening of a more blissful reality. Learn thou why her life was not thus, and pray God to teach thee the duties of thy high responsibility, that those who have been trusted to thy guidance may be directed in the pathway of virtue and true knowledge.

THE PERSPIRATORY TUBES OF THE SKIN.

Taken separately the little perspiratory tube, with its appended gland, is calculated to awaken in the mind very little idea of the importance of the system to which it belongs; but when the vast number of similar organs composing this system is considered, we are led to form some notion, however imperfect, of their probable influence on the health and comfort of the individual. I use the words 'imperfect notion' advisedly for the reality surpasses imagination and almost belief. To arrive at something like an estimate of the value of the perspiratory system in relation to the rest of the organism, I counted the perspiratory pores on the palm of the hand, and found 3,528 in a square inch. Now, each of these pores being the aperture of a little tube of about a quarter of an inch long, it follows that in a square inch of skin on the palm of the hand there exists a length of tube equal to 882 inches, or 73 1-2 feet. Surely such an amount of drainage as seventy-three feet in every square inch of skin, assuming this to be the average for the whole body, is something wonderful, and the thought naturally intrudes itself, what if this drainage were obstructed? Could we need a stronger argument for enforcing the necessity of attention to the skin? On the pulps of the fingers, where the ridges of the sensitive layer of the true skin are somewhat finer than in the palm of the hand, the number of pores on a square inch a little exceeded that of the palm; and on the heel, where the ridges are coarser, the number of the pores on the square inch was 2,268 and the length of the tube 567 inches, or 47 feet. To obtain an estimate of the perspiratory system of the whole surface of the body, I think that 2,800 might be taken as a fair average of the number of pores in the square inch, and 700, consequently of the number of inches in length. Now, the number of square inches of surface in a man of ordinary height and bulk is 2,500; the number of pores therefore, 7,000,000, and the number of inches of perspiratory tube 1,950,000; that is, 145,833 feet, or 48,600 yards, or nearly 28 miles.—[Erasmus Wilson on the Skin.

'I WANT MY MOTHER.'

'Passing the Old Basin, we were attracted by the semi-suppressed sobs of a little girl, to whom bread and butter, or at least an overplus of it, seemed a stranger. Her face was unwashed, her hair uncombed, her dress dirty, and as she sat by a wood-pile, tears trickled at intervals down her cheeks. Young as she was she seemed to feel—and to feel keenly—that she had been bereft of a mother's care. 'What is the matter?' we asked her. 'I want my mother,' she replied, and in a tone which showed the want was not to be supplied. 'Why do you not go home?' said we. 'I want my mother,' was the answer. 'Here, buy apples,' we said offering her a small piece. 'I want my mother,' she said, refusing, or at least not stretching out her hand to take it. A neighboring woman saw us talk to the child and she briefly told us the history of her early privation.

Her father lives hardly. His poverty compels him to be from home daily to his labor. Her mother, a woman of the kindest maternal affections, died last week of the scarlet fever. Daily does this little girl sit at that wood-pile, shunning all associations with her former playmates; and her constant reiteration is—'I want my mother! I want my mother!' We understand that a humane gentleman in the neighborhood is about to have her placed in one of the asylums.'

SERMONS ARE LIKE GUNS.—Some are large, others are small; some are long, others short; some are new, others old; some are bright, others rusty; some are made to be looked at, others to be used; some are loaded, others empty; some are owned, others borrowed. Some are air-guns, some pop-guns, some of every size, from the pocket pistol to the Paixhan gun. Some are charged only with powder, and make a great noise and smoke. Some send only small shot, that irritate rather than kill. Some carry heavy metal, that does execution. Some discharge chain shot, mowing down whole platoons. Some are mouthed mortars, throwing only bomb shells. Some are duelling pistols, used only in controversy—vile things! Some go off half bent. Some flash in the pan. Some make a terrible fizzle, the charge all escaping at the priming hole. Some shoot too high, some too low, some sideways, a few directly at the point. Some are aimed at nothing and hit it. Some scatter prodigiously, some kick their owners over. Some are unerring, others always hit the wrong object. Some have too much wadding, and vice versa. Some are alarm guns; others are complimentary guns, used only for salutes on special occasions. Some are in a series, constituting a battery; others are swivels, made to turn in any direction. Some are useful, some useless, some dangerous. Some amuse, some frighten, some exasperate, some explode, some gain the victory. Very much depends upon the manner in which they are made and managed.

AMENDE HONORABLE.—'Did you say I wasn't fit to carry swill to a swine, Mr. Brown?'

'I did, sir.'

'Well, sir, I require you here, in the presence of these gentlemen, to recall that insult, or you will have to take the consequences.'

'I am ready willingly to repair the injury I have done you.'

'Well, see that you do it quickly, sir.'

Brown turned round to the gentlemen, and said:

'Gentlemen, I have done my friend Mr. Smith, here, the injustice to say, that he was not fit to carry swill to swine, at which he is very indignant. Now, gentlemen, I desire to recall that remark, and do here take great pleasure in saying, that Mr. Smith is eminently qualified for the important office of carrying swill to swine! I hope this apology will be satisfactory to Mr. Smith, and that his excellent qualification will be duly appreciated.'

Mr. Smith disappeared.

PERSEVERANCE.—'I recollect,' says Sir John Barrington, 'in Queen's County, to have seen a Mr. Clerk, who had been a working carpenter, and when making a bench for the session justices at the Court House, was laughed at for taking peculiar pains in planing and smoothing the seat of it. He smilingly observed, that he did so, to make it easy for himself, as he was resolved he would never die till he had a right to sit thereupon—and he kept his word. He was an industrious man, honest, respectable and kind. He succeeded in all his efforts to accumulate an independence; he did accumulate it, and uprightly. His character kept pace with the increase of his property, and he lived to sit as a magistrate on that very bench that he sawed and planed so smoothly.'

A young Frenchman who had not learned to manage the English language, went to dine with a gentleman, to whom he brought a letter of introduction. The first spoon-full of soup burnt his mouth.

'Ma foi!' exclaimed he, 'in dis soup is too much summer!'

The next day he wished to order a chicken for his dinner, but could not recollect the name. In his perplexity he turned toward the window, and his eye caught sight of a weather-cock on a church.

'Vat you call dat?' exclaimed he, pointing.

'That is a church tower,' answered the master of the hotel.

'Den I wish you have de kindness to roast von church tower for my dinner.'

In Sweden, it is no uncommon thing to see the men employed in knitting stockings, while the women may be seen spinning wool, weaving, heating the oven, and teaching the children to read, all at the same time.

A lady of our acquaintance once remarked that 'if she had had the naming of a bustle in the first place, she would have called it a rumpus.'

A Spanish proverb says, that the Jews ruin themselves at their passover, the Moors at their marriages, and the Christians in their law-suits.

William Penn's maxims are little sought after in the present day, but nevertheless deserve an occasional revival. He says of method, that it goes far to prevent trouble in business, saves abundance of time, and instructs those that have business depending what to do and what to hope.

Every hour is worth at least a good thought, a good wish, a good endeavor.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1846.

CONDEMNATION.

'Judge not, that ye be not judged,' is the language of the great Teacher; and yet, perhaps no injunction laid down in the divine Record for the guidance of mankind, is more generally unheeded than this; or at least, none, the neglect of which, is so absolutely evil and sorrowful in its consequences. There are many individuals who seem to make it a kind of profession, to examine the actions of others in a critical manner; to scrutinise every motive of procedure; and where none is to be seen by the outward movement, they do not hesitate to impute one, and generally all imputed motives are not, of a very virtuous nature; and when thus much is accomplished, they are unsparing in their condemnation. But for one thing mankind should be truly thankful, and that is, that such condemnatory people have not the power to inflict the penalty which should follow such a judgment as they pronounce. Whenever we have had occasion to view a person of this class, we have been at a loss to determine the propensity, passion, or principle urging them to action. An envious disposition may, and undoubtedly does, often lead its possessor to condemn every one and his actions, whom fortune has placed upon a more exalted stand than the one occupied by the envious man. But envy has but little to do with stations below its own level. It always looks upon such with contempt rather than with condemnation. But we frequently find an individual who can see no good motive; no virtuous sentiments; no noble and disinterested benevolence, in a solitary individual of the human family, whether in high or low stations; but condemning all in a manner unqualified; letting their disapprobation rest upon all around them, regardless of the sorrowful consequences which such a course may produce, and unmindful of the distress it may bring upon the human heart.

In a degree, somewhat less it is true, such a disposition is quite prevalent with the different members of society. There are many who seem to delight in condemning the actions of others, wholly and totally condemning them too, without paying strict regard to the nature of the actions; without due reference to the morality or immorality of the deeds condemned. And even when the act is immoral, and such as should receive the disapprobation of the man of virtue; yet the manner of some in expressing that disapprobation, is such as to show, that if they do not delight in thus acting the part of a judge, yet that the proceeding is quite natural, and the disposition not a transient or unwelcome visitor. But such a disposition should never be suffered to remain in the human mind, for it is not only derogatory to the human character, but leads to sorrowful results. No man can look into the bosom of his fellow man and there observe the intention of the actor; and it is the intention alone, which renders one free from, or obnoxious to, condemnation. How beautifully does Burns set forth this sentiment in one of his poems. A stanza or two may not be out of place, and surely studied as it should be, the language may be productive of much good—

'Then gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler sister woman;
Tho' they may gang a kennin' wrong;
To step aside is human;
One point must still be greatly dark,
The moving why they do it;
And just as lamely can ye mark
How far perhaps they rue it.

Who made the heart, 'tis He alone,
Decidedly can try us;
He knows each chord—its various tone,
Each spring, its various bias:
Then at the balance let's be mute,
We never can adjust it;

What's done we partly may compute,
But know not what's resisted.'

Were one to attempt an improvement upon the works of the Almighty, he would wholly and totally fail in his operation; for all the works of the Supreme Being, and every principle which he has established for the government of nature, are upon the best possible foundation, and such as to lead the student to adore the infinite wisdom of Him who created them and clothed them in the habiliment of perfection. Consequently we find it a mark of the greatest wisdom that the individual mind is veiled from the eye of the outward observer; for by this admirable arrangement, the wise, the great, and the good, are enabled to cull and arrange their thoughts and plans, before they come before the view of the world for an examination. But like all other arrangements made by the Deity, so this is accompanied by its proportion of incidental evil. Those of evil biased dispositions are thereby able to form and arrange designs destructive to virtue and innocence. But the very fact, that the mind is in a measure veiled from the sight of the outward observer, is a reason why one should be extremely careful in condemning those whose actions may seem to us to be injurious to virtue and morality. The motive and intention of the actor can not always be determined. It is true, that to a certain extent, the disposition of the actor may be determined from the nature of the action; but that extent, is not unfrequently very limited. And there may be many palliating circumstances; many things of provocative nature; and this taken into consideration together with the fact, that none but the possessor can know his disposition, mankind should be extremely cautious and circumspect in the judgment which they form, respecting the motives and intentions governing their fellow beings.

But let it not be supposed that condemnation should never be expressed. This would be the other extreme, and equally as productive of evil consequences; because it would strengthen the hands of the vicious and lead the transgressor still onward in the way of vice. A general selfishness is quite prevalent, and as a consequence, too many are neglectful of the rights of other men, and seem to act as though they supposed that the blessings and privileges which Heaven has granted to the world were not for all without distinction of personages, and hence vice and iniquity disturb the peace, prosperity, and happiness which virtue bestows upon society. This selfishness, and all vicious actions arising therefrom, should be rebuked; but the spirit in which it should be done, is not that of haughtiness and oppression, but one which, though marked with firmness and decision, yet, is kind and benevolent, ever showing forth a deep and lasting love for the welfare of mankind. It is a source of regret however, that the spirit too often indulged in condemning and rebuking those who may have been guilty of committing errors, is one which not only destroys the disposition to offend, but also destroys the offender. But while the former is destroyed the latter should be saved. To the accomplishment of the purpose, the human heart should be studied with great care; and when an act is beheld requiring condemnation and reproof, the word should be spoken in love; in such a spirit of charity, as shall at once lead the offender to observe that the reprover is his friend, a friend in reality; and then reformation will the more speedily follow the reproof. Were all men to act upon such a principle, much of the vice and misery now cursing the world, would be banished afar, and their places be filled with virtue and happiness. And then, too, many a wayward individual would be reclaimed, whose end, now, will be one of ignominy and disgrace. But there is hope that in the constant improvement of society, that angel, kindness, will ere long bestow her full blessings upon the children of men.

S. J. G.

HOW FEARFUL THEY ARE.

Rev. J. M. Graves, late of the Baptist ministry, and formerly pastor of the Baptist church in Auburn, visited us and proclaimed 'the great salvation' on Sunday last. As it was natural to suppose there would be great anxiety to hear him, and the Universalist church being small in comparison with the Baptist, Br. G. sent the following note to Elder Backus, the present pastor of the Baptist church:—

Auburn, April 25, 1846.

Rev. Mr. Backus:—Dear Brother—I was formerly pastor of the Baptist church in this village, and since I have left, have been led to renounce the doctrine of endless misery, and embrace the glorious doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. As we are commended to be ready always to give a reason for the hope within us, will you be so kind as to ask of your Committee (yourself consenting,) to let their old pastor, brother and friend, state the reason for his change of views, in your pulpit, to-morrow, either in the afternoon or evening, at the usual hour of religious services. If consent is granted, will you be so kind as to extend the notice to your church and congregation, and attend yourself; and make such remarks at the close of my discourse, as you may see fit. Your brother, J. M. GRAVES.

Please inform me by note at Rev. J. M. Austin's.

A very natural and reasonable request, says the reader, and one Elder Backus, undoubtedly complied with at once. You are mistaken! Can you suppose the Elder would allow a single ray of light to flash upon the dark and cruel system to which he is wedded, revealing its hideous features to those whose minds he strives to hold in bondage? Not he. So far from granting the request of his former brother—he had not even the courtesy to return him a reply. Thus showing that his narrow religion has not left him, the poor pittance of that common politeness which all men of honorable minds feel bound to observe towards each other. But then, poor man, who can greatly wonder that he had no desire to see his crazy old system of divinity, demolished in the very sanctuary where its tottering skeleton is weakly propped up! J. M. A.

We have received No. 1, Vol. 1, of the HERALD OF TRUTH, an octavo monthly periodical devoted to expositions of Scripture, doctrinal and practical essays, and the advancement of primitive Christianity. Br. B. F. Foster, Editor and proprietor. One dollar a year in advance, Madison, Ind.

Thus do periodicals continue to spring up in our denomination, but the worst of it is, they are not supported in proportion to their number, and consequently their proprietors can not well make them as good and useful as they should be from want of the pecuniary means necessary. Br. Foster thinks that such an one as he has started, is needed in that section of country and thus makes the trial. We wish he may be successful!

The UNIVERSALIST QUARTERLY for April came to hand some time since, but from a multiplicity of cares we have had no time to peruse or notice it, and can only at this time, give a synopsis of its contents. 'The White Mountains,' 'The death penalty,' 'Uses of evil,' 'The Christ of the Gospels' necessary to explain the phenomena of Christianity,' 'Religion and the fine arts,' 'Medicine for the heart,' and the literary notices are the subjects of discussion.

At rather a late date we have received the GAVEL for April. It has several good articles. One (poetic) from the pen of Br. T. L. Harris, one by Wm. H. Herbert, and contributions from several other good writers. The May number has also come to hand and is well filled. We shall give an article from the pen of the Editor, headed 'Clerical opposition to Odd Fellowship,' next week.

No. 53 of the Harpers elegant edition of the ILLUSTRATED BIBLE concludes the alphabetical index to subjects of the Old and New Testaments, and a concordance as far as the letter K. 25 cents at Beesley's.

No. 77-8 of the ILLUSTRATED SHAKESPEARE, contains the tragedy of Julius Caesar with notes. It compares in elegance with the previous numbers. 25 cents at Beesley's.

Br. S. R. Smith keeps constantly on hand a small but carefully selected assortment of Universalist Sunday School and denominational Books, at No. 9 Carroll street, Buffalo.

STATISTICS!!

The Universalist Register for 1847.

To Standing Clerks, Editors, and Ministers of the Universalist denomination, generally.

BRETHREN—I am again at my annual begging. I want the Register for 1846 corrected and altered, to suit the present period. I want all additional information suitable for its pages next year—list of preachers, with their post offices, new societies, churches, associations, conventions, Sunday schools, &c.—their location, number of members, pupils, teachers, library books, &c.—in short, any thing and every thing in the shape of statistics that you think I should have, and can use for the Register. I would like a complete list of Universalist societies for every State—that we may know how many we certainly have. Brethren, do please aid me all you can in this important work. Publish the results of your labors in one of our papers, and send me a copy—or, write to me directly, at my expense, (postage is cheap now,) and I will be very grateful for the favor; and, if you wish it, will send you one or more copies of the work by mail, as soon as published.

All information should be here by the middle of June. But let each one send as early as they can collect their statistics to together, provided none sends later than so as to have it reach me by the fourth of July next. That is the latest day. What reaches me after that day, may be inserted; but most probably will be too late.

I hope that as this call comes but once a year, our brethren will oblige me, and aid our common cause, by a prompt and earnest attention to it. Our Editors, also, will please publish this call, (and each send me a copy of their papers that I may notice properly,) and much oblige their fellow laborer and brother, A. B. GROSH.

DEATHS.

Of bronchial consumption, at Bridgewater, April 24th, Mrs. MELINDA RICHARDS, aged 61 years, consort of Samuel Richards. Beloved in life—in death lamented.—Com.

In Richfield, Otsego county, on the 1st ult., Mr. DANIEL PATCHIN, aged 86 years. The deceased was a native of Connecticut, and came to Richfield about thirty years ago, where he has since resided, honored and respected by all who knew him. But to give our fellow citizens a more correct idea of the character of Mr. P., and to bestow upon him that respect and approbation which we think belong to one so worthy, the following extract is made from the sermon delivered on the 4th ult., by Rev. J. H. Tuttle, on the occasion of the funeral obsequies:

'When we look back in the history of our country, and remember the oppression that once bore so heavily upon us, the struggles of our fathers to secure their freedom, their victory over cruelty and wrong, a feeling of gratitude warms our bosoms, as we think of those who labored so arduously in so glorious a cause. When we remember that the freedom which is now ours to enjoy, and of which we are so proud to speak, was purchased by the sacrifice of comfort and peace—the warm blood of many an honest heart—by the endurance of heart rending trials and sleepless nights—by making the cold damp ground the pillow of slumber, and the wide curtain of heaven a covering—when we remember that such was the price of liberty—we can not but venerate those who were subjects of such trying scenes; and one of those my friends, was the deceased, whose remains are now before us. Scarce sixteen summers had smiled upon his youthful days, when he enlisted in the army of Washington, to labor for his country's peace and protection. He afterwards enlisted in the Cavalry, and was finally made one of Washington's personal guards.

'Never could he speak of the immortal Washington, without being deeply affected. The bare mention of his name would cause the tear to congregate in his eye; his aged energies would seem to be awakened to a new impulse, and his patriotic soul seemed to beat in unison with earlier days. Many of us have listened to his rehearsals with a feeling of pleasurable pride, and have been animated with a sense of patriotism, as we have heard him speak of what has formed so conspicuous a part in the annals of our country.

'But alas! he is gone! His aged form has at last bowed to the mandate of death. Those cheeks that braved the storms of so many winters, are now cold and pale. Those eyes that watched, while on guard, the secret movements of the enemy, are now closed forever. That heart, once warmed by a love of peace, a love of freedom, beats no more. But we could not reasonably expect him to stay longer; and we may wonder rather, that a harp of a thousand strings should keep in tune so long.' He died in the bosom of his peaceful country. The cannon's dismal roar—the shrill clarion of war—the groans of the dying—disturbed not his last moments. He had lived to behold the banner of liberty floating honorably and peacefully over his head. May his name be long honored and remembered, and around his silent resting place may there ever linger a halo of a glorious departure.

'Thus might we dwell upon his character and the circumstances of his life, or in pronouncing an eulogy which we think would be justly due; but it will suffice to say, that he lived long, and died honored and respected by all that knew him—a lover of freedom, a pattern of honesty, an admirer of virtue.'

In Scipio, on the 26th ult., CHARLES MORGAN, aged 20 years, only son of Wm. and Mary Morgan. The death of this young man was one of the most severe afflictions that could befall his parents. He was their only child, and in every way worthy the love and care they bestowed upon him. Amiable, affectionate and intelligent, to a peculiar degree, he attached all hearts to him within the circle of his acquaintance, and gave abundant promise of fulfilling the high hopes which his parents and friends cherished in regard to him. At the time of his death, the deceased was a member of the Junior Class in Geneva College, where he had won the general respect of his teachers and fellow-students, and established a valuable reputation for studious application, integrity, and all the noble graces of human nature. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of people—the youth in a long procession, appearing as mourners, each with crape and cærgreen, the emblems of mourning and hope—and all testifying with flowing tears, their deep sense of the worth of the departed.

In the absence of Br. Hayward, the consolations of the Gospel were administered by the writer hereof.

THE SETTING SUN WILL RISE AGAIN.

BY L. D. JOHNSON.

While slowly o'er the western sky,
The sun is sinking to his rest,
And golden beams, enthroned on high,
Are trembling on yon azure breast:
Though sombre night, so calm and still,
Shall darkly close o'er land and main,
There's one sweet thought, that lingers still—
The setting sun will rise again!

I heard the hollow, rending wail,
That tore the poor man's feeble breast;
I saw the cheek with sorrow pale,
And eyes which care had shut from rest.
But Hope again was kindled there;
And joyous tears were shed like rain;
While thus I whispered in his ear—
'The setting sun will rise again!'

I saw a maiden fair, whose smile,
Was like the dawn of morning beams;
So mild and pure, so free from guile—
The brightest vision in our dreams;
But soon that bosom beat no more;
That eye grew dark; that cheek grew wan;
And thus I thought while bending o'er—
'The setting sun will rise again!'

And ye, whose beaming sun went down,
In clouds of woe and misery;
Who tremble at Death's icy frown—
His with'ring smiles of fiendish glee—
Know ye that, though thus wrapt in night
With all her gloomy spectral train;
There'll dawn once more the morning light—
The setting sun will rise again!

REPORT OF THE PRISON ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK.

Through the kindness of a friend I have received 'The Second Report of the Prison Association of New York, including the Constitution and By-Laws, and a list of officers and members. New York, 1846.' A document of this character deserves public attention. It indicates not only the tendency of the age, but it exhibits a mass of facts equally important to the legislator and the philanthropist. This Association is still in its infancy, and yet it has accomplished an amount of good which, under the circumstances, is quite astonishing. To save even one sinner from the evil of his way is, no doubt, a great as well as a good work; what then shall we say of an effort, which under all the disadvantages of a novel undertaking, has in the short space of two years, been instrumental in reclaiming so large a number of those who have too long been regarded as hopeless outcasts from society, and unfit to share either the confidence or sympathy of their fellow men?

A perusal of the Report can not fail to encourage every Christian in the hope of a final conquest over sin and the complete and universal triumph of our Divine Master. If Washingtonians have shown what power kindness has in reforming the intemperate and besotted, the Prison Association is demonstrating the possibility of winning the most hardened transgressors of law back to duty and virtue. No man can rise from the perusal of this report, therefore, without a deeper conviction of the truth of Christianity, and a stronger hope of universal restoration.

The Prison Association, it must be confessed, is exceedingly heretical in several of its opinions, contradicting at once the wisdom of most legislators, and the dogmas of self-styled orthodoxy. I will venture to point out a few of these heresies, and beg my reader to ponder them well, for if they are not most mischievous untruths, they are beyond all controversy among the most fundamental and important principles of all moral government. The Prison Association maintains,

1. That even the sinner is not 'totally depraved,' and that none are beyond the reach of reforming efforts.

2. That kindness or love is a more powerful means of reforming men than harshness or severity.

3. That the end of punishment is to reform, not to destroy, and of course that we punish in love, and mingle mercy with our inflictions, and not indulge in revenge.

4. That frequent pardons are destructive of the very ends of punishment; certainly of mild punishments ever bring a more powerful restraint to vice and crime, than the threat and the most horrible infliction which the guilty can easily escape.

Had I time and space, I should be happy to recommend the Report now noticed to a more general attention by appending a variety of extracts from the document itself. It is a most valuable contribution to that kind of information which is of late becoming more common, and which can not fail to exert a most healthful influence upon all classes of society. God bless the Prison Association.

GOOD WISHES—BUT WRONG MEANS....NO. IV.

MR. EDITOR—Your recent inquiry for 'Uncle Zeke' suffused my cheek with maiden blushes.—My silence did not result from a lack of subjects to write upon, but from a lack of opportunity to write at all. Now to my truth-sketches again.

Mr. C. is a public advocate of the Restitution. He has labored to general acceptance for many years—held a number of discussions in which he did himself honor and the cause credit. He has been settled some years at a small inland town, at a fair country salary.

The wealthy of his society have no reason to complain of his visits—and the poor can not; for they are never honored with them.

These neglects have caused dissatisfaction and complaint. Reminded of this fault, and others, no reformation appears. Dissatisfaction ripens into division. The majority say stay, and for the paltry consideration of a few more dollars, than he can realise elsewhere, he does stay while the breach widens before his eyes. Many suppose they see in this a stronger love of money than of the cause.

Good wishes, and such means do not advance our cause there. Will they any where?

UNCLE ZEKE.

RENUNCIATION—DISCUSSION—AND NEW SOCIETY.

The following letter just received from Hector, Pa., will be read with interest.

Rev. D. SKINNER—Dear Sir,—Thinking it would not be wholly uninteresting to you, to know of the rise and progress of Universalism in this place, I have been induced to write a few particulars in regard to it.

In the spring of 1845, the Rev. John Fillmore of the Free-Will Baptist church, came to this place with a letter of recommendation, and soon after renounced the doctrine of endless misery and embraced the holy doctrine of the restitution.

There was a challenge given to Rev. Mr. Fillmore, and it was accepted. The Baptists and Methodists combined and a discussion was held in Westfield, Tioga county, Pa.

Question discussed—Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of endless misery, or, of universal holiness and happiness to all?

Rev. Francis Strang, James Reynold and Samuel Briggs, on the side of partial salvation: and Rev. John Fillmore, C. R. Skinner and Cyrus Sunderlin on the side of Universalism.

The most spirited part of the discussion was carried on by the Rev. Messrs. Strang and Fillmore.

Rev. F. Strang is a clear, sound, and logical debater. By his denomination in this place he is looked upon as their champion. The indicators of endless misery, before the discussion, were all animation, and very confident of success; but before it closed, their sanguine expectations were crushed; and they manifested much uneasiness; and now they say discussions have an evil tendency, and consequently they disapprove of them!

The discussion terminated decidedly in favor of Universalism. Since the discussion a society has been formed, which now numbers sixteen, and it is expected several more will join soon.

They have preaching regularly once in two weeks, by Rev. John Fillmore. We are in hopes of having soon a spiritual and flourishing society.

Yours truly, CYRUS SUNDERLIN.

Hector, Pa., April 17, 1846.

MUSINGS UPON A SPRING MORNING.

To every lover of nature, and to every worshiper at the shrine of the visible universe, nought can be more lovely and enchanting, or more grand and sublime, than the prospects that a bright spring morning unfold to the gaze of mortals. It is then that the high aspirations of our souls, go forth as it were on wings of search, to scan and admire the Creator's works. Then it is that our thoughts are wont to leave the scenes of earth, however attracting, and soar upward to drink in new truths, and imbibe more of the spirit of inspiration, as they near the Author of our existence. Who that is gifted with the noble powers of intellect, can help but admire the beauties, so profusely thrown around us, in this sunny season of the year? The sun that has long poured his floods of heat upon southern groves, is now with speedy steps measuring our northern clime—and in early morn we may behold him climbing up eastern skies, to send forth a life-giving breath upon our seemingly forgotten earth. He comes! and the frowning aspects of winter become changed to smiles of gladness. The forests that in autumn days parted with their leaves; thereby prefiguring the fate of man, are again robed in vestures green; and 'mong their waving boughs, winged tribes are making songful music. The unpleasant reign of winter winds has ceased; and in their stead, bland gales from the spicy south, and still gentler breezes from western gardens, are being wafted o'er us, shedding as they pass their balmy influence. The hills and valleys, disrobed of white apparel, are again mantled in green—while in every silent glen, and on every mossy hill, bloom flowers of richest hue; sending up their fragrance to heaven, in volumes more profuse and sweet, than ever ascended incense from Jewish altars in Hebrew times. O! who that has a head to think, or a soul to feel, is not elated with the loveliness of this season! How it portrays the love and goodness of our spiritual Father! How it bespeaks his kind remembrance to the children of men! How beautifully too, it typifies the resurrection of the dead, when life unending and joy immortal, shall be the happy portion of our widespread race.

TRUE GREATNESS.

BY REV. G. S. ABBOTT.

There are three kinds of qualities which may distinguish a human mind with greatness—either separately or combined. First, an extraordinary perfection of the intellectual faculties and their cultivation and exercise in the acquisition of the truth. Second, strength of soul free and obedient to the calls of duty. Third, extensive benevolence and an all-comprehensive goodness of heart—a spirit of universal philanthropy.

To be considered great in the first sense it is not necessary that all the intellectual faculties be highly cultivated and improved. That mind is often termed great which possesses but one of them in a high degree. Such a mind is readily distinguished; for it goes to the utmost boundaries of human knowledge and ventures out in its pursuit into every department of creation in which truth appears to be hid. It does not confine itself to the few and imperfect notions with which common minds are satisfied; but it extends its inquiries to every thing within the grasp of reason and fills the soul with order and light. From a gentle hint of nature, of which an ordinary intellect would have taken no notice, it discovers a way into her deepest mysteries, and from every degree of experience, however small it may appear, draws a series of most important conclusions. Of this class were Newton, Franklin, Spurzheim, &c. Under the guidance of such knowledge and sagacity the intellect projects the most exalted plans, ascertains the remotest effects of every cause, turns every thing to its own account, and while weaker minds are exhausting their whole strength in the small and narrow sphere assigned them, soars upward above them all, and by a secret invisible power, brings them to act in conformity to its own views, and by its superiority induces thousands engaged in active combat with each other, to harmonize together and at every step keeps the goal in view at which it aimed in the outset.

2. With regard to the second class of qualities which constitute greatness, we call that mind great which we see acting in every thing it does, with an energy and firm intention—with an effort and power which increase with opposition, carry it boldly through every difficulty and enable it to keep its original designs steadily in view. We are often astonished at the constancy and firmness with which a strong mind adheres to its purposes and pursues them, without being wearied with difficulties, deterred by dangers, or discouraged by want of success. We are filled with the most profound respect, whenever we discover an unshaken integrity—a self-control which brings every inclination in subjection to the requisitions of law; and a faithful adherence to duty which can not be made to quake or tremble at any thing on earth—whenever we discover a strength of good will, which, in order to fulfil its obligations, disdains both injury and profit and can neither be infatuated by cunning nor conquered by power. Of this class of minds were the immortal signers of the Declaration of American Independence. What an exalted spectacle to behold a great and virtuous man contending with the powers of fate, and, though under its severest strokes and in the midst of dangers, before which an ordinary man would tremble and flee away—though deserted on every side—and without deliverance and without hope, yet always displaying that tranquility of soul, that presence of mind—that firm adherence to truth and rectitude, which were peculiar to him in propitious circumstances;—to see a man whom the falling fabric of the universe may strike to the ground, but can not make afraid! Such minds as these are made for the purpose of exciting universal admiration and we are inclined to recognize them as great in proportion to the giddiness excited by gazing at the dazzling height on which they stand.

3d. But the third class of great minds extort from us our admiration—our gratitude and our love. To this class belong those benefactors of our race whose superior excellence consists in an expansive benevolence and an all-comprehensive goodness of heart—whose most zealous and whose ceaseless efforts are to enlighten, improve and bless all around them—who can even load an ungrateful world with benefits and offer up their own lives for their enemies. This kind of greatness conquers every heart and needs merely to be exhibited in order not only to be admired, but tenderly embraced and deeply respected by every one in whom all traits of feeling are not eradicated.

Every truly great mind exemplifies more or less of this spirit. What is the history of Howard, the great British Philanthropist, but a history of toils and sufferings to benefit his fellow men? We hear the name of William Penn with reverence—of Oberlin, of Washington, of Franklin, and a thousand others who have been eminent among mankind. All these exhibited in bold relief the essential features of that benevolent ambition which marked its way to renown through patient devotion to human welfare and human happiness. So now, among those who wield a mighty influence over us—those to whom we cheerfully accord the mead of honor; they have been the servants and benefactors of their fellow men. Others may rise in sordid selfishness and tyrannical ambition to bear a momentary control; but their power is destined to become weakness—and their names to sink into forgetfulness.

When we know them, they sink into contempt and utter degradation. What a glorious and happy era shall that be when the grand prerequisite qualification for promotion in church or state, shall be that true greatness of soul which finds its choicest delight in serving and blessing mankind! Happy is the man who learns of Christ the only justifiable means of becoming truly great. In Jesus Christ are combined all those qualities of mind and character which can render mankind truly great. His intellectual, moral and religious faculties were of the highest order and most highly cultivated. He possessed energy and decision of character in its broadest and most unlimited sense—and his benevolence, his philanthropy and goodness of heart were unbounded.

Then would we be truly great—would we have our names live in the affections of posterity long after we are dead, let us strive to imitate, as far as we can, the examples and obey the precepts of our divine Master, who went about doing good—who, though a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, yet wherever he went, enriched, comforted and blessed the children of affliction. He gave himself wholly to the service of mankind. But what return did he receive for all his acts of goodness? He was spurned, slandered, hated, persecuted and finally murdered. But did all this freeze up the warm current of benevolence? No. The stream flowed from a deep, exhaustless, never-failing fountain. He loved man in spite of man's hatred. He labored for the salvation of man, notwithstanding his crimes. He conquered malice with love, and died with forgiveness on his lips for the most atrocious murderers. Such was Jesus Christ—and it was this self-sacrificing spirit which entitled him to such greatness as a man.

Well might such a Master teach his disciples the art of deserving to be chief. He says, 'Who-soever will be chief among you, let him be your servant; even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.'

A GUILTY CONSCIENCE.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

'O, it is monstrous! monstrous!
Methought, the billows spoke and told me of it;
The winds did sing it me; and the thunder,
That deep and dreadful organ—pronounced
The name of Prosper.'—SHAKESPEARE.

It is an invariable law, unchanging as fate, that whenever violence is done to the moral nature of man, that same nature inflicts immediate and ample retribution upon the offender. Sin consists in violence done to the moral nature; and the guilt or culpability incurred is measured by the amount of the violence done. But the punishment is measured by the same thing. The pain consequent upon sinning depends, and must depend, upon the amount of injury done to the moral nature; the very thing which measures the guilt of the offender; therefore they must be equal. Two things equal to the same measure, must be equal to themselves. This equality between sin and its present recompense the Partialist disputes. I shall mention but two arguments in favor of the doctrine that a guilty conscience inflicts its own punishment, in full, upon the sinner.

1. Analogy. How is it with regard to the physical laws which govern our being? When they are violated do we not immediately suffer the penalty? If we burn our hand does it not always smart? At least do we not always suffer evils just in proportion to the amount of violence done? Be sure; and it is so of all the physical or organic laws, and of every violation of them. Now why should it not be the same with the moral laws, and every violation of them? Analogy says it is. But,

2. What says experience? In order to determine any thing, we must take our own experience. There are several reasons why one can not judge correctly in this matter from another's experience. First, we can never tell how guilty another person is, not knowing the amount of the violence which he has done to his moral nature. Second, if we knew the amount of his guilt, we could never tell how much punishment his violated conscience actually inflicts upon him. Therefore we can judge nothing correctly in this matter from another's experience; we must take our own—what says that? Does not sin produce wretchedness? Every one knows it does. Who was ever conscious of having sinned—who ever felt that he had incurred guilt—without feeling the pains of condemnation? No one, says experience. And if we are not conscious of having sinned, then we have not. If we do not feel that we are guilty, then we are not, in any such sense as to deserve punishment for moral culpability.

Shakespeare understood this matter well. He makes one of his most hardened villains, Richard III, speak as follows:

'My conscience hath a thousand several tongues,
And every tongue bring in a several tale,
And every tale condemns me for a villain.'

Thus it is with all; and no sinner can escape the stings of a guilty conscience. 'There is no peace saith my God to the wicked.' 'They are like the troubled sea.'

But on the other hand, if love fills our hearts, and if we obey all the requirements of God's holy law, then shall peace flow upon us as a river, and happiness as a mighty flood. Joy, in perennial bloom, shall abide in our bosoms, be bound in laurel wreaths about our heads, and crown our days and nights with rejoicing. Celestial music shall sing us asleep at night, and angels voices sweetly call us in the morning. Heavenly spirits shall whisper us peace from every passing breeze, and an angel ride upon every sunbeam.

'And when the summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan that moves
To the pale realms of shade, when each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
We shall not go, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach the grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.'

ELDER HOLMES' CHALLENGE.

Smithville Flats, April 29, 1846.

Br. SKINNER—I have been anxiously watching the Advocate for some weeks, to learn what disposition might be made of that matter commenced between Elder Holmes and Br. Taintor. It seems the Elder and his friends are pleased, or affect to be pleased with the aspect things have assumed; and some are bold to say the Universalists are afraid to meet him! I confess I have been somewhat puzzled myself to determine whose right it was to speak next; but, after looking the matter all over, have concluded to say a word by your permission.

It seems both parties have made proposals for discussion, and both claim that their offers have not been accepted. Not only so, but one says, (not to use precisely their language,) these proposals have not been accepted nor withdrawn, and never will be withdrawn; the other, these offers were made to the wide world, &c. Now I would not wish to interfere with other people's business, or make the least effort to call attention to myself, where duty does not demand it; yet I feel that I have an interest in this matter; and when others have neglected or refused to take it up, I feel called upon to give it my attention. I have long since concluded not to let a challenge or offer for a religious discussion pass over my head unnoticed. If therefore Elder Holmes has failed of a discussion with Br. Taintor, Brown or Clark, and yet thinks his offers will not be accepted to investigate the great point of difference between the Methodists and Universalists, permit me to say to him through the Advocate,

Elder D. Holmes—Dear Sir, Feeling, as I hope I ever may, a deep interest in the cause of truth, holiness and man's final salvation, and having seen the letters between you and Br. Taintor and your offers to discuss with him or others, after so long a time, I take this opportunity and way, to say to you that I should be happy to meet you in discussion on the great point of difference between us, if you have not withdrawn your proposals, and are willing to meet so humble an opponent as myself. I am a stranger to you otherwise than by report; and Sir, that need not hinder us, I trust, from becoming acquainted by means of, and in, a discussion. I would not, however, consent to discuss any questions that did not come at once to the point of difference between us; I mean the salvation of a part only, or of all men. Of course then, the questions proposed by you to Br. Taintor would be dismissed, at least till other and more important matters were settled. The following embraces the whole ground that is essential. Do the Scriptures teach the doctrine of future endless punishment for any of the human family? This I think your candid judgment will see is the first, and only question, that need be settled; for if the affirmative is established, Universalism fails at once. I deem it unnecessary to say more at present. Other arrangements can be made hereafter. I beg you will excuse my thus calling your attention to this matter, and hope you will let me hear from you as soon as may be convenient. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A. O. WARREN.

TRUE HAPPINESS.

Man was originally formed for happiness; after which his very nature seems to be aspiring; but through a misguided zeal, he often mistakes the path which alone can lead to permanent enjoyment while passing through this vale of tears.

We sometimes look forward to some distant object, from which we expect much happiness; and our anticipations inspire our minds with ardor; we pursue it with eagerness, and the nearer we approach it, the more ardent are our desires to obtain it. But alas! how fleeting, and uncertain are all sublunary enjoyments! We no sooner get possession of the desired object, than we feel its incompetency to afford the happiness we had anticipated. We sometimes seek for happiness amid the social circle, and imagine ourselves, for a few moments, truly happy; but we soon relax into our former state of disquietude, and the mind becomes absorbed in vain and fruitless wishes; sighing deeply after a more permanent and enduring enjoyment. We resort to every means that man can invent; run to every avenue that presents itself, in search of the desired object, (happiness,) but are disappointed; we still remain unhappy. There still remains a vacuum, which nothing on earth can fill; for there is nothing beneath the unchangeable God that can satisfy an immortal mind.

The Scriptures of divine truth point out to us the pathway to true happiness. It is represented to us as being 'a high way of holiness, cast up, for the ransomed of the Lord to walk in.' A firm reliance on the immutable promises of our heavenly Father, a compliance with the requisitions of his written word, which holds out so many inducements, so many precious promises, so congenial with the character of the humble Christian, is the only means whereby we may attain to that happiness which is permanent and unshaken as the pillars of Heaven. A belief that God is love; that he is unchangeable, and consequently must continue to be love, is another source of happiness which will withstand the dogmas of men and inspire us with a desire to be more and more assimilated into his likeness; resting assured that the hour will soon arrive when sin and death shall be destroyed; 'when Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to God even the Father, that God may be all in all.' So mote it be.

Gentle reader, are you sighing after true happiness? Remember, it is not to be found in the perishing things of time and sense; but in God alone. Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me.' Let your mind be ardently engaged in contemplating the goodness of our Father in heaven, realizing that he is our Creator, Benefactor and Preserver; and that he will ultimately bring all his intelligent creation to a state of holiness and happiness beyond the grave, to sing loud hallelujahs and anthems of eternal praise—'Hallelujah! hallelujah! the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.'—Amen.

TRUTH IN THREE ASPECTS.

I. DEMANDS OF TRUTH IMPERATIVE.—By this is meant that truth knows no superior; for 'God is truth.' It not infrequently happens that men yield up life to its commands; for rather than make a denial thereof, with true honesty men resign themselves to all suffering and death itself. When we look back on man's history and see all that has been endured for the truth, we are inclined to think, and thank God even, that our lives are cast in pleasant places, as if truth had no claim upon us, benevolence no subjects for us. Is truth sleeping? or have we only bowed at the shrine of Baal, to the neglect of the living God?

Does not truth say, 'For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake will I not rest, till the light thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.' This implies that truth allows no sleep, no rest until its mission is fulfilled—the world saved. How few preachers of Heaven's truth feel this! Once in a while one is found sighing for the sins of the world, all cast down in doubt and despair—once in a while one is found swake to the certain mission of truth, all in the spirit of faith, that the ills of the world will be removed in due time, and laboring as if the faith was correct, sincere; yet as a general thing preachers are not earnest in their labors, nor to all appearances are they aware how great the work to be done ere the world is saved. This indifference has given the enemy boldness—he not only appears in public, but is bold to sit in the place where truth ought to be dispensed. It is rather difficult to distinguish the tare from the wheat.

The still small voice of God is however speaking to not a few bold, daring spirits, and they are echoing it to the sons of men. Truth has ever the bravest of men in its defence. Napoleon and Alexander were pigmies compared with Paul, Huss or Luther. Would Paul abandon his cause as did Napoleon his men in the progress of the retreat from Russia? The cowardly—the insincere are seldom in the ranks where truth commands. Immense as are the powers of truth over those it seeks to control—tyrannical and despotic as it may appear in this aspect, we trust it will be generally conceded that it is

II. LOVELY ABOVE ALL THINGS.—The truth is the standard, put for the sons of God, by which to expound those scriptures which require, in every thing else, a secondary love; (Matt. x: 37 and others,) the love of the Lord in all the soul, mind, and entire ability. May we not also attribute the extraordinary firmness men have evinced in regard to truth to this same motive, or affection for it? If this is right; and a question can hardly be raised against it, much difficulty otherwise accruing is dispelled, and light beams forth where darkness reigned.

We love the truth naturally and easily when no selfishness and worldly policy embitter the soul.—We love it for its consistency with itself, and its harmony with the workings of the mind within us. We love its potency because, sublime as it may be, we know it is always right, for righteousness, for our supreme good. It is not therefore a power that repels; it attracts and embraces, and man, in turn, embraces it as the dearest of all objects—under all in the heart. Conceding this, as all who have known truth must, it is easily seen that it

III. GIVES A FREEDOM to a lawful action of every faculty, no where else attainable. 'Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.' 'Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.' We conceive that there is not—there can not be any rational freedom out of the 'Gospel of truth;' and any government based upon other principles than what are here afforded, must fail of receiving for the subjects thereof, the freedom that properly belongs to human beings. Truth is democratic in the true sense, though ruling; in the historic sense, an absolute monarch. Be this the monarch to rule over me, in me; my guide, my support, my all. God is truth, he is love, he is free; he rules the world; its inhabitants are his children, and of consequence objects of his love, as well as subjects of his rule or control. There would be no lack of freedom in human governments, if love for its subject was a leading impulse in the minds of statesmen. The difficulty is, self-love is the all; it drove Napoleon in his mad and wicked schemes for personal glory. It fastens the tiara upon the head of the pope, nerves the arm that lashes the slave and holds him in bondage, pours out the damning spirit to the inebriate, is helmsman for the pirate, and the elbow companion of avarice, through the world. Be mine the lot to heed the imperative command, love the gentle voice and walk in the freedom of truth. Then can I 'Love all, trust a few,

Do wrong to none.'

in the spirit of the Gospel of Christ. Z. B.
Canterbury, Ct., 1846.

GOOD WISHES—BUT WRONG MEANS....NO. V.

CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. EDITOR.—Some very warm friends of the cause, never can be induced to write in its defence, while others having the ability seem to think the more they write the greater the advances of truth. But they seem to forget that intellectual activity alone awakens intellect and mirthfulness responds to the sallies of wit, while man's religious sentiments can be aroused and strengthened by their appropriate food.

Mr. J. ostensibly wishes to have the doctrine of the restitution understood, and for it, labors with his pen and orally with becoming zeal.

'Tis not for me to condemn what he has written, for much without doubt is good.

But, Mr. Editor, the inquiry arises with many minds, 'How much is the cause of Universalism benefited by re-vamping stale anecdotes, which divested of their lumber, are better adapted to the bar-room than religious papers?'

Many columns may be needed to prove a 'dream'; but really can not such space be better occupied? Such means may be well calculated to gratify the refined taste of Puckerville; but pardon the disbelief of their adaptation to advance morality or religion.

UNCLE ZEKE.

NEW PREACHER.

The following intelligence from Br. Linell has given us great pleasure. Br. Weaver is a young gentleman possessing a high order of talents and a cultivated mind, and we believe that he will become a very successful laborer in our common vineyard. We believe also that he possesses the right spirit.

BR. GURLEY:—I have the pleasure of informing you, that our beloved brother G. S. Weaver, well known to the readers of the 'Star,' has been induced to commence the work of the ministry. He will attend with me, at my next appointment in Springfield, 1st Sabbath in April and preach his first sermon. Br. Weaver has an excellent education—is of a social turn of mind and deeply imbued with the spirit of our most holy faith. These advantages, combined with an irreproachable moral character, can scarcely fail to make him a valuable accession to the ministry of reconciliation. May the Lord send more good laborers into his vineyard.

STATISTICS!!!

The Universalist Register for 1847.

To Standing Clerks, Editors, and Ministers of the Universalist denomination, generally.

BRETHREN—I am again at my annual begging. I want the Register for 1846 corrected and altered, to suit the present period. I want all additional information suitable for its pages next year—list of preachers, with their post offices, new societies, churches, associations, conventions, Sunday schools, &c.—their location, number of members, pupils, teachers, library books, &c.—in short, any thing and every thing in the shape of statistics that you think I should have, and can use for the Register. I would like a complete list of Universalist societies for every State—that we may know how many we certainly have. Brethren, do please aid me all you can in this important work. Publish the results of your labors in one of our papers, and send me a copy—or, write to me directly, at my expense, (postage is cheap now,) and I will be very grateful for the favor; and, if you wish it, will send you one or more copies of the work by mail, as soon as published.

All information should be here by the middle of June. But let each one send as early as they can collect their statistics to together, provided none sends later than so as to have it reach me by the fourth of July next. That is the latest day. What reaches me after that day, may be inserted; but most probably will be too late.

I hope that as this call comes but once a year, our brethren will oblige me, and aid our common cause, by a prompt and earnest attention to it. Our Editors, also, will please publish this call, (and each send me a copy of their papers that I may notice properly,) and much oblige their fellow laborer and brother,

A. B. GROSH.

MISSIONARY NOTICE.

There will be a special meeting of the 'Missionary Society of the Cayuga Association of Universalists,' in the 'Union Hall' at Lansingville, on Wednesday, June 3d, at 9 o'clock, A. M. As the business which is to come before the society is important, it is hoped that every delegate will be present; and it is desirable that the delegates should be prepared to give such information as will enable the Board of Officers to send a Missionary immediately into the field, which is now white, already for the harvest, and only wants a skillful reaper to yield an abundant increase.

Br. John Moore of Troy, who was appointed at the last meeting of the 'New York State Sunday School Association,' to deliver the Annual Address at its next meeting, to be holden at Newark, on the Tuesday preceding the State Convention—finding it inconvenient to attend said meeting, requests us to insert in this week's paper the notice that—Br. GENIAL INFLUENCES.

The coming sun has calmed the angry frowns
Of Winter, and hushed his raging tempests.
Before his calm and constant smile, Winter's Fierce storms grew still—his harsh and boisterous voice
Became subdued—his cold demeanor left Him, and with a winning, gentle air, he Bade young April welcome, then sought the North.
So, before continued kindness and the Genial influence of unceasing Love,
The angry storms of passion, hatred, and Revenge—Pride's haughty look—Power's chilling frown—
Fierce Persecution's scourge—dread Slander's tongue,
And all the evils earth has ever known,
Will flee, and leave the soul's unfettered thought
To grasp the treasures of eternal truth,
And bask forever 'neath the smile of God.
The potent charm of Love, is rich with all
The influence man requires to shield himself
From evil. At its approach, fierce Hatred Grows affectionate—stern Anger dies—and Timid Fear grows bold. To the oppressed, its Voice is sweetest music—its look, to the Afflicted, sunshine. Its faintest accent
Calms the fiercest storm of human passions,
And melts the willing soul to tenderness.
The hardened wretch, in the cold dungeon chained
By an unfeeling world—thrust out from all
The tender ties that bind the soul to earth,
And doomed in chains to brood o'er evil deeds
Committed by the keen demands of want
Or hunger, which society, with all
Her wealth, refused to satisfy, becomes
A man when friendship's warm embrace is giv'n,
And the kindly look of Love beams on his Guilty soul.

There's nothing harmful love will not subdue—
No rash, impetuous desire, its voice
Will not restrain—no passion, feeling, thought,
Or sentiment, existing in the soul,
Its heavenly influence will not elevate,
Ennoble, and refine.

Then let us love—
Love all—thus imitating God; for He
Who formed and guided the boundless universe,
Is Love. U. M. F.

CLERICAL OPPOSITION TO ODD FELLOWSHIP.

Since the first establishment of our Order in this land, it has met with many attempts to arrest its progress.—Many good men, sincere in their belief that secret societies were prejudicial to the best interests of our country, have felt constrained to lift their voices against it. But now, that it has become a well-authenticated fact that the influence of Odd Fellowship is both to preserve our free institutions, to carry our system of government onward to perfection, and to lead men to the practice of a sublime morality, the opposition of these men have ceased. Numbers of them have become members of the institution they once derided, and by their benevolent and upright lives, bear testimony to the purity of the doctrine and the philanthropy of the duties enjoined upon them in the secrecy of the Lodge.

Another class of men have warred against the Order, from impressions derived from its name. To the word 'Odd Fellow' they have assigned most false and illiberal meanings. They have, at first, believed that a Lodge was merely a bacchanalian club, where transgressions of the usages of society and violations of the rules of temperance might be indulged in under the rose of secrecy without danger of detection. But this opposition has in a great measure ended. The known laws of the Order making the Lodge-room a place for the transaction of important business relating to the 'good and welfare' of the society and of the community at large, and forbidding, under the severest penalties, the least semblance of conviviality, together with the exalted character and distinguished worth of the Fraternity, have exercised their proper influence, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows is now universally known as an institution whose sole objects are to watch over the interests of its members, to lead them to the practice of the highest and sublimest duties, to restore them to virtue when led astray; to visit the sick, to minister to the necessities of the poor, to bury the dead, to cherish the widow and protect the fatherless; and thus carry out into society and the world the blessed influence of the purest principles of virtue in theory, and the most diffusive philanthropy in practice.

But while from the intelligent and virtuous all opposition to our progress has ended, and while our success is hailed by sincere Christians as a new triumph of the principles of love, inculcated by the great Reformer of Nazareth, and while its holy influence and its beneficent deeds, going up before high heaven, invoke the benediction from above to rest upon its altars and to linger around its walls, and while at its beautiful ministries the pale cheek of sorrow is wreathed with a smile, and the widow's heart sings for joy; yet still we have enemies, bitter, unscrupulous and relentless.

These foes are not found among the orphans we have protected; they are not found among the widows we have defended; they are not found among the prisoners we have visited, or the sick we have ministered to. They are not found among the degraded and abandoned, for the hardest and most depraved of men render homage to our broad and free benevolence, as the wild waves and winds of the Galilean sea hushed into peace at the Redeemer's smile. They are not found among philanthropists and reformers, among men of enlightened minds and pure and loving hearts, for these are heralds of our charities, and the friends and brethren of our love. The enemies of Odd Fellowship are found among the clergy of the so-called Evangelical denominations. While the majority, both of the clergy and laity of those highly respectable sects, look upon Odd Fellowship with favorable eyes and esteem for its works' sake, there still are to be found in their pulpits, men who in their reckless warfare against the Order, violate every principle of practical religion, and every obligation to honesty and truth. Falsehoods which bear their character on their faces, libels which no honorable man would dare to utter, fall from their lips like venom from a serpent's tongue, whenever and wherever the Order is mentioned before them. They accuse us of selfishness, when our charities, which, among our brethren are sure, are in their very sight extended among the needy of all classes. They accuse us of profanity, when before their eye is traced that law which forbids all profanity among us. They accuse us of hostility to truth, when there is no command of the Gospel, relating to the great duties of life, which we do not teach in our ceremonies and exemplify in our actions. And in the ratio in which our selfishness and our benevolence is made apparent, do they 'say all manner of things evil falsely against us.'

Are they dictated by pure and holy motives in this hostility? Most assuredly not. Clergy, who wink at sin and cover up iniquity among their partisans, are the most loud and earnest in their opposition. Are they in ignorance respecting our principles and influence? That can not be, for those who wage war against the Order most remorselessly do so in cities where our lodges are most numerous, and our influence most beneficial. Reluctantly then, with a blush for human nature, we arrive at the conclusion that that portion of the clergy, who war against Odd Fellowship, knowing its high principles and witnessing its benevolent deeds, do so from motives unchristian, unholy and wrong.

These petty despots of the pulpit are opposed to Odd Fellowship, because it teaches the universal brotherhood of man. Their power lies in disunion. They seek to rule over a few isolated from the mass, whose intellects are chained with iron laws of creed, and whose hearts they poison with the bitter lessons of sectarianism. In the Lodge-room the Catholic and Protestant come in contact, they behold in each other noble virtues and warm affections. Thus the different classes of community are united in new and sacred ties of 'Friendship, Love and Truth.' In proportion as men become united, the power of the bigot is lessened, for his real strength is in darkness, and his power is based on falsehood. Can we wonder then, that men who have entered the ministry as sectarians and not as Christians, are opposed to that Order which frees men from the fetters of the sect, that they may love one another?

The influence of Odd Fellowship is to hush this unholy war of creeds, and to put an end to the bitterness of sectarianism, to unite men in heart who differ in faith, and to lead men of all sects to unite in the Godlike efforts of a free and limitless benevolence. In doing this, it puts a stop to the trade of the theological gladiator, and it ends the business of those who reap a golden harvest by fostering the passions and pandering to the prejudices of men. Like the Priests and Pharisees of old, this class of our enemies oppose us, because we break the fetters, and illumine the darkness, and deliver the minds, and enlarge the affections of our race: because we knit severed hearts together, and teach men that goodness is not confined to the pulpit and the church, but is diffused abroad, like the bright sunshine and the holy dews, wherever true hearts beat in tenderness, and soft hands diffuse the sweet influences of love.—[Gavel. DON'T HIT MY BUBBLES.

My little boy was sporting in the Study with his pipe and soap and water, blowing bubbles into the sunny air. He was right merry at his play, and his shout was loud and glad as the beautiful vapor floated away and exploded. While he was thus busy, I chanced to turn hastily from my desk, just as he was watching the motions of a lot of bubbles that were dancing fantastically around him, and as I stepped forward, I was coming in contact with his vapory worlds, when I was arrested by his merry cry,—'Don't hit my bubbles!' They were saved from instant death to live a momentary life, and expired in due time in beauty.

The words of the little bubble blower arrested my thoughts and made me ponder on them, as well worthy of conveying a moral as a fable or a fairy tale. And thus run my meditations: First, said I to myself, let us remember that bubbles are bubbles; when we are sporting with momentary pleasures, and are engaged in matters that are really of no more consequence than the gossamer globes that rise from the bubbling pipe, let us keep that fact before us. We shall enjoy them the more if we calculate only on the brevity of their existence, and do not expect them to remain but a moment in the air. Let us throw them as far as we can into the sunshine,—the more light, the more beauty. Let us be active to compass all that is to be seen from various points of view, and exult in the rainbow beauties that exhibit themselves to our sight. Then, when circumstances come to interrupt our pleasure—to disturb the frail things that are floating in brightness to us, we shall not magnify too greatly the importance of momentary things, and be content to cry, 'Don't hit my bubbles.' Too many bubble blowers think they are really forming worlds. They dream themselves into the belief that planets and systems are in the atmosphere which is filled only by vapory globes, and when the destructive power endangers the existence of their bubbles, they cry out as though

*'The pillared earth were rottenness,
And earth's base built on stubble.'*

Their bubbles are to them the world's arks of safety, into which their philanthropy is willing to receive every one by 'only the payment of expenses.' They have no design of making any thing by the project. Oh no! they wish to be free from all selfish considerations, and to make the real benevolence of their designs perfectly apparent. Poor dreamers! they find their reward in the blowing of the bubbles. It is well it is so, for otherwise they would not receive any recompense at all. 'It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good,' and the bubble blower had better content himself with the dancing of the glittering vapors, for the wind that blows out the frail tissue of the bubble so that it reflects the colors of light, will soon explode the whole matter.

Bubbles are bubbles, but it is not every one that will believe it. True, they hold the pipe in their own hand, and there are the suds from which the material was taken, and their own breath has given motive force to the tiny balloon to rise into the air, but once in the air, the true nature of the bubble is all forgotten. They are entranced by its beauty, and leap in the delight which the crazed creature enjoyed who imagined the dew drops to be diamonds! And as illy prepared are they to see their bubbles explode, as was that dreamer to behold the vanishing of his diamonds, when the startled bird shook the branch which bore the beautiful drops on its leaves.—Which was the craziest?

Speaking of bubble blowing; reminds me of a mystery. I love to see symbolical pictures or drawings, yet they are but as the black notes of a piece of music which I never heard sung, when there is no clue to their meaning. Now there is 'Bentley's Miscellany,' in which Boz made his debut to the world; on the cover are two triumphal pillars, crowned by Plenty, and between these pillars, supported by two scrolls, rests a globe, upon which sits a little child, throwing the bubbles from his pipe, while many are in the air, and he seems to be swinging round upon the globe. What does this mean? Is it an honest expression of a proper estimate of the mere bubbles of literature, coupled with a 'don't hit my bubbles, for I know they are but bubbles,' to the critic? They are thrown out to the world to interest and please for the moment, and then to be lost in the common atmosphere. We need such bubbles as well as the ponderous pyramids of learning; and we pity the soul that can never be pleased with bubbles—that has no childhood left—that is always decaying the free gifts of mind if they chance to be ephemera, as though their mightiness must always be allowed to possess a true Englishman's stomach, receptive of roast beef only. He that blows bubbles for me in the literary atmosphere, is my benefactor, as well as he who by his great and grand discoveries in Science and Philosophy, gives me 'new heavens and a new earth.' I love the butterfly as well as the eagle, the dew drop as the pavilion of clouds, the tiny creatures that lift their wings to flash out the spark of light, as well as the stars in the heavens; each in their place. All were made to be noticed, to minister to enjoyment. I love the humbler things in literature, for there are hours when the spirit feels deep sympathy with the poet's wish:—

'Come, read to me some poem,
Some simple and heartfelt lay,
That shall soothe this restless feeling,
And banish the thoughts of day.

Not from the grand old masters,
Not from the bards sublime,
Whose distant footsteps echo
Through the corridors of time.

For, like strains of martial music,
Their mighty thoughts suggest
Life's endless toil and endeavor;
And to-night I long for rest.'

COLD WEATHER.

Ledyard, the celebrated traveller, who traversed some of the dreary regions of Russia, in a letter from Siberia, gave the following shivering description of the weather in that quarter of the globe:

'You have no idea of the excessive cold in the region of Siberia. By experiments that I made at Yakusky, I found on the 19th of November the mercury in my thermometer frozen. In December I found, by repeated observations, that two ounces of clear quicksilver, openly exposed, froze hard in fifteen minutes. I observed that in these severe frosts, the air was condensed, as it is with you in a thick fog—the atmosphere is frozen—respiration is fatiguing, &c. It is a happy law of nature, that in such intense cold there is seldom any wind—when there is, it is dangerous to be abroad. There are no wells at Yakusky; for it is found by experience that the water freezes at sixty feet deep. People of these regions are therefore obliged to use ice and snow. They have also ice windows; glass is of no use to the few who have it; the difference in the state of the air, within and without, is so great that the glass is covered on the inside with several inches of frost, and in that situation it is less luminous than ice. The timber of the house splits and opens with loud cracks—the rivers thunder and open with broad fissures—all nature groans with the rigors of Winter.'

Capt. Back, also, in his journal, while exploring the Northern section of this continent, for Capt. Ross and his comrades, gives a somewhat uncomfortable idea of the weather in the winter season. He says that while encamped in his winter quarters, when the thermometer was at seventy below zero, he made some curious experiments on the effect and intensity of the cold on sulphuric and nitric ether and pyroigneous acid. The effects produced by the cold, when the thermometer was one hundred and two degrees below the freezing point, are thus described in his journal:—

'Such indeed, was the abstraction of heat, that with eight large logs of dry wood in the fire-place of a small room, I could not get the thermometer higher than 12 deg. plus. Ink and paint froze. The sextant cases and boxes of seasoned wood, principally fir, all split. Nor was the sensation particularly agreeable to our persons; the skin of the hands especially became dry, cracked and opened into unsightly and smarting gashes, which we were obliged to anoint with grease. On one occasion, after washing my face within three feet of the fire, my hair was actually clotted with ice before I had time to dry it. From these facts some idea may perhaps be formed of the excessive cold. It seemed to have driven all living things before us; we had been accustomed to see a few white partridges about, but even these, hardy as they are, had disappeared. Once, indeed, a solitary raven, whose croak made me run out to look at him, swept round the house, but immediately winged his flight to the Westward. Nothing but the passing wind broke the awful solitude of this barren and desolate spot.'

BREAD FROM HEAVEN.

A very singular event is said to have occurred in the Pachaic of Anatolia, in Asia Minor. They were starving at that place for want of food, and an extraordinary interposition of Providence has been manifested in their behalf. A glutinous substance, or manna, of which they make bread, has fallen in immense quantities in a district of that country. This food is selling publicly at 17s. per quarter. This is stated in a letter from Smyrna, dated March 7, 1846, in our papers by the last steamer, which if true, will create a great sensation in the religious world, being an event very similar to the raining of manna to the starving Israelites in the desert.

Anatolia, the largest of the provinces of Turkey, in Asia Minor, is on the north western coast of the peninsula formed by the Euxine (or Black) and Mediterranean seas, about four hundred miles from the Holy Land and six hundred from Mount Arrarat. The name is derived from Anatolice, the East, which the Greeks applied to the whole of what is now called Asia Minor, or the Lesser Asia. Historians agree that the peninsula was first peopled by the descendants of Gomer and Javan, and other children of Japheth, who gave their names to the cities and provinces, as Tarshish, Kittim, Donanim, Ashkanez, Riphath, Togarman, &c. Sacred history informs us that the children of Javan peopled the 'Isles of the Gentiles,' and the Ionian Islands of our own time perpetrate the memory of Javan, the Ion of the Greeks.

Josephus ascribes to Gomer the distinction of having been the ancestor of the Celtic nations who spread over the whole of central and southern Europe, and what is now Anatolia, was the land of Gomer for some centuries after the flood. The Turkish nations of Central Asia lay claim to the same descent. Coming down to a later period, we find this Peninsula the theatre of great events, filled with opulent cities, royal palaces, rich manufactures and splendid works of art. It is full of the most interesting historical recollections. Here was Troy, and here still is Mount Ida, and Mount Olympus. Here were the Ionian, Eolian and Dorian colonies—in which the first germs of Grecian art developed themselves—then came the Lydian kingdom, whose last sovereign, Croesus, was subdued by the Persians; next came the Macedonian conquerors; then the Romans, and last the Turks.

The city of Tarshish, to which Solomon sent his ships, has still a representative in Tarsus, a town of 30,000 inhabitants at the head of the bay of Tarsus. Here were the Galatians and the Ephesians to whom St. Paul wrote epistles; and here still are Philadelphia, Sardis, Smyrna, Thyatira, Pergamos, Troas, Ephesus, &c. The population of Anatolia consists of Turks, principally, who are followers of Mahommed. About one-tenth are Jews, who possess considerable influence with the government. The Armenians, Christians of the Greek Church, probably compose another tenth of the population. They are the original inhabitants of the country, but tolerated by Turks from Central Asia, who claim to have descended from kindred branches of the human family.

THE LAW OF KINDNESS.

The existence of the love of kindness in the soul, is nobly exhibited in an Arab tale, the substance of which I obtained from De Lamartine's translation of 'A Residence among the Arabs of the Great Desert.' In the tribe of Nedjle, there was a mare of great reputation for beauty and swiftness, which a member of another tribe, named Daher, vehemently desired to possess. Having failed to obtain her by offering all he was worth, he proceeded to effect his object by stratagem. He disguised himself like a lame beggar, and waited by the side of a road, knowing that Nabee, the owner of the mare, would soon pass. As soon as Nabee appeared, Daher cried, in a feeble voice, 'I am a poor stranger; for three days I have been unable to stir from this to get food; help me, and God will reward you.' Nabee offered to carry him home; but Daher said, 'I not able to rise; I have not strength.' Nabee then generously dismounted, brought his mare near, and helped the beggar to mount her. The moment he was mounted, Daher touched her with his heel and started, saying, 'It is I, Daher, who have got her, and am carrying her off.' Nabee called on him to stop, which Daher did. Nabee then said, 'Thou hast my mare; since it pleases God, I wish thee success; but I conjure thee, tell no one how thou has obtained her.' 'Why not?' said Daher. 'Because some one really ill might remain without aid; you would be the cause why no one would perform an act of charity more, for the fear of being duped as I have been.' This discriminating kindness subdued Daher—he immediately dismounted and returned the mare to Nabee, and when they parted, they parted sworn friends. This tale shows forth the power of kindness in a beautiful manner—and the delight, with which the Arabs heard it told, demonstrates that they can appreciate true generosity.

These facts prove the existence of good in man, and that it is never fully destroyed in the soul; and the great Master of life, who knows all hearts, when he directed the Messiah to say, 'love your enemies';—knew the existence of that good; that it was a diamond hidden beneath revengeful feelings; a spring beneath the surface of the earth; and that it only wanted the burnisher of truth to make the diamond shine, and the power of divine benevolence to cause the spring-water of love to gush in its fulness from the heart.

A PASSION FOR SOULS.

The Presbyterian Herald contains an article under this head commencing as follows:

'A distinguished minister of the Presbyterian church, in a lecture on what constituted a call to the ministry, gave, as one of the main constituents of it, 'a passion for souls.'

We have long understood that Presbyterian preachers have a peculiar regard for the souls of men; and we are here certified that they have a passion for the possession of them. Well, suppose they could get the souls of all men into their hands—what would they do with them? Send them to heaven of course, so they all say, and who doubts their word? No man can listen to a single sermon of theirs, without being convinced that souls would be very safe in their hands, and in no danger at all of being endlessly lost. They would save the whole world, indeed, if they had the power.

What a pity that souls are not as safe in their divine Master's hands as in their own! that Jesus is not as good as they are! But hark! listen to the testimony of the Lord by his prophet: 'Behold, all souls are mine.' Ezek. xviii: 4. Should it be claimed that a being called the devil has possession of some, we ask, how did he get them?

Did he create any? No. Has he purchased any?—No; for all agree that he is a very poor devil, not owning so much as one foot of ground. Have any been bequeathed to him? No. Has he stolen any? No, for God owns them all. And even preachers, although possessing a 'passion' for them, will never be able to take them from their rightful owner, who is as much better than they are as he is greater. Who would not prefer to have his soul in the keeping of the Giver of every good and perfect gift rather than in that of the best orthodox or heterodox preacher that ever lived?—[Star in the West:

PUNISHMENT.

John the Evangelist, as moved by the spirit of inspiration, gave his testimony to the world, that God is love, and this is a truth readily admitted by people of all religious denominations; and yet but few, in comparison with the many who have a belief in the doctrines of Christianity, will admit the conclusions which must inevitably follow in reasoning from such a position. The truth of this will fully appear, by examining the government which the Supreme Being maintained over mankind as moral beings.

If we fully comprehend the laws and principles upon which God's moral government is founded, we shall find that its administration is productive of no evil as an end, but that all suffering appears only as a mean by which a good result is produced. For instance, we many times look upon pain as an evil and so speak of it, but in doing so, we do not observe the end produced by that pain. When we do, we find that it arouses us to a knowledge of our departure from the ways of rectitude; to a sense of our entire dependence upon the Deity for all of our enjoyments; schools our spirits; brings forth our sympathy, and makes us better men. And hence, it being only a mean, productive of a good result, it can't be an evil. But in order to its being evil it should appear as an end itself, a final result. Perhaps the point may be made more plain by illustrating it in the following manner—

We will bring forward a parent and observe the manner in which he governs his offspring. We behold him instructing his child in the ways of virtue, giving it to understand that it must walk in the path of wisdom; that it must act upon the principles of integrity, and let morality appear in all its movements. The child goes forth, but owing to the frailty of its nature, youth and inexperience; it soon yields to temptation, and goes directly in opposition to that instruction. The parent lays hold of the rod and punishes it for the same, and through the instrumentality of that punishment, produces a reformation; brings his child to a sense of its wayward actions; subdues the vicious disposition there being cherished and strengthened; brings it back from its wanderings, making it dutiful and obedient. Now in view of this, was that punishment good or evil? Perhaps the child, while enduring the punishment, seeing not the end from the beginning, might suppose it to be one of the greatest evils which could have befallen it. But we view it in a far different light; at once behold the benefits resulting from the same. It placed those wandering feet in the way of virtue once more, and at an after period, gave that child the enjoyment which comes as a reward upon those of obedience and morality. And such is precisely the principle upon which God's moral government is administered. The punishment inflicted upon mankind for disobeying the laws which govern them as moral beings, is not an evil because it does not appear as an end, but only as a mean, producing a beneficial result. Now for the proof from the records of Revelation.

David, while addressing the Supreme Being, speaks upon this wise.—'Before I was afflicted, I went astray; but now have I kept thy word.' From this we observe that the punishment inflicted upon the Psalmist for disobeying the laws of God, was beneficial in its results, being employed as a mean, productive of a good end.

Paul, in his letter to the Hebrews, declares that God chastises us for our profit, 'that we may be partakers of his holiness,' and furthermore says, 'no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous but grievous, nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them who are exercised thereby.' This testimony, like that of the Psalmist, represents punishment as being productive of good.

Such is the instruction of Revelation, relative to the manner in which the moral government of the Supreme Being is administered. And by it we learn that the punishment which Heaven inflicts upon mankind for disobeying the moral laws, for their neglect of his precepts, commandments and requirements, is not absolutely an evil to them, because that through its instrumentality the evil disposition which may be nourished in the human mind is overcome, and a reformation the consequence following from its infliction; and such an act or proceeding is characteristic of a Being who is love, and well calculated to inspire reverence and affection in the heart of every candid and reflecting individual of the human race. And such a manner of inflicting punishment and for the accomplishment of such a purpose, is in perfect harmony with that truth which our Saviour brought before the view of men, in the use of his similitudes showing that the mind and spirit of the actor might be known from the nature of the actions performed. In view of which let us turn our attention to the doctrine of endless punishment.

1. Endless punishment appearing as an end in the economy of God, would be productive of no good. This is a self-evident proposition and must appear so, and so be acknowledged, we should suppose, by every one who would indulge in a few queries like these.—Could it be of any possible benefit or advantage to the Supreme Being? 'No. He is already in possession of self-sufficiency. Infinity clothes every attribute of his character, and consequently endless punishment inflicted upon a portion of the intelligent creation, would result in no possible good to him. Could it be of any possible profit or advantage to the righteous, who are sweeping their harp-strings in the realms of everlasting glory? We are aware that it was once taught in the Church, that the sufferings of those enduring endless punishment, would enhance the happiness of the saints in heaven. But this long since was abandoned as an error; and it is now acknowledged by the great mass of the religious community, that that punishment would result in no good to those who are the recipients of endless felicity. Could it be of any benefit to the miserable beings who are to suffer it? That it would, we believe has never been contended, and to do so would be of no avail, for every man of common sense can not but allow, that no good whatever would accrue to that miserable class from the endurance of their sufferings. And in view of this, the mind of candor and sincerity must acknowledge, that no good whatever would result to a solitary being within the boundary of the universe, from the doom of endless punishment.

2. Endless punishment would be an evil to those upon whom it might be inflicted. This proposition is also self-evident. The human mind can form no idea or opinion, of any evil of greater moment that could be inflicted upon an intelligent being, than a heart-rending punishment which would end only with the wasteless eternity of God.

From these premises we argue that endless punishment can be no part of the economy of the Creator, for 'God is love,' and all of his institutions must partake of the nature of love, and endless punishment not partaking of that nature, of course can not be an institution established by his creative hand.

Yet, as we said in the beginning, but few of the great mass of the religious world will acknowledge or admit this natural conclusion, resulting from a course of reasoning following from the truth spoken by John, that God is love. But if men would strive for the possession of the rich treasures of wisdom, they should strictly adhere to the voice of reason in all their contemplation of the works or words of the everlasting God. And when this is done by a member of the human family, he rejoices while looking upon the institutions of Heaven; upon the laws of his moral government; and indeed upon every thing relative to the final destiny of man. For then he will behold all things working together for good, and the intelligent creation at last in the enjoyment of everlasting bliss. S. J. G.

REV. MR. ARMITAGE AND UNIVERSALISTS.

Clinton, May 2d, 1846.

Br. SKINNER,—The following letter should have been written earlier, but a multiplicity of business has hitherto prevented me. In a recent conversation with the Rev. Mr. Armitage, of Fort Plain, he made the following assertion, which, at my solicitation, he handed me in writing. A copy of it is as follows:

'That when it is necessary, Universalists deny the divinity of Christ, the immortality of the soul, and the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. And also that this can be proved from Universalist works.'

The reason of my addressing you on the subject is, that he has agreed to furnish proof of the above, in articles of moderate length, for the Magazine and Advocate, if you will allow him the use of its columns, which, I told him, I believed would be readily granted by you.

If our Methodist brother thinks that we are in error on these points, and adopt such a temporising policy as is stated above, I see no just reason why he shall not be allowed the privilege of correcting or exposing us, and pointing out the errors in our own columns. I therefore submit it to your consideration and disposal.

Yours in the Gospel, N. SNELL.

REMARKS.

Who is this Rev. Mr. Armitage? And what does he know of Universalists and their sentiments? Does he know any thing about them as he ought? or has he merely picked up some of the cant and slang of M. H. Smith, Luther Lee, Hatfield, Slocum and other slanderers of the denomination? And what does he mean by the terms he employs—for instance, by the phrase, 'when it is necessary, Universalists deny' such and such doctrines? Is he a predestinarian and holds he strictly to the law of necessity—that Universalists are under an absolute and fatal necessity of doing as they do? If so, why does he blame them? or on what ground condemn them, by his own principles? But we presume this was not his meaning. We presume by the phrase he meant to insinuate that Universalists wanted to pass themselves off as Christians and believers in all evangelical doctrines; but could not do it with their principles—that they were driven to the necessity of denying either their own doctrine or some of the great and fundamental doctrines of Christianity; and hence when necessary for the support of their own darling tenet, they would do the latter and thus deny every thing sacred and true. If this were his meaning, as it undoubtedly was, then he is grossly ignorant of the real sentiments, policy and feelings of Universalists, or else he meant to slander and abuse them. If this, our interpretation of his language is incorrect, then let him define his own language and tell us what he does mean by the phrase, 'when it is necessary,' &c.

Again, he uses indefinite and ambiguous language in his charges against us for denying certain doctrines. For instance when he charges Universalists with denying the 'divinity of Christ,' what does he mean by the divinity of Christ? Does he mean his self-existence and supreme Deity? If so, his charge is true—we do deny and always have denied such monstrosities and absurdities as involve the idea of there being more than one Supreme Deity, or that Christ was his own Son or the Father of himself, or that he did not mean what he said, when he declared, 'the Father is greater than I.' We should esteem it slander to be charged with any such absurdities as those involved in the doctrine of the Trinity—a doctrine unknown to Christ and his apostles, and unheard of in the Christian church during the first two or three centuries of the Christian era. But if by the divinity of Christ, Mr. A. means, that he was divinely begotten by the Father, divinely appointed; sent and anointed as the Christ, or true Messiah—that he was divinely inspired, divinely endowed, divinely empowered—that the doctrines he taught were truly the doctrines of God uttered through him—and that the miracles he wrought were the miracles of God performed through him—if such were his meaning of 'the divinity of Christ' when he charged us with denying it, then we pronounce his charge utterly false and slanderous, and any man who utters it is guilty of base calumny: for in this, the true and proper sense of the phrase, we have never denied, but are sincere and hearty believers in the divinity of Christ. Again, then, we say to Mr. Armitage, let him define his terms and show what he means, and not charge a numerous denomination of Christians with denying fundamental doctrines without any definition or explanation of what those doctrines are.

Again, Mr. A. charges Universalists with denying the immortality of the soul. This is also a false and wicked slander when uttered against the denomination of Universalists. It is true that a few individuals, both among Universalists and Partialists, have denied that there is any thing in the nature of man (whether of soul or body) that is immortal in and of itself, maintaining that the soul goes to sleep at the death of the body and is unconscious until a future resurrection; but that at a future period immortality shall be bestowed upon the soul or spirit of man in and by the resurrection. The number of Universalists holding this view is very small, and it can not be charged against the denomination any more than it can against our opposers. Undoubtedly nine tenths of our denomination believe in the fullest sense of the phrase, in the immortality of the soul; and all of them believe, without a solitary exception, in the future, immortal, endless and happy existence of all men. Without this belief they can not be Universalists.

The last charge of Mr. A. that Universalists 'deny the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures,' we pronounce unqualified and malicious slander: and any man of information on the subject knows it to be such. There is no apology for such slanderers. What though they may have read such charges in a book (as Mr. A. may have done) and think they are true—this is no apology for them if they neglect to inform themselves from reliable sources of information. He who retails a slander second handed from the lips or pen of another is just as legally liable to prosecution in a libel suit as he who invents it in the first place. And the whiffets that bark at us because bigger dogs than they have done so before them, or in other words the second hand retailers of slander who gather it from the lips or pen of modern Judases, can not be held guiltless either before God or men. We said modern Judases; but those inventors of the slanders against us are in one respect worse than Judas was: for when he had betrayed and forsaken his Master, he had some remorse, some shame: he repented and afterwards confessed the innocence of Jesus. But these modern traitors such as Matthew Hale Smith, Robert Smith, and other co-laborers, after betraying and forsaking, write a book against us in order, Benedict Arnold-like, to get a good birth and a high command in the camp of our enemies: and when Mr. A. offers to prove his charges against us 'from Universalist works,' we presume he means such works as those of the traitors above named or their coadjutors, who have spent much time in compiling, perverting, garbling, altering, and mutilating such parts of Universalist writings as they supposed by their graving tools they could so shape as to accomplish their purposes of misrepresentation and slander most safely and with seeming plausibility. As for any other or better proof they have it not—and they know it.

Now if Mr. A. wishes to write any thing for publication in our columns on this subject, he must clearly define what he means by his charges and he must adduce some better authority than that of confessed traitors, liars and slanderers, or those whom we have disfellowshipped for their vices and infidelity. We shall see what he will do.

BR. STEBBINS' CARD.

We have received a letter from Br. Hammond, Editor of the Luminary, touching the Card of Br. J. Stebbins which appeared in our last number, in which he denies the correctness of Br. S.'s statements and feels sorely aggrieved at the charges of unfairness and dishonesty preferred against him. Br. H. turns the tables rather severely on Br. S. and demands the publication of his letter in our columns. Now suppose we comply with this wish, will not Br. S. demand the privilege of a rejoinder, and thus mutual recriminations without end and without any good, ensue? Now, we owe no ill will to either of these brethren—we wish to do equal justice to both, and yet take no part personally in their controversy. We respectfully and affectionately inquire whether it would not be better to defer all further publications on the subject upon both sides, till they can have a personal interview and settle the matter amicably? Perhaps that opportunity may occur at the Convention—and should health permit we hope to be there—and that they may be brought to an amicable settlement of the whole matter. And then, whatever truth or justice may demand to have made public, for the benefit of either, or both, we will cheerfully publish.

MARRIAGES.

In Collinsville, April 29th, by Rev. J. S. Kibbe, Mr. JAMES D. ALLEN, to Miss O. MALVINA WILCOX, both of that place.

DEATHS.

At Brooklyn, Pa., on the evening of the 8th ultimo, Mrs. BETSEY CHAPMAN, relict of the late Mr. Joseph Chapman, aged 69 years.

Mrs. Chapman was a native of Norwich, Connecticut, and with her husband was one of the earliest and most respected settlers of this county. In all her domestic and family relations she was exemplary, kind, truly indulgent and affectionate; and in her social intercourse with community at large, her benevolence, correct deportment, affability and goodness of heart, endeared her to all who had the pleasure of her society and acquaintance.

For many years her firm faith in the strict justice and illimitable goodness of her Creator led her to cherish the fond hope of salvation, not only for herself, but ultimately for the whole human family. On this faith and the Scriptures of truth she delighted to dwell. These were her greatest solace and consolation in life, and during a long and lingering decline and expected dissolution, her faith strengthened, upheld, and cheered her on through the gloomy passage, truly disarming death of its terrors in her last moments. By the demise of Mrs. C. her relatives have sustained an irreparable loss—neighbors and acquaintances, and especially the religious society to which she belonged, will experience a vacuum long to be remembered.

At his residence in Manchester, Ontario county, on the 19th of April, Mr. HARLEY REDFIELD, in the 52d year of his age. His disease was a lingering consumption of more than twenty years standing, which he bore with unparalleled patience and Christian resignation. Never did the King of Terrors meet with a victim more calm and composed; more ready to make his exit to the spirit-world, than in the death of our lamented brother, who died trusting in the mercy of God and in the certain fulfilment of all his holy promises. He was able to look beyond the trials and sorrows of time to the joys of eternity, in a full and cheering confidence of meeting his relatives and friends in immortal bliss. O, it was an affecting scene to all around to hear the dying saint talk to his weeping family and friends, of the comforts of the Gospel—the religion of Christ.—With his wife and children, one sister and two brothers, who were present at his dying moments, he conversed in the most feeling manner, pronouncing upon them a father's and brother's blessing; pointing towards heaven as the destiny of all mankind, 'where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.' He is the first of eight brothers who have been called to the 'silent city.' He leaves a wife and three children, an aged father, seven brothers and one sister, to mourn their irreparable loss. Nor are his relatives all who mourn. His great moral worth, strict integrity, his benevolence to the poor, and his sympathy for the suffering, endeared him to all; and this estimation was clearly evinced by the large concourse of people who assembled, and the tears that were shed, on the gloomy day of his interment. His funeral was attended on the 22d, and a discourse delivered by the writer, from Phil. iii: 20, 21.

As bodies to their proper centre move,
As the poised ocean to the attracting moon
Obedient swells, and every headlong stream
Devolves its winding waves to the main;
So all things which have life aspire to God,

In Lee, March 22d, Mrs. LYDIA WOOD, aged 91 years. Mrs. W. had lived to a good old age. Her life covers a broad space on the map of human existence, enough of the trials, the duties and cares of which she had experienced to know its vanity. For more than half a century she had been a member of the Baptist church, with which she united in Rhode Island. But now she has gone to join that church above into which all will be gathered, and commune in the fulness of the spirit of God, in the morning of the resurrection. Sermon by S. J.

TO MALONE'S SWEET MINSTREL.

Rest peacefully my Muse;—I fling my Lyre away,
Such melting strains come floating on the breeze
When minstrels sweetly sing, I'll listen to their lay.
Ah! who would wake a lyre unform'd to please?
A broken instrument, with worn and trembling strings,
Emits no glow of pure celestial fire—
To music's mighty soul no pleasant off'ring brings;
No concord with a new, and polished lyre.
He who form'd the ear, gave souls of song their birth;
Their dulcet sounds in thrilling numbers flow,
Exult, and sweetly soothe the drooping sons of earth,
Make gelid souls with warmth and rapture glow,
Then strike the sounding strings, the sinking spirit lingers
To catch the low, soft cadence as it steals—
From thoughts of love and beauty, neath the truthful fingers,
And peace divine and harmony reveals.
The spirit, eager for its high, and nobler birth,
At music's flow will plume its wings for flight,
When bards sublimely sing, disdains this dark dull earth,
Pursues its track, toward uncreated light.
Imagination soars, with sweet and sacred song,
The soul aspiring, centres near its God!
Joins in holy anthems with the angelic throng,
And wearies of its earthy, frail abode.
'Tis sweet to rise above the tempest storms of life,
And Heaven-ward soar, on pinions of the mind,
To live above the world, its falsities and strife,
Anticipate a spirit unconfined. Z. PORTER.

THE CIRCULAR AND PROTEST.

These documents, about which several articles have been written and published in our columns, it is proper we should give to the public, not only that all may know what they are, but also as matter of convenient future reference. We suppose the minds of all are made up, and that all who wish to sign the Protest have already done so, embracing nearly half of our ministering brethren. We impugn not the motives of those who have, or those who have not signed it. Our own reasons for not signing it have already been given to the public—not that we objected to the general sentiments or language of the Protest; but that we deemed it uncalled for, or could see no good resulting from it; and further, that it proposed no remedy for the evils complained of. Others may as honestly entertain a different opinion from ours.—Editor Mag. and Adv.

CIRCULAR.

Boston, Nov. 3, 1845.

Dear Brother,—At a Mass-Meeting of Universalists, held the day after the Session of the General Convention in Sept. last, the following resolution was passed; and, agreeably to its instructions, the document hereby forwarded to you has been prepared, and is most respectfully and affectionately presented for your consideration:—

Resolved, That a Committee of five be appointed to prepare a solemn, earnest, and plain Protest against American Slavery, and when prepared, to present it to every Universalist clergyman in the United States for his signature, respectfully requesting those who are not willing to sign it, to give a reason for refusing; and when it has been fully circulated, and they have waited a reasonable time for answers, they shall publish the Protest and signatures, with the reasons offered by those who do not sign it.

We trust you will give early attention to this matter, and return an answer so that it may be received early in January next.

Affectionately and truly yours,

HENRY BACON,
SEBASTIAN STREETER, SYLVANUS COBB,
LUCIUS R. PAIGE,
EDWIN H. CHAPIN.

PROTEST.

It is not from an idle curiosity; but from a deep interest in the signs and promises of better days, that we desire to know how stands the ministry of the Universalist Church in reference to the great question of American Slavery. The measure hereby adopted is one that promises such a result, as the request is preferred to every minister of the Universalist denomination in the United States, with brotherly affection and true respect. We wish moreover, to know from whom we can expect hearty fellowship and co-operation in our prayers, our pleas, and our labors to advance the cause of Human Freedom, and to whom we may look for sympathy in our abhorrence and detestation of that system which destroys, as far as man has power to destroy, the grand distinction between man and brutes, and which holds in perpetual bondage two and a half millions of our fellow creatures. We believe by presenting a united front, we can add something to the moral power that in creating a deep horror at the monstrous wrongs of Slavery, and that shall gather strength and greatness till human nature can not withstand the majesty of the demand to 'let the oppressed go free,' but shall glorify God by loyalty to Right and Duty. With this desire, hope, and trust, we offer our Protest against American Slavery, in the following reasons.

1. Because it denies the eternal distinction between a man and property, ranking a human being with a material thing. The attributes of the soul forbid such a classification; for that alone can be recognized as property which is not wronged by the act of being owned by another. To man was originally given dominion over the lower orders of animals, that he might have them as property; but he has no right nor grant to own his fellow being.

2. Because Slavery does not award to the laborer the fruits of his toil, in any higher sense than to the cattle. All the claim to any property—even to the fruits of the tillage of the smallest plot of ground—depends on the will of him who claims by the same tenure, both the soil and the laborer.—Man was created to own, and not to be owned; the claim of another upon the fruits of his toil as upon the product of the service of a mere animal, overlooks the higher nature and the absolute rights of a human being.

3. Because Slavery trammels the intellectual powers, and prevents their expansion. The expansibility of the human mind is one of its chief glories, and endless means are appropriated to it by its Creator. To labor systematically to dwarf the intellect, is to prevent the opening, to a full vision, of the eye that God made, wherewith man should see him in the manifestations of himself through his laws. This, Slavery does. It denies to the slave even the alphabet of knowledge, the simplest elements of intellectual progress. The very enactment of laws which forbid, under heavy penalties, any one to teach the slave to read and write, implies all that we claim for his intellectual capacity, and manifestly declares that the maintenance of the system depends upon dwarfing the intellect.

4. Because Slavery checks the development of the moral nature of the slave. It denies him rights and thereby denies him responsibility. With the denial of his manhood, necessary goes his accountability; for where the distinction between persons and things is lost, the duties and responsibilities of the person are merged and lost in the thing. The slave is, to all intents and purposes of property, deprived of his moral nature, and thereby of his participation in common humanity.

5. Because Slavery involves a practical denial of the religious nature of the slave. The supreme will, to the slave, is the will of the master; and that which dwarfs the intellect, and checks the development of the moral nature, must be opposed to religious growth. It takes from the victim the means which God has furnished to beget and foster a true and filial reverence towards Himself, and gives him no religion but credulity. It shuts up the Bible from the slave as effectually as ever Popery did from the people in the dark days of its most terrific power.

6. Because Slavery presents an insurmountable barrier to the promulgation of the great truth of Universal Brotherhood, and thereby most effectually prevents the progress of true Christianity.—

Under its broad shadow Universalism can not grow. The seed is, at best, sown among thorns that choke its vegetation. Under the legitimate influences of such a system, the soul can not regard with favor the religion which has the same voice and tone, the same commands and warnings, the same hopes and promises, for him who is regarded as a thing and classed with cattle, as for the most elevated and gifted of the human race. And inasmuch as Slavery denies the equality that exists, by the attributes of human nature, between man and man, it can not but frown on the religion of Christ, which is based on that equality, and whose great and fundamental principle of morality is—'Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you.'

7. Because the essential nature of Slavery can not be altered by any kindness, how great soever, practised toward the slave. Kindnesses are but flowers in the links of the chain whose iron eats into the soul, and no sweetness can lull the moral sense into forgetfulness of what Slavery is. The highest kindness is comparatively nothing, while the manhood of the slave is denied or forgotten; for the first demand of love is, to respect the rights of another. While many slaveholders may, according to their perception of things, practice the utmost kindness to their slaves, that can not alter one feature of deformity in the system of Slavery.

8. Because the long continuance of a system of wrong can not palliate it, but, on the other hand, augments the demand for its abolition. New victims are ushered into existence every day, while the natural affections and the sanctities of marriage and domestic life are disregarded, and made subordinate to the interests of property.

9. Because, while we would in all charity remember that peculiarities of situation may affect the judgment and moral sense, still we must not forget, that no peculiarity of situation can excuse a perpetual denial of universal principles and obligations. Freedom is not the gift of charters and communities; it is not a benefit bestowed by geographical localities, but it is inherent in man as man, by the attributes of his nature. Our religion demands of us, with a voice that can not be silenced, that no limit of territory shall be permitted to exclude man from our sympathy, and no conventional laws shall supercede the eternal requisitions of justice and mercy.

American Slavery is a system of Wrongs, from its first principle to its crowning assumption; and in its train of evils are found all the iniquities that have eaten out the life of communities and nations. It legalizes sins that are abhorrent to the simplest moral sense; and in the increasing intelligence and philanthropy of the present age, it becomes more and more a stigma on our National Name, a curse to our country's prosperity, and a giant moral evil that must be overthrown, or it will overthrow us by the retributive justice of Him who has declared the truth;—'Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people.'

For these reasons we protest against the system of American Slavery as utterly wrong, and confess our obligation to use all justifiable means to promote its abolition.

ORIGINAL DISCOURSE.

BY B. S. HOBBS.

'But the way of transgressors is hard.' Prov. xiii: 15.

These are the words of Solomon; the ancient king of Israel, a man who was in a peculiar manner, endowed with wisdom and understanding, well trained in the school of experience, and thus every way qualified to give instruction both to his own and future generations. But I will not dwell on this point, as all believers in divine revelation believe that our text is high authority. We will therefore come directly to the subject.

1. We will notice some of the reasons why the way of transgressors is hard, and

2. The conclusion to which we arrive from these premises.

And we may remark in the first place that their way is hard from the nature of sin and the certainty of punishment. Were there no evil consequence attached to transgression and sin it would not be what it is said to be, hard: and although there might be punishment threatened to the violators of God's law, yet if there was a chance of escape, if that punishment was not certain and sure, there would be no certainty that their way was hard. Otherwise they might transgress, times almost without number, and yet escape the punishment pronounced against them; consequently their way would not be a hard one.

To illustrate our position—suppose for instance we could violate any of the physical laws by which we are governed, could we from a towering height plunge ourselves into a frightful precipice below, and not sustain any injury by so doing, it could not be said it was hard to violate a physical law; or if we could roll ourselves amid burning embers and feel no pain, suffer nothing, it could not be said in any sense whatever that to pursue such a course was a hard way. But is such the fact? Can we violate the physical laws that are stamped on the face of creation, and sustain no injury? Certainly not; all are willing to answer no; while experience and observation demonstrate that such is not the case. If we transgress we must suffer, and there is no escape. But how stands the matter in regard to the moral law? Will the same rule apply here? Is there the same unbroken harmony existing here that is stamped on the visible creation around us? or is the link broken, the chain severed, and no union or harmony to be found? Can we assent to this? I think with a little sober reflection you will answer with me in the negative to this question—that such can not be the case. Let us look at this subject in a calm and dispassionate manner. Let us inquire into the object and design of laws. Are they not instituted for the good of those for whom they are made? Most certainly; and in proportion as that object is gained, the peace and happiness of the governed secured, and the yielding a hearty and willing obedience to the laws that govern them, are they considered humane, just and wise. This we think is correct reasoning: and now let us inquire how that is best secured. Is it by letting the guilty go unpunished? All are ready to answer no. But allowing they do not always escape—that in numerous instances they receive for the wrong they have done; yet in many instances also, they are not recompensed according to their transgressions, would this, I ask, be the most effectual way to prevent crime, bloodshed and all manner of iniquity? Surely not. Who dare or will affirm to the contrary? But we ask again, would not the object above mentioned be more effectually secured if in every instance the transgressor received according to his just deserts? Who will answer no? Would we be so careful to obey the physical laws that govern us if we could transgress, time after time, and sustain no injury? I think you must answer we should not.

If we have reasoned correctly then on this subject, this point is clearly established, that the most effectual way to secure the object and design of laws is to make the penalty annexed to the transgression of those laws certain and inevitable; and allow no way of escape. But again, suppose it should add to our pleasures and augment our happiness to violate the laws by which we are governed, would that not be an inducement for us to pursue such a course and hinder and prevent our obedience to them? The answer is furnished from observation and experience. It certainly would. It would be a powerful stimulus to lead the sinner in the way of the transgressor and would go to defeat the object for which all good and wise laws were instituted, and be a direct impeachment of the character of the lawgiver. Is such then the fact, and are we right in our conclusions? If so, what shall we think of the doctrine that tells us of the enjoyments of sin—that the righteous suffer more than the wicked? In a word, as far as this life is concerned, the sinner has the best of it, and enjoys the greatest amount of happiness! Is this doctrine true? If it is, then we are mistaken in our former conclusions. But is such the case? Has the beneficent author of our existence, the Father of all mankind, the God of love—has He, I say, placed no obstacle in the way of the transgressor—to prevent his transgression—but on the contrary, holds out the inducement of pleasure in sin, to excite him to pursue a sinful course in order to secure the greatest amount of happiness?

'But,' says the objector, 'this is but one side of the picture—the sinner is threatened with the pains of eternity for disobedience; and pray tell me what more effectual way could be devised to stop the sinner in his mad career than this?' This to some is a plausible objection: we will therefore give it a passing notice. And we remark, in the first place, that this threatening loses its power to restrain from sin, because the punishment threatened is altogether disproportioned to the offence. Who, in his sober moments and blessed with the right use of his reasoning powers, would ever see any natural connection between the crimes of a finite mortal and infinite and unending punishment? Our transgressions can not effect or injure the infinitely supreme ruler of the universe; yet, for the sins of frail finite man, committed in a few short years, nay, hours, or even moments, and these only affecting those of Adam's race, nothing short of the pains of eternity can satisfy a Being whose nature and whose name is LOVE!!

But in the second place, we remark, there is no certainly in this threatened punishment. It tells the sinner he shall suffer it if he does not repent. Ah! there lies the difficulty; but he means to repent: he has no idea he shall suffer this punishment. Oh, no, he calculates on repentance at some future time—after he has spent a life of pleasure in sin—after he has had his fill of iniquity—then he will repent, escape the punishment pronounced against him and secure to himself the reward of the righteous. Thus you see there is no certainty about it; a way of escape is provided, and its force is nearly or entirely lost. But again, there is another difficulty in the way. Its motive to obedience arises from the fear of punishment. It presents to the sinner nothing that is lovely in the Being we are called upon to worship and adore; but to avoid his anger, wrath and indignation are men called upon to repent and believe the Gospel. Thus it is a kind of forced obedience against the will and inclinations, and when we come to add to this the pleasure to be derived in sin and disobedience, we ask where is its moral power to restrain? True, punishment is threatened, but it is not made certain and sure: a way of escape is provided through the gate of repentance. And again I ask, where, where is its restraining power? Aho answers where!—Is not this, I ask, the very doctrine that has thronged the road of intemperance, iniquity, and every species of crime—the very doctrine that has deceived millions and enabled them to learn, by hard earned and bitter experience, that the way of transgressors is hard? Yea, the very doctrine that was preached by the serpent in the garden of Eden, saying, 'ye shall not surely die.' But let us look at this doctrine of pleasure in sin and escape from punishment in another light, as it regards the character of our Father and his conduct towards his creatures. It represents him as threatening his creatures with an unceasing, unmitigated and never-ending punishment for their offences which can never affect or injure him in the least, but only themselves; and not only so, but he holds out an inducement to transgress his laws by adding to the joys and augmenting the happiness of the transgressor, by strewing the pathway of sin with flowers, and thus causing it to be charming and beautiful, and yet knowing he has so constituted man that to pursue that path will be his being's end and aim, and yet by so doing he will plunge himself in the gulf of endless despair, beyond the reach of hope and mercy, there to suffer, there to groan, there to wail and lament, while endless ages roll their ceaseless rounds; where there is no eye to pity, no arm to save, but he must suffer on, and yet on, while eternity endures! Oh, my God! is this the end for which man was created? will this be the result of the Saviour's condescension and death on Calvary's bloody brow? Is this the scheme that emanated from infinite goodness, which was planned by infinite wisdom, and accomplished by infinite power? Is this the way that God governs his creatures, and is this the result? Oh, tell it not in Gath, nor publish it in our country, lest man be hardened in his iniquity, blaspheme against his Creator and despise and condemn the Governor of the universe.

But thank God, we have nothing to fear—a voice from the page of inspiration says, 'fear not, for behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people.' As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' And notwithstanding 'the creation was made subject to vanity,' yet it 'shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God.' Do we yet want further testimony to our first position? we will then make our appeal to the sacred page. What says our text? 'But the way of transgressors is hard.' Mind the expression—is hard, now in the present tense. Again, though God is long suffering, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, yet will he by no means clear the guilty; no, not by repentance itself; for that would be one means, one chance of escape. But no, not even that. Do we want more testimony? we have it at hand. 'There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked, they are like the troubled sea, whose waters cast up mire and dirt.' Hear from the apostle of the Gentiles, 'Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile: for there is no respect of persons with God.' We might multiply our proofs from Scripture; for we meet with them on almost every page, from Genesis to Revelation; but this must suffice. If what we have quoted do not prove our position, more would not do it. But we can not conceive what language could be plainer, or more to our purpose.

Having made these remarks on the first part of our subject, we come to notice our second proposition, the conclusion to which we arrive from these premises—viz., that the way of transgressors is hard. And we remark,

1st. That the moral governor of the universe holds out no inducement for his creatures to transgress his laws by augmenting their happiness by so doing. No; but he tells them their way is hard—he teaches them that there is no escape—punishment is sure, certain and inevitable—is consequent on every transgression, yet it is for their good that sinners are thus punished. For God bath compassion according to the multitude of his mercies; for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.

2d. That evil is punished and virtue rewarded even in this life, and that consequently we need not go to the future world to find the place of punishment for transgression, and the reward of virtue; for 'behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner;' and thus we see that the Father of the spirits of all flesh may reward virtue and punish sin according to its just deserts and afterwards bestow immortality and never-fading glory on every son and daughter of Adam's race unconditionally, out of his own good will and pleasure, and the love wherewith he has loved us before the world began.

This is a scheme that alone could emanate from infinite goodness, be planned by infinite wisdom, and be accomplished by infinite power. It is love, vast as infinity, broad as immensity, and boundless as eternity. Yes, every attribute of Jehovah is a pledge for its fulfilment; and can we doubt its accomplishment. Yes when the God of the Bible loses his supremacy, or is divested of the crowning excellency of his nature, love. But till then, we have nothing to fear—all nature raises her voice, and speaks for such a result: but revelation unfolds to our view more clearly such a glorious consummation; then sin will be finished, transgression ended, and the last wanderer be brought home; and then it will be testified that Jesus gave himself a ransom for all and each of Adam's race.

GOOD WISHES—BUT WRONG MEANS....VI.

MR. EDITOR—Some three or four years past, Mr. B. has tried hard to be a preacher. Community are often slow in perceiving talent, and in his case, they are not yet convinced that he has much.

Still he labors on with becoming zeal under the impressions that his labors would be acceptable if societies were right.

Others fail; but he has never dreamed the failure could be with him.

No friend has ever told him that he was out of his sphere, and while many are pained to hear him attempt to preach, most are satisfied that he has the good of the cause at heart. But this is no reason why he should disgrace it. Mr. Editor, if you should see him, do tell him that if he loves the cause and respects his friends—to try other means to advance it, beside preaching. There are many things he can do for it that will benefit it, but trying to preach it, he will only retard it and pain his friends.

COMMENTS ON ROMANS II: 6.

God 'will render to every man according to his deeds.' Rom. ii: 6.

If there be any one doctrine or truth more clearly revealed in the Scriptures than another, it is, that God, without respect of persons, will certainly reward every person for every good deed he performs, and as certainly punish him for every evil deed. We call deeds good or evil as they tend to promote or diminish the general happiness. Our every act will be returned to us by our great Creator, and those that will make more happy our fellow creatures, will bring down a blessing upon our heads, while that will injure others, will prove to be not in accordance with our own good. We might multiply almost without number, direct quotations from the Divine Word, clearly expressing the same great truth as the one under consideration. See 2 Tim iv: 14, Col. iii: 25. Let us notice some particulars, and the unavoidable inferences which arise therefrom.

1. There is no way of escape. It does not read 'God may render to every man according to his deeds,' for what may be, may just as well not be. Neither does it read, 'if you do not repent and get religion, God will render to you according to your deeds.' No such condition is expressed, and we are not at liberty to suppose that any is implied. Such a supposition would make the text a falsehood, for it would be saying that 'God will not render to the penitent according to their deeds.' There is no contingency expressed. Let the emphasis fall on will—God WILL render, and there is no way to escape. Hence, the doctrine that man may commit sin and enjoy its fancied sweets, and yet by a death bed repentance, cheat justice of its demands, and force the gates of heaven, must necessarily be false.

2. There is no exception. Let the emphasis fall on every man—God will render to EVERY MAN; for without respect of persons he judges according to every man's work. Each son and daughter of the human family is embraced. Hence that must be a false doctrine which teaches that God will punish some sinners, but not all, for those who afterwards repent will go unpunished.

3. God will render to every man according to his deeds, or works. There is nothing said about belief or professions. If our deeds be good, we are on the safe side, though our faith should prove to be false—though we make no loud professions—and though we utter no groans, nor wear a sad countenance to be seen and heard of men.

4. He will render to every man according to his deeds—his own deeds—not the deeds of another person. Hence the doctrine of a vicarious atonement is false, for that tells us that Christ died in our stead—that he bore the punishment due us for our sins, and that on certain conditions we shall be eternally rewarded as a consequence of his good deeds.

5. It is according to every man's deeds. And as man is a finite being and can only perform finite acts, his rewards and punishments must be finite likewise. Large sins will be more severely punished, and smaller transgressions receive a smaller recompense—the one shall receive many stripes, the other few. Hence that doctrine must be false which teaches endless misery, for all distinctions of few and many must be lost in endless duration, and can not be according to the deeds of time.

6. Let every word in the text be fully believed by the sinner, and would he longer consent to sin? As we desire happiness, let us cease to do evil and learn to do well.—[Prim. Expounder. R. T.]

WORKING OUT SALVATION.

'Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling,' &c.

That the true meaning of this injunction has been perverted, may be shown by referring the reader to language with which it stands connected. Two explanations have been given of it, both of which we conceive to be incorrect. There is but one, however, which can justly be considered derogatory to the character of the apostle as a preacher of Christian doctrine. This view of it originates from a misunderstanding, or rather a wrong application of the word salvation. In most cases where this word occurs in the sacred Scriptures, happiness, or salvation from deserved punishment in a future state, by many is understood. This is the meaning which has generally been attached to this word in the passage under investigation. That no created being in the universe of God can work out his own salvation from corruption to incorruption, from mortal to immortality, from dishonor to glory, may be proved from the lively oracles. 'For there is none other name under heaven, given among men whereby they can be saved' in this sense, but that of Jesus. He is 'the resurrection and the life.'—And that no one will be thus saved by his own merit, may be proved from those passages which declare that mankind are saved by grace, 'not of works, lest any man should boast. All have sinned and come short of the glory of God, being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.'

With deference to the opinions of our ministering brethren, we would observe that, from the exposition which some of them have given of this injunction, we beg leave to dissent. That, in various places where this word occurs in the Scriptures, the writers have evident allusion to a partial salvation from sin and unbelief in the present state, is readily acknowledged. As an instance of it we would mention Paul's declaration to the Romans, 'For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.' Here belief is unto salvation, and it is the work of man—i. e. it is produced by the power of evidence on the mind, which evidence is sought for in most cases by those that believe.—Thus a person might be said to work out his own salvation, and so he may continue to work out his own salvation from ignorance and its subsequent misery. We might note another passage in Paul's letter to Timothy, 'Take heed to thyself, and to the doctrine, continue in them; for in doing this, thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee.' Salvation in this passage is promised as the effect of taking heed to the dissemination of truth, and to be enjoyed in the present state by all such as believe and practice the duties which the Gospel enjoins. But as it is not our intention, in this article, to dwell on points in which we agree, but to show wherein we differ, and thereby either impart to, or elicit information from our brethren, we would first observe that whether the views of our ministering brethren or those of our own are correct, they both reflect honor on Paul as a minister of Jesus Christ, and a preacher of morality.

In this epistle to the Philippians, the writer exhorts his brethren to let their 'conversation be such as becometh the Gospel of Christ,' and to 'strive together for the faith of the Gospel,' and he points out the manner in which they must strive, which was to be in 'one mind'—to possess the same mind or disposition 'which was also in Christ Jesus;' and he recommends those moral duties, the practice of which would recommend the faith of the Gospel to others. He then commends the Philippians for their obedience, not only when he was present with them, but, he says, 'much more in my absence.' Then follows the injunction which heads this article, 'work out your own salvation with fear and trembling.' As much as if he had said, 'The salvation has been wrought within you, continue as you have done to work out, by exhibiting before the world a uniform life of godliness;' 'for it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his own good pleasure. Do all things without murmurings and disputings: that ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world; holding forth the word of life,' &c. It appears evident that instead of being exhorted to obtain salvation, the Philippians were exhorted to work out that salvation which they had already obtained. A 'good work had begun' in them; they had believed unto salvation; had been 'renewed in the spirit of their minds;' created anew in Christ unto good works; 'born of the spirit of truth, and tasted of the good word of God,' and in order for them to work out that salvation which had been wrought within them, they must exhibit before the world the fruits of it. And while they held forth the word of life 'as becometh the Gospel of Christ' in their 'conversation,' they should likewise prove its salutary effects by blameless and harmless lives, shining 'as lights amid a crooked and perverse nation,' that others seeing their good works might glorify their Father in heaven. All these things they were exhorted in substance to do with fear and trembling, lest they should, by examples unworthy of imitation, bring a reproach upon the cause of truth which they had espoused.

Brethren of the Abrahamic faith, let us improve this subject to our own moral advantage. Have we been born into 'the spirit of truth, and tasted of the good word of God,' and feasted with delight upon his promises? let us fear lest we give our adversaries occasion to say, 'Universalism is of licentious tendency, as may be proved from the morals of its advocates.' Has the Gospel been the power of God unto salvation, to us; have we learned from the providence of God that he 'is good unto all,' and that 'his tender mercies are over all his works?' Have we learned from the Scriptures that all mankind are the objects of God's love—that he loves even those who are enemies to him by wicked works? Let us then imitate the Divine example. Let us work out our salvation by loving our enemies, by blessing those who curse us; by praying for those who spitefully use us and persecute us; by showing out of a godly conversation our works with meekness of wisdom; by doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly before God.—[Star of Bethlehem.

EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.

'I tell you nay, but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' Luke xiii: 3.

This language is frequently adduced by some theologians, to prove that God will cast off many of his creatures eternally; and consign them to regions of unutterable woe. This idea seems to have originated in the minds of such, from the fact that the word 'perish' is associated with the text.

That the language conveys no such meaning, I shall endeavor to show from Christ's own words.—By reference to the preceding verses of the chapter from which this language is taken, I think the true import, and meaning of the Saviour's language, is perfectly clear. In the second verse, Christ says, 'Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you, nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' The question now very naturally arise, 'How did the Galileans perish?' Ans. They were slain—put to death and their blood mingled with Pilate's sacrifice. See first verse of the chapter. But the Saviour adds, verse 4th, 'Or those eighteen, upon whom the tower of Siloam fell, and slew them; think ye that they were sinners, above all men that dwell in Jerusalem? I tell you nay, but except ye [Jews] repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' Here it is plain that our Saviour refers to those who perished by the falling of the tower of Siloam, and to those whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices. Now is there any thing said in all this of endless misery? Not the slightest allusion is made to any such doctrine. The plain truth is this: Jesus knew the prating self-righteousness of the Jews. He wished to check and crush their hypocrisy. He wished to teach them that they were no better than the Galileans; and to press this truth indelibly upon their wicked hearts, he addressed this solemn and fearful language: 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' Now we have seen from the Saviour's own language how the Galileans perished. They were 'suddenly destroyed and that without remedy' by the tower of Siloam which fell and slew them. Christ then tells them, that except they repented speedily of their sins, [by living godly lives] they should likewise, i. e. in like manner perish—that they should speedily be overtaken, and visited with some like calamity.

2. It may now be asked by some, 'Have we any evidence, that such an interpretation as the writer has given, was ever fulfilled?' I answer, Yes. Josephus informs us in his 'Wars of the Jews,' Book vi. chap. 4, ver. 6, that such was the case. He says, [speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem] 'And as they were crowding into the temple together many of them were trampled under foot, one by another, while a great number fell among the cloisters, which were still hot and smoking, and were destroyed in the same miserable way with those whom they had conquered.  They were every where slain [the fate of those who were slain by the tower of Siloam] and every where beaten, and as for a great part of the people, they were weak and without arms, and had their throats cut, every where they were caught. Now round about the altar lay dead bodies, heaped upon one another; as at the steps going up to it, ran a quantity of their blood, whither also the dead that where slain fell down!' How literally was our Lord's prediction fulfilled! And what a warning it should be to all transgressors every where. Who, with these facts staring them full in the face, can think of applying the above language, to the endless misery of the wicked, when we have the clearest evidence, that it was long since fulfilled, A. D. 70.

I need not burden the subject with a protracted string of words. The subject is before us, and to my mind it is clear. May we all strive to learn the truth, and learning let us obey it. May we never stop to inquire, 'what saith the creed,' or yet 'what saith the multitude,' but let us ever ask, what saith the Scriptures? May God guide us in the way of all truth, and save us from all fear that hath torment.—Trumpet.

DEATHS.

In Darien, Genesee county, Feb. 8, 1846, AMOS D., son of Gaylord V. and Nancy D. Harper, aged 2 years. Thus have the bereaved parents been called to mourn the departure of a beloved child, but thanks be to God, not as those without hope. Being firm and unwavering believers in the Bible doctrine of life and immortality as brought to light by the Gospel, they could look upon the lingering distance between the present and the future, and quietly say to the departed, go in peace. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the bereaved mourners and relatives, with a numerous congregation of sympathising friends, by the writer, from Isa. xlvii: 15. J. S. FLAGLER.

In Darien, April 28th, SIMON CLARK, aged 84 years. Br. Clark died, as he had long lived, full of faith, hope and charity, which enabled him to live in peace with all men, and die full in the hope of life and immortality. He has left an amiable widow, and family of children to mourn their loss. But we trust the Comforter is with them. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered on the 30th, by the writer, from Luke ii: 29-32. J. S. F.

TO THE CLOUDS.

Fair southern clouds, of pearly white,
Now floating through the azure sky,
Ye seem like happy saints of light,
Winging the sapphire courts on high.

Lightly ye move in steady flight,
Mingling your milky plumes anon,
Like sister angels who unite
Their snowy wings and wander on.

Now ye your fleecy robes unfold,
And hasten singly to the east,
Like cherubs hieing to the goal
Where reigns unbroken love and peace.

Ye seem like spirits of the dead,
All joyousness, all free from care,
Who, having earth's enthrallments fled,
Rise all enraptured on the air:

Enshrined in human forms awhile,
With us they shared terrestrial joy;
Cheered by their sympathies and smiles,
Life's mingled cup had less alloy.

But, like spring blossoms of the vale,
Those lovely forms soon felt decay;
Like dews which morning suns exhale,
Soared silently their souls away.

And ye, of them the emblems pure,
To glad our eyes, awhile float near—
Our thoughts to those dear ones allure,
Then in the distance disappear.

They were the soft, endearing bands
Which bound our willing hearts to earth,
And when they reached celestial lands,
Our wish to dwell there, too, had birth.

And oft, ye clouds, of silvery hue,
Resting or rolling on the wind,
Ye've been the kindred links which drew
Us thither, leaving earth behind.

And then we deemed 'twould sometimes prove Pleasure untold, delicious, rare,
From that ecstatic realm to rove,
Through brightest skies and purest air;

And while on pinions white sustained
Above this sphere, like cloudlet soft,
Gaze leisurely on land and main,
And beckon every soul aloft.

NEVER GIVE UP.

AN INCIDENT IN REAL LIFE.

Never give up! It is wiser and better
Always to hope than once to despair;
Fling off the load of doubt's cankered fetter,
And break the dark spell of tyrannical care:

Never give up or the burden may sink you—
Providence kindly has mingled the cup,
And in all trials and troubles, bethink you,
The watchword of life must be, Never give up!

We recently published a capital song, entitled, 'Never give up.' A passage is quoted above. There is manly energy in the doctrine, that we should not permit ourselves to be overcome by common-place or even extraordinary reverses of fortune. 'Never say die'—'never give up'—are capital mottoes with regard to enterprise, business, and the things of this life generally. If we give way to depression of spirits, and at the first reverse abandon the chase of fortune as hopeless, we will soon sink into despondency, gloom, idleness, and perhaps vice.—But let us determine that come what may, we will still struggle on, that while life and health remain, we will make an effort to achieve independence, and in a majority of cases, sooner or later, success will come.

A friend stepped into our office a day or two ago, and in the course of conversation, related an instance well calculated to illustrate the force and propriety of energy and perseverance. He had visited Washington a few weeks before, and while standing on Pennsylvania Avenue, gazing at some object of interest, he was accosted by a stranger, as one he had seen and known in years gone by.

Ah!—inquired the other—when and where? After some conversation, in the course of which a degree of confidence was inspired between the parties, it turned out that the stranger had reference to a period of twenty years before in Philadelphia—that he was then a poor boy about seven years old, and was in the habit of visiting the work shop at which the other was engaged, for the purpose of collecting chips and shavings. The kind manner of the apprentice had made a favorable impression upon the heart and mind of the then bare-footed urchin, and although a period of nearly a quarter of a century had elapsed, he recognized the friend of his early days at a glance, and was anxious in some way to testify his appreciation of the kindness rendered in the hours of his boyhood.

After some further conversation he gave a brief outline of his history. Before he was eight years of age, his father, who was wretchedly poor, died in the alms-house, and the little fellow was compelled to beg cold victuals from door to door, in order to prevent the family from starving. Still he had correct principles, and was anxious to make a respectable figure in the world. He accordingly indentured himself to a house carpenter, and while engaged in learning the business, he obtained a copy of the 'Life of Franklin,' which he studied with great attention, in order, as he said, to acquire a knowledge of proper habits of economy, and not with any notion of becoming a philosopher. He persevered, became master of his trade, worked with success as a journeyman, removed to Washington, and in 1836 had accumulated enough to build two or three houses. A balance was still due on them, however, and the troubles of 1837 coming on, adversity overtook him, his property was sold by the sheriff, and he was again reduced to poverty. But he remembered his boyhood, the destitution of that period of his life, the manner in which he had overcome adversity by perseverance; and he determined never to give up.

His worldly wealth consisted of one bed and a little furniture, and with this niggardly provision for such an undertaking he consulted his better half, (for, like a wise man, he had married the moment he felt able to take care of a wife,) who was a true and brave hearted woman, and they determined to make an effort to obtain one or two boarders. Two young friends agreed to assist them in the way proposed, and to these was awarded the only bed in the house, while the husband and wife purchased a few bundles of straw, upon which they slept soundly and happily for many a month. Slowly and gradually fortune brightened again, employment was procured, savings were laid by, the journeyman became a master carpenter, he obtained one or two contracts from government, and although not thirty years of age, he is in easy and independent, if not in affluent circumstances.

He concluded his brief story by remarking that it would afford him infinite pleasure if the old friend to whom he had thus strangely introduced himself after an absence of more than twenty years, would, while he remained in Washington, make his house his home. He said that there were still many recollections of his early years, which he cherished with delight, and that on a recent visit to Philadelphia, he had wandered over the haunts of his childhood, and endeavored to learn something of the history of his youthful companions—most of them, like himself, children of distress and poverty. In a majority of the cases, the results were melancholy. Poor, friendless, and to some extent deserted—but few had wrestled with and risen above the untoward circumstances by which they had been surrounded. There were cases, however, in which patience, perseverance, and constant appeals to and dependence upon Providence, had lifted the orphan, the outcast and the beggar from a lowly condition of penury and trial, and rendered them good citizens, devoted husbands, kind parents, useful and valuable members of society. But he added, the doctrine of all who are depressed, of the children of toil and misfortune, no matter how dark the present may seem, should be—persevere, persevere—NEVER GIVE UP. For who, he continued—who may read the future—who may foretell the events of a single year? And he was right. In the language of a deep thinker—'duties are ours, but events are God's.' 'Clouds and darkness' may lower to-day—but sunshine and prosperity may brighten and beautify to-morrow. Let us struggle on then—let us never despair.

'Never give up! there are chances and changes
Helping the hopeful a hundred to one;
And through the chaos, High Wisdom arranges
Ever success, if you'll only hope on!
Never give up! for the wisest is boldest,
Knowing that Providence mingles the cup,
And of all maxims the best and the oldest,
Is the true watchword of 'Never give up!'

THE KNIT-WORK OF LIFE.

Williams College, Nov. 20, 1845.

Mr. Editor: I send you a copy of a letter, which was written by Mrs. E. W. (now Mrs. Y. I believe,) and sent with a present of a pair of blue-mixed woolen stockings, to her cousin, Judge W., on the eve of his marriage. I believe it has never been published, and being, to say the least, a very ingenious thing, you may wish to publish it in your valuable paper.

Troy Female Seminary, Dec. 10, 1829.

Dear Cousin: Herewith you will receive a present of a pair of woolen stockings, knit by my own hands, and be assured dear coz., that my friendship for you is as warm as the material, active as the finger-work, and generous as the donation.

But I consider this present as peculiarly appropriate on the occasion of your marriage. You will remark, in the first place, that there are two individuals united in one pair, who are to walk side by side, guarding against coldness, and giving comfort as long as they last. The thread of their texture is mixed, and so, alas, is the thread of life. In these, however, the white is made to predominate, expressing my desire and confidence that thus it will be with the color of your existence. No black is used, for I believe your lives will be wholly free from the black passions of wrath and jealousy. The darkest color here is blue, which is excellent, where we do not make it too blue.

Other appropriate thoughts rise to my mind in regarding these stockings. The most indifferent subjects, when viewed by the mind in a suitable frame, furnish instructive inferences. As saith the poet,

'The iron dogs, the peel and tongs,
The bellows that have leathern thongs,
The fire-wood, the ashes, and the smoke.
Do all to righteousness provoke.'

But to the subject. You will perceive that the tops of these stockings (by which I suppose courtship to be represented) are seamed, and by means of seaming, are drawn into a snarl, but afterwards come a time when the whole is made plain, and continues so to the end and final toeing off. By this, I wish to take occasion to congratulate you that you are now through with seaming and have come to plain reality. Again, as the whole of these comely stockings were not made at once, but by the addition of one little stitch after another, put in with skill and discretion, until the whole presents the fair and equal piece of work which you see; so, life does not consist of one great action, but millions of little ones combined: and so may it be with your lives, no stitch dropt when duties are to be performed; no widening made where bad principles are to be reformed, or economy is to be preserved; neither seem-ing nor narrowing where truth and generosity are in question; thus every stitch of life made right and set in the right place, none either too large or too small; too tight or too loose; thus may you keep on your smooth and even course, making existence one fair and consistent piece, until, together having passed the heel, you may come to the very toe of life; and here, in the final narrowing off, and dropping the coil of this emblematical pair of companions, and comforting associates, nothing appears but white, the token of innocence and peace, of purity and light. May you, like these stockings, the final stitch being dropt, and the work completed, go together from the place where you were formed, to a happier state of existence—a present from earth to Heaven.

Hoping that these stockings and admonitions may meet a cordial reception, I remain in the true blue friendship, seem-ly, yet without seem-ing

Yours from top to toe.

STEAM—A MIRACLE.

Sir Ralph Woodford told us that when the steamer was first started, (in Trinidad) he and a large party, as a mode of patronizing the undertaking, took a trip of pleasure in her, through some of the Bocas of the main ocean. Almost every one got sick outside, and as they returned through the Bocas Grande, there was no one on deck but the man at the helm and himself. When they were in the middle of the passage, a small privateer, such as commonly infested the gulf during the troubles in Columbia, was seen making all sail for the shore of Trinidad. Her course seemed unaccountable, but what was their surprise, when they observed, that on nearing the coast, the privateer never tacked, and finally, that ran herself directly on shore, the crew at the same time leaping out over the bows and sides of the vessel, and scampering off, as if they were mad, some up the mountains, and others in the thickets. This was so strange a sight, that Sir Ralph Woodford ordered the helmsman to steer for the privateer, that he might discover the cause of it. When they came close, the vessel appeared deserted. Sir Ralph went on board of her, and after searching various parts without finding any one, he at length opened a side cabin, and saw a man lying on a mat, evidently with some broken limb. The man made an effort to put himself in a posture of supplication; he was as pale as ashes, his teeth chattered, and his hair stood on end. 'Misericordia! Misericordia! Ave Maria!' faltered forth the Columbian. Sir Ralph asked the man what was the cause of the strange conduct of the crew. 'Misericordia!' was the only reply. It was sometime before the fellow could be brought back to his senses, when he gave this account of the matter: that they saw a vessel apparently following them, with only two persons on board, and steering without a single sail, directly in the teeth of the wind, current and tide,

Against the breeze, against the tide
She steadied with upright keel.

That they knew no ship could move in such a course by human means; that they heard a deep roaring noise, and an unusual agitation of water, which their fears magnified; and finally, that they concluded it to be a supernatural appearance, and accordingly drove their vessel ashore in an agony of terror, and escaped as they could; that he himself was not able to move, and that when he heard Sir Ralph's footsteps, he verily and indeed believed that he was fallen into the hands of the Evil Spirit.

THE CLARINET.

We find the following interesting description of this charming musical instrument in 'Gardner's Music of Nature':

'The clarinet approaches in tone the female voice nearer than any other instrument, and, as a principal in the orchestra, it now sustains a distinguished part. The instrument, which is of German origin, was introduced into Great Britain about the year 1791; and for the first twenty years, its use was confined to the military; for at the grand performance at Westminster Abbey, 1791, forty oboes and bassoons were admitted into that stupendous orchestra of a thousand performers, but the clarinet had not gained sufficient reputation to obtain a place. Soon after this period, from its warlike tone, it was adopted by all the military bands upon the continent; and the French found it of such singular efficacy in leading on the troops to battle, that all their regiments were headed by vast groups of these performers.

'At the federation in Paris, July 14, 1802, the writer was present when eighteen thousand troops passed in review before the Consul Bonaparte, to which were attached more than twenty bands of fifty performers each, forming an aggregate of more than one thousand musicians. The ordinary practice of military men is not less than six hours per day, and that for twenty years is just adequate to conquer all the difficulties of this instrument. Probably the greatest good effected by the thirty years' war was the improvement of the wind instruments. It was the incessant practice of fifty thousand performers spread over the continent that drew forth the genius and powers of those instruments by which Haydn and Mozart perfected the musical science. In quality of tone it is warm and powerful, partaking somewhat of oboe and trumpet combined—and the lustre of its tones adds great refuges to the orchestra.

'The tone of the clarinet is peculiarly graceful in the open air. Who has not sailed down the Rhine, and held his oar to listen to its joyous notes in the grove! Hidden in the thick umbrage of the mountains, on high you hear its clarion voice. It is the feast of the wine dressers, and Dirchenfells and Jura return the cheerful strain.

'Encircled by mountains the peasant has a rich delight in pouring forth the tones of this instrument. Softened by the echoes, he listens to the dulcet notes he had raised, and his merry bits of melody make the mountains aug and sing.'

LESSON TO REFORMERS.

Great is the strength of an individual soul true in its high trust;—mighty is it, even to the redemption of the world.

A German, whose sense of sound was exceedingly acute, was passing by a church, a day or two after he landed in this country; and the sound of music attracted him to enter, though he had no knowledge of our language. The music proved to be a piece of nasal psalmody, sung in most discordant fashion; and the sensitive German would fain have covered his ears. As this was scarcely civil, and might appear like insanity, his next impulse was to rush into the open air, and leave the hated sounds behind him. 'But this, too, I feared to do,' said he, 'lest offence might be given; so I resolved to endure the torture, with the best fortitude I could assume; when lo! I distinguished amid the din, the soft clear voice of a woman singing in perfect tune. She made no effort to drown the voices of her companions, neither was she disturbed by their noisy discord; but patiently and sweetly she sang, in full rich tones: one after another yielded to the gentle influence; and before the tune was finished, all were in perfect harmony.'

I have often thought of this story, as conveying an instructive lesson to reformers. The spirit that can thus sing patiently and sweetly in a world of discord, must indeed be of the strongest, as well as the gentlest kind. One scarce can hear his own soft voice, amid the braying of the multitude; and ever and anon comes the temptation to sing louder than they, and drown the voices that can not thus be forced into perfect tune. But this were a pitiful experiment; the melodious tones, cracked into shrillness, would only increase the tumult.

Stronger, and more frequently comes the temptation to stop singing, and let discord do its own wild work. But blessed are they that endure to the end,—singing patiently and sweetly, till all join in with loved acquiescence and universal harmony prevails, without forcing into submission the free discord of a single voice.

This is the hardest and the bravest task which a true soul has to perform amid the clashing elements of time. But once has it been done perfectly, unto the end; and that Voice,—so clear in its meekness,—is heard above all the din of a tumultuous world: one after another chimes in with its patient sweetness; and through infinite discords, the listening soul can perceive that the great tune is slowly coming into harmony.—Mrs. Child.

KINDNESS.—'What! Mr. Brown a brute? Why, he writes to his wife every packet!'

'Yes; he writes a parcel of flummery about the agony of absence, but he has never remitted her a shilling. Do you call that kindness?'

'Decidedly—unremitting kindness.'

TO THE GIRLS.

Habits of neatness, cleanliness and order are indispensable to a female, if she have any regard to the comfort of others, or her own. I have told you that females are designed, not only to extend the comforts of domestic life, but to be its principal ornaments; an attention to dress, therefore, is very necessary. How many females run into the error of thinking that to dress finely is to dress well—when the two things are as different as possible; for the one excites attention, the other avoids it.

A lady, who knew this distinction, ordered a cap from the milliner.

'How will you have it made, madam?' inquired the milliner.

'Make it,' replied the lady, 'so that it will not excite a thought.'

I think this is the best definition of what dress should be that I ever heard in my life. Be, then, neat and cleanly in your dress, and borrow a lesson of instruction from this lady.

Sad it is to see a female walking out with a hole in her stockings, her stays visible behind through the opening of her frock or gown, and her under-garments seen through her pocket holes. These things are not as they should be; avoid them, my dear girls; they are bad habits, and bad habits never answer.

An orderly person shows her love of regularity in all things, and can lay her hand on an article she wants; a disorderly person knows not where to find it; and if she finds it, frequently it is not in a state fit for use.

An orderly person has little to do; while a disorderly one has ten times the trouble of the other, without possessing one half of her advantages. I knew one who was the very spirit of order. She learned the spirit of order in her youth, and practised it in her riper years. The house in which she resided was a pattern of propriety, and her wardrobe a picture to gaze upon. But O, it is terrible to peep into a drawer that is crammed, without order, with clean frocks and dirty handkerchiefs, new gloves and old silk stockings, ribbons and curl papers, bodices and boot-laces, scissors and scent-boxes, and patch-work and pin-cushions! What a shocking exhibition of disorder and bad habits is here!

One glance at a room is enough to convince us whether it be under the care of an orderly person.

I have frequently known the kitchen of a servant more orderly than the drawing-room of her mistress, and the dormitory of an old woman in an alms house kept far more cleanly and methodical than the bed chamber of a young lady. Be orderly, my dear girls! do be orderly.

A HARD CASE.

A lady in the south of England made a practice of collecting all the little boys of the Parish once a year upon her lawn, and stuffing them with beef and plum-pudding. One time, towards the close of the entertainment, when she was walking round to see how all went on, and to ask how they were satisfied with her bounty, she found the greater part full and also content. But at last she came to a little fellow upon whose plate there was a large lump of the third helping of the pudding, and he was blubbering and crying as piteously as though he had not had a meal for four and twenty hours. 'What is the matter with you, my little man?' asked the lady: 'has any one dared to ill-use you in my presence?' The urchin blubbered more desperately than before, and at length faltered out, 'I can't eat more pudding!' and he cried more bitterly than before. The lady patted him on the head, saying, 'do not cry, my good little man; for if you are not able to eat your pudding, you can put it into your pocket.' A more violent burst followed this kindly advice, and at the end of it came out the words, 'But my pockets are both full already.'

SCANDAL.—No one loves to tell a tale of scandal, except to him that loves to hear it; learn, then, to cheek and rebuke the detracting tongue, by showing that you do not listen to it with pleasure.

'VOICE TO YOUTH.'

This work has now been before the public eight years, and has passed through as many editions. It has found its way into many, and perhaps, most, of the Common School Libraries of this State. I know not that it has met with any serious opposition as a library book, from any quarter, until recently. But at the present time it is evident a combined effort is being made on the part of the so called evangelical portion of the religious press, to exclude it from school libraries. An appeal has been made directly to the Secretary of State, who is also Superintendent of Common Schools, calling upon him to banish it at once from all school libraries. In his response the Secretary not only refused to exclude it, but spoke of it in commending terms, as a book peculiarly well calculated for common school libraries. Notwithstanding this decided repulse, they have again rallied, and are now resorting to every expedient to induce the Secretary to reverse his decision.

There are two charges urged against the 'Voice to Youth.' 1. That it is an infidel work. And 2. That it is sectarian. As to the first of these charges it is too groundless and ridiculous to require any serious attempt to refute it. That a book, which not only recognizes a belief in a Supreme Being, in Christ, in the Scriptures, and the Christian religion, but makes it an important portion of its instructions, to impress upon youth the necessity of an enlightened faith in these fundamentals of all true religion, and brings forth arguments to guard them against the attacks of infidelity, should be stigmatized as an infidel publication, is an exhibition of one of those strange solecisms, for which modern evangelists have obtained a world wide notoriety. And moreover this charge is a melancholy manifestation of the recklessness, and want of moral principle in a class, who make the highest and loudest professions of religion and morality, and in fact, claim to monopolize all there is of these, upon the earth. It shows that they will not hesitate to utter the most open, direct, and wilful FALSEHOOD, with an unblushing impudence and bitter malignity, truly startling and awful to all honest men, when selfish and sectarian ends are to be promoted. All this they have done, in their charge of infidelity against the 'Voice to Youth.'

The objection that it is a sectarian work, comes with inexpressible grace, from the evangelicals. Surely they who move heaven and earth—compass sea and land—resort to any measure, right or wrong—to accomplish sectarian measures,—must be filled with holy horror, of all sectarianism. The modesty of the gentlemen who are urging on this crusade against the 'Voice to Youth,' challenges the admiration of the world. To one unacquainted with their machinations, they would appear true patriots and Christians—diamonds of the first water.—They are not sectarian—Oh, no!—They have an overflowing abhorrence of every thing having the least squinting towards sectarianism. With clasped hands, and half closed eyes, and a demure and innocent aspect in their countenance, they would have the world believe 'butter wouldn't melt on their tongues'—the pious souls! How completely is the garb of the lamb, stripped from the back of the wolf, when it is known, that in the same breath these evangelicals beg the State superintendent to exclude the 'Voice to Youth,' because it is sectarian, they implore him to admit in its place, the publications of the American Tract Society, which come streaming from the very hot-bed of sectarianism, and are baptised, soul, body and spirit, in the bluest waters of Presbyterianism. In this bare-faced attempt to violate the law of this State which forbids the introduction of sectarian works into common school libraries, they virtually cast upon the State superintendent an insult, than which none greater could be offered to a public officer. It was made under the confident supposition that he was either ignorant of the law of the State under which he should act in the premises—or was not sufficiently intelligent to distinguish between what was, and what was not, sectarian—or was, like themselves, so much the slave of sectarianism that he was ready to violate all laws, and all the principles of honor, to carry out the selfish plans of sect.

That the first seven editions of the 'Voice to Youth,' contain one or two paragraphs which may be construed to come slightly within the limits of sectarianism, I have never been indisposed to admit. But that any thing sectarian enters into the body or scope of the book, or that it was designed to promote sectarian ends, I positively deny. While frankly admitting this constructive delinquency in a single brief instance, I at the same time, maintain, that among the many books in the school libraries of this State, written by clergymen, there is probably not one, which does not contain as much or more matter, that may be deemed sectarian as the 'Voice to Youth.' And if the few incidental sentences to which objection is made, are considered sufficient in the 'Voice to Youth,' to exclude it from school libraries, then the friends of an impartial administration of the laws, will demand that every other book in such libraries, which contain any declaration or allusion, however brief or incidental, that may be considered sectarian, (and many such there are) shall be subjected to the same rigid rule, and excluded in like manner! For I take it the laws are not designed to favor any one sect, or class of sects, to the injury of others, but to operate alike, in respect to all parties and denominations.

A great effort is made in certain quarters, to fasten all manner of iniquity on the publishers or author of the 'Voice to Youth,' in regard to a revision of the eight edition. This matter is made plain by a brief explanation. The book was not originally written with any design or expectation, of its introduction into school libraries. It found its way there, simply because the people chose to purchase it for that purpose. After seven editions had been published, I received a letter from a book publisher in the city of New York, stating that he was desirous of issuing an edition expressly for common school libraries. And as some objections had been made to a few sentences in the chapter on 'Religious Opinions,' I was requested to make such a revision as should be satisfactory to all. Never having designed it to be a sectarian work, and feeling perfectly willing to make any modification consistent with principle, that should render it unobjectionable to all classes, I cheerfully made the desired revision.—This was done in good faith—with no disposition to deceive, or to avoid any responsibility in regard to the former editions—but solely to carry out more fully the original purpose of making the work free from any sectarian inculcations, and fitting it especially to meet the constantly increasing demand for its introduction into school libraries.

I trust the friends of liberal principles and of an impartial administration of the law relative to school libraries, will closely watch the movements in regard to this matter, of library books, and be prepared to assert and maintain their rights.

PROFESSION—PRACTICE.

Religion is a subject upon which much deep and anxious thought has been bestowed. The philosopher, the statesman, the teacher, the wayfaring man; high and low, rich and poor, bond and free; have often reflected with becoming solemnity upon this subject—the most serious and important of any that ever engaged the attention of man. But the like success has never attended all reflection, thought, and inquiry, as readily appears by looking upon the different sects in Christendom, each tenacious of its own opinions of faith and condemning and opposing the principles of all other sects. And this very fact, has led many into the deep darkness of a cheerless skepticism.

There are not a few who go forth and look upon the Christian world, and beholding it divided into many different denominations; each denomination contending spiritedly in favor of its own creed; opposing all others, not in the spirit of kindness and love, but with all the severity of hatred and ill-will; and each denomination claiming the Bible as the great foundation Rock, upon which rest its principles of faith: Thus beholding, they turn from all in disgust; cast the Bible from them as far beneath their attention and unworthy of confidence, and from henceforth they wander on over the world with their minds enshrouded in the darkness and gloom of unbelief. But such a proceeding is far from being judicious. Difference in principles of faith between different sects, and conduct highly unworthy of the Christian profession, should be no cause for bestowing condemnation upon Christianity, unless it can be shown that division, strife, and contention, are the legitimate consequences following from a belief in the doctrines of the Christian religion. Hence, instead of condemning the Bible and Christianity because of the inconsistencies of the professed followers of the Saviour, it were better to examine the Bible with care; to study the doctrines and precepts which Christ taught to mankind, and from thence endeavor to become in possession of a knowledge of the truth. And satisfied that Revelation is based upon the truth, it may easily be determined in what consists the Christian character.

The religious character of the man may be known, not from the professions which may be made, but from the actions performed. 'By their fruits shall ye know them,' is the instruction, from the lips of the Saviour. But it is by far too frequently the case, that religion is looked upon as something connected with the heart and that alone; that its home is with the inner man, the soul, and that it is to influence the hand, no farther than obeying the law; supporting the Gospel; and attending upon the services of the sanctuary. And though these things are just and proper in their places and should never be neglected, yet this is far from being the whole, the end and aim of the Christian religion. Its professors are not only to keep themselves unspotted from the world, but they are also in duty bound to 'visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions.' One may be perfect so far as profession is concerned; he may be a strict observer of the Sabbath; a punctual attendant upon the services of public worship; a strict adherent to forms and ceremonies; he may instruct his fellow men in the ways of righteousness; lift a warning voice to sinful men and urge them to turn from the error of their ways; and still, if all his dealings and intercourse with his fellow-beings are not based upon the principles of justice, benevolence, and love, he will be found wanting and obnoxious to that condemnatory declaration of the Saviour; 'these ye ought to have done, and not to have left the others undone.' And when the inquirer after truth shall bestow sufficient thought and reflection upon the words of Revelation; when he examines the doctrines and precepts of Christianity with commendable sincerity, and makes them a rule by which to determine the true character of the professor, then the darkness of unbelief will flee away before the light of everlasting truth and joy and satisfaction reward him for his toil.

But again: In the present state of society the proceeding has become somewhat prevalent, to judge of the truth of a system of religious faith by the conduct of its individual professors, and such being the fact, Christian people should have the utmost care in making their conduct faultless, so far as lies in their power, that disrespect may not be brought upon the cause of the Redeemer. How great the responsibility resting upon the professor in this particular! Every thought of his mind; every word of his mouth; every deed of his hand, must tell for weal or for woe in the advancement of the cause of religion, or upon its retrograde. And yet it seems that in too many instances professors are unmindful of this truth, and bestow but little attention upon the conduct which they maintain before the world, bringing, in the end, sorrow upon their own heads, and disrespect and disgrace upon the Christian religion.

But coming home to our own denomination, we wish to hold converse awhile with the believers in the doctrine of Universal Salvation, relative to the influence which must be exerted in favor of, or against our principles of faith, by the individual conduct of those who have declared themselves Universalists. The judgment which many will form of our religious faith; whether that faith be correct or erroneous, will be governed by our daily walk and practice. True, this is not a criterion by which to judge the faith of a whole denomination, because the vicious actions of an individual may not spring from his religious belief, but from his hypocritical or evil disposition; but it is indeed seldom that the observer goes thus far, but bestows his condemnation upon the faith of a sect because now and then a bad man may be found in its ranks.—Consequently we have another reason, aside from the enjoyment conferred by an upright religious deportment, why our conduct should be free from all actions bearing even the semblance of injustice, vice, and iniquity. We should oft commune with our own hearts, and examine and weigh the sentiments, and thoughts, and feelings, dwelling there; banishing those which are not strictly virtuous, and retaining those only which are in agreement with righteousness. All reflections of our minds should be graced with the beauties of holiness, and these alone, treasured up as worthy of the mind of man. The deeds of our hands should be deeds of morality, marked with that justice, and benevolence, and mercy, which graced the acts of him who came into the world to instruct, purify, and save mankind from the contamination of sin. We should strive to be perfect, so far as mankind may be in this state of being, and then our profession and practice being harmonious, our influence will be such as to gain respect and love, both for the cause of religion that we have espoused, and for ourselves. Yes, Universalists, let us live our doctrine; act as directed by its precepts; and then, its progress shall be onward with strength and power, carrying joy to many a sorrowing heart, hope to the desponding mind, and gladness to the grief-stricken soul, and we shall in no wise lose our reward. REV. JOHN T. AVERY, AND THE NILES REPUBLICAN.

From the Niles (Michigan) Republican of April 4th, sent us by a friend, several weeks since, we copy the following editorial puff designed for the special benefit of Rev. John T. Avery of revival notoriety.

‘THE REV. JOHN T. AVERY, an Evangelist closed his labors in the Presbyterian church in this place, on Sunday evening last,—having been with us six weeks, and delivered sixty-three sermons. We must say, he is without doubt, one of the most efficient ministers of the Gospel we have ever listened to. His way and manner of enforcing the truths of the word of God, simply flying them in such manner as to bring them within the comprehension of every mind, surpasses every thing we have ever heard. He sweeps away the props of infidelity, and universal salvation with a master hand and leaves an unbeliever in Jesus Christ without a single thread to sustain himself. He points out the way to salvation in a plain and simple manner, and a fool need not err. The bands of infidelity have given away and unbelievers have been brought to inquire, ‘Lord what wilt thou have me to do?’ His whole soul is engaged in the work. He is a humble and devoted follower of Christ, and he gives all the honors of his success to God. He has been the means, through the blood of the Lamb, of bringing joy and peace into many a family. Those who were before blind, can now see. The scoffer is rejoicing in the hope of eternal happiness. Husbands, who for years have had the prayers of their faithful wives, have erected their family altars, and find great joy in praising their Maker. Sons and daughters have been converted and there is general rejoicing in the Lord in many a family, who were before wandering in darkness. But, Mr. Avery leaves us, to pursue his labors in another quarter. He carries with him the heartfelt gratitude of hundreds. His heart overflowing with love to God, and his labors will be blessed wherever he goes. May the Lord go with him and support him in the glorious work in which he is engaged in winning souls to Christ. May he, in his labors gain strength, and live long to convince the world of their sins, and be the means of still inducing thousands to flee from the wrath to come. The number of conversions in this place, under his preaching, is about 165 or 70. At South Bend, where he labored, we understand a larger number submitted themselves to God. We envy him not the glory he will partake of, when his labors are finished here below, and he is called to sit down in his father’s house, in the celestial Kingdom.’

What a wonder of wonders must this Rev. John T. Avery be! He ‘surpasses every thing’ the Editor of the Niles Republican ‘ever heard!’ We wonder if he is any related to his name’s sake, the noted Ephraim K. Avery. He must be a real Boanerges—a real lion of a revivalist. It is certain he is not a lamb. He has made 165 or 70 converts—proselytes we suppose. But are they any better than before being proselyted? Are they more honest in their deal, more charitable, more humane, better husbands and wives, better parents and children, better neighbors and friends? If so, we shall greatly rejoice, though we must confess we shall be disappointed: for such are not generally the results of modern revivalism. They are almost any thing but favorable to the cause of charity and morality.

We perceive, by the language employed, that this Mr. Avery is of the stamp of revivalists well known in this region for years past; such for instance as Knapp, Fishpool, Littlejohn, Burchard, Swan, &c.—that he values himself on attacking infidelity and Universalism in connection, and associating them together as two kindred systems, in order to excite hostility to the latter by the well known pernicious tendency of the former. The ‘Republican’ Editor says, ‘he sweeps away the props of infidelity and universal salvation with a master hand, and leaves an unbeliever in Jesus Christ without a single thread to sustain himself.’ Mirabile dictu! What a wonderful man! And what an association of ideas!—‘The props of infidelity and universal salvation’—as though both rested on the same supports! But does he not know, or did he not reflect, that the two are perfect antipodes—as wide apart as the poles?—that while infidelity rejects the Bible, and Christ, and Christianity, Universalism embraces all three with perfect confidence and devout gratitude? Now, let him know and understand, that the infidel does not believe Christ will save a single soul of Adam’s race while Universalists believe he will save every soul God has made: and this Mr. Avery and his Partialist brethren believe he will save a very small part of mankind, thus showing Partialism to be much nearer infidelity than Universalism is, in short that Partialism stands directly between us and infidels.

But we inquire, is this Mr. Avery, this wonderfully great modern revivalist, an intelligent man? is he a good man? One of these questions must be answered in the negative. He is either ignorant or wicked as we will now proceed to show. The friend who sent us the paper containing the above article, (a most intelligent and worthy sister in the faith of a world’s salvation, who recently removed from this State to Michigan) in a brief note to us accompanying the article, says of Mr. Avery,

‘This gentleman found occasion to call your name in question, in the course of his meeting. He stated that a gentleman in great distress of mind inquired of you what he should do to be saved. He said you replied there was no cause of alarm—that you thought all would be saved. He not being satisfied, drew a pistol from his pocket and attempted to take his life: that you then caught his arm and begged him to desist; for it was all a matter of uncertainty. If I recollect aright, the same story went the rounds in the protracted meetings some years ago, and you made a notice of it in the Mag. and Adv. If you have the paper, I wish you would send it to me.’

Here then we have the means of knowing the character and substance of pulpit labors of this said John T. Avery. They consist of stale and worn out scandal revamped and new fitted up for the occasion, and retailed to the gaping multitude as a substitute for the Gospel! Now, if the preacher was ignorant of the things which he affirmed, then he was inexcusable for uttering libelous matter concerning us, not knowing whether it was true or false: if, on the other hand, he was acquainted with the facts of the case referred to then was he guilty of deliberately uttering known falsehood, for effect’s sake, and therefore inexcusable and absolutely wicked.

Our readers of former years can not but recognise in the above story the well known case of Cornelius Henry Francisco, who, in the spring of 1832, attempted to commit suicide in this city and was saved from the fatal act by the interposition of Rev. A. B. Grosh and ourself, at the imminent risk of our own lives, and who, to reward us for the act, threatened our own lives if we published all the facts of the case; subsequently pretended to renounce Universalism, (which by his own confession he never believed,) and joined Dr. Lansing’s (Presbyterian) church; after which he was guilty of adultery, drunkenness, bigamy, (we think polygamy,) occasioning the death of his first wife by his cruelty and vices, deserting his second wife, and murdering outright his third wife, for which last crime he was executed upon the gallows at Erie, Pa., in the spring of 1838, in full fellowship with the Presbyterian church of this city, and all of which crimes he had perpetrated while a member of that church, and after he had pretended to renounce Universalism, which he had never believed!

We have so often referred to this Francisco story, and so often exposed the wickedness of our opposers in bringing it up as an argument against Universalism, it seems useless and even foolish to refer to it again. But if our opposers will revamp and reiterate the oft exposed slander, we shall still be compelled to repeat to the public the simple facts of the case, or refer to the documents that are authentic on the subject. For the information of those who wish to see the details of the whole affair, we refer them to the previous numbers of this paper published on the 27th of April, 1838, and on the 14th of February, 1840.

Thus we see what kind of food this Mr. Avery gives his followers and admirers, and we must judge of his character by the character of his public labors. But really, is it not a pity that people should be so duped and so befuddled in this enlightened day and country? We would not speak lightly of religion, or of the honest labors of well meaning friends of religion, however mistaken or erroneous they may be in their opinions. But the world is not yet rid of religious mountebanks: and if we are not mistaken, this Mr. Avery must rank as one of them, judging from the article before us and the note from our friend relative to the character of his public labors. THOUGHTS ON THE PAST.

Where are the hopes our youth inspired?
And where the ties we early blended?
Glad faces smile, and hearts are fired;
But those are gone; the spell is ended.

The dirge hath ceased; the tear is dried;
And other hearts flow in their train;
Yet memory clings to those allied,
And mingles with their dust again.

And dreams of fancy oft entwine
The thoughts our hearts were wont to blend,
And soar to where the spirits shine.
In boundless light, where sorrows end.

Thus are we all to nature prone—
The brittle thread that binds us here
Is severed, while but we alone,
Foresee the fate that lingers near.

The bloom of spring is quickly passed,
And summer sheds its short-lived ray;
Then winter comes with furious blast,
And bears the stricken leaf away.

So fit the hours of man's delay—
The bud, the blossom, and the seed—
The morning beam awakes to day,
And shades of darkness soon appear.

There is, in this brief space of life,
That dims our smiles, awakes our fears,
A thought that turns from care and strife,
That mingles joy unfringed with tears.

There is a hope, 'tis man's estate,
When every other joy is riven;
The soul shall, bird-like, seek its mate,
And join its warbling notes in heaven.

ANSWER TO L. J.

BY REV. J. B. SAX.

We lately received a letter from an esteemed friend, of which the following is an extract.

'But to state the principle of our nature, which, to all appearance, seems to be at variance with Christian principles. Universalists I believe, with but few exceptions, acknowledge the truths taught by Phrenology. If Phrenology be true (and for the present I will assume that it is, for I presume you will not pretend to the contrary) then there are such organs [rather faculties] in our minds as destructiveness and combativeness; and we are told that the office of the latter is to cause us to act in self-defence, to resist unlawful encroachments, to protect ourselves and those whom we love from the assaults and cruelty of others. Now I can not see this in any other light, than that it is at direct variance with Christ's teachings, where he says—If a man smite thee on one cheek, turn to him the other also; or if a man will have thy coat, give him thy cloak likewise. Now whether it is allowed that Phrenology be true or not, it can not be denied that it is natural for us, in our present state of existence, to resist aggressions; that it is natural where we are attacked, to run, or fight in self-defence; and further than this, it can not be successfully denied, but that most men when wantonly injured, in person or property, have almost an irresistible impulse to retaliate. This feeling is natural, for it is involuntary, and its author is GOD. Our nature tells us to resist evil. The inspired Word tells us to resist not evil. The works and word of God seem here to be at variance. Phrenology teaches us that we have organs [faculties] given us whose office is that of acting in self-defence. The Scriptures tell us, that if a man smite us on one cheek, we ought to turn the other to him also. If the science of Phrenology be denied, as being founded in truth, still the question remains, for our natural and almost uncontrollable impulses are, to act as it teaches our organs are adapted for acting. I should like to hear a solution, and doubtless many others of our readers would also. Yours, L. J.'

As the writer of the above seemed to desire an answer through the 'Magazine and Advocate,' and as there may be others who would be interested in the subject, we concluded to make some remarks upon it, holding ourselves ready and anxious to be corrected, if wrong, by any one who has a better understanding of it. And indeed I hope that some one better qualified, will take up the subject after me, and elucidate it better than I can hope to do. I will now proceed to give my opinion upon the matter.

First, I acknowledge the teachings of Phrenology to be true. We have the faculty of combativeness in our minds; it was placed there by the fiat of Almighty God; and its uses, as stated by Combe in his 'Constitution of Man,' are, to give 'courage to meet danger, to overcome difficulties, and to resist attacks.' We have also the faculty of destructiveness, having its legitimate uses, but which it is not necessary to specify at this time. Suffice it to say that revenge is not a legitimate use, but an abuse of the faculty. To resist attacks then, under proper circumstances, is natural to mankind; and any thing which forbids it, can not be the word of God; for Jehovah will never revoke in his word, laws which he has permanently established in nature. That portion of Christ's teachings, which has been referred to as contradicting this law of nature, is recorded in the fifth chapter of Matt. 39-41 verses inclusive. Our object of course will be to show, that it does not contradict the principles of Phrenology; that is, the truths of the science. 'Resist not evil.' 'Or, as the original implies,' says Paige in his Commentary, 'resist not the evil person, or the person who offers injury or abuse.' But I do not understand by this that all resistance to evil is absolutely forbidden. Christ meant merely to command us not to resist evil with evil, in the way the Jews did. The connection will enlighten this matter. We read in the 38 verse—'Ye have heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil.' The plain meaning which common sense would put upon this precept, would be the following.

You are not to resist evil according to the spirit of the Jewish proverb, 'an eye for an eye, etc.'; that is, by injuring others as much as they injure you,—but you are to do them good as you have opportunity, notwithstanding their enmity. Christ was not speaking, as we see by the context, of defending ourselves during an assault, but of revenge—injuries which we may receive, after we have received them; that is of injuring others merely for the sake of vengeance: this he condemned, and common sense condemns it also, and this condemnation does not contradict Phrenology. He was only speaking against vengeance; and the command, resist not evil, need not be understood to extend any farther: so it would not touch combativeness at all. It would be absurd to suppose that this command was absolutely general, against all manner of resistance to evil whatever, for it would not only contradict other portions of Christ's teachings, but also his example. He resisted evil in some way; not by revenge to be sure, nor yet perhaps by physical means, but still he resisted it by some means. He sharply rebuked the sinners of his day, and resisted them in their evil practices, by the mighty powers of eloquence, argument, and expostulation, which he possessed. The precept under consideration, if understood as absolutely general, would cut off this method of resistance as well as any other. But as we have seen by the context, it is limited to the subject of revenge; at any rate it is in force only against such resistance as is condemned by reason and the moral sentiments. Therefore, in order to make out a contradiction between nature and Christ's precept, it must be shown that revenge is a natural or legitimate use of our faculties: if our friend will attempt to do that, we will attempt to show the contrary.

'But whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also,' I consider merely as a figure used to enforce the foregoing precept, as we have now explained it, and not to be interpreted literally: for we know it was never literally followed even by Christ himself; see John xviii: 22,

23. This view is justified by the undoubted fact, that the Jews were in the habit of speaking constantly in figures; which figures were never for a moment understood literally. So of the following verses; and if any one desires a more particular exposition, let him read Paige's Commentary on the passage under consideration.
